the time appointed, he took possession of the lands, which occasioned some disputes with the Danish monarch. These, however, were more easily decided than the affair of Heildesheim. For the space of an hundred years the house of Brunswick-Luncenburg proved possession of that bishopric. It was ceded in 1693 to Ferdinand elector of Cologne, on condition that the Protestants should be maintained in the free exercise of their religion. It was afterwards stipulated in the treaty of Westphalia, that the affairs of religion should be placed on the same footing as in the year 1624; in consequence of which, the elector of Mentz and the duke of Brunswick drew up a convention, which was ratified in 1652 by Maximilian-Henry, elector of Cologne and bishop of Hildesheim. Here it was stipulated, that Protestants should not, in religious matters, depend on the chancery or episcopal spiritual court, but carry their complaints before the Protestant consistory. Without regard to the convention, the Protestants were oppressed, and the number of their churches diminished. They were besides compelled to observe the festivals of the Romish calendar, and to bring their complaints before the chancery. The elector of Cologne promised to examine their grievances; but he died. The Protestants remonstrated to his successor to no purpose; upon which they carried their complaints before the chamber of Wetzlar, where they obtained a decree in their favour: but the decree being disregarded in Heildesheim, they applied to the circle of Lower Saxony, and particularly to the house of Brunswick. As the see of Heildesheim was at that time vacant, the elector of Hanover wrote to the chapter, exhorting them to pay the due regard to the convention of 1643; but his letters producing no effect, he seized upon the revenues of that diocese in the electorate. The canons carried their complaints to the emperor and the diet; but receiving no favourable answer, they promised to redress all the grievances; and upon executing their word, the elector restored their revenues. Such was the issue of an affair which had almost embroiled Germany in a new civil war, on account of religion.

BEFORE we conclude the section, it will be proper to give an abstract of the affairs of the North, as they had considerable influence on the resolutions of the diet, and the circumstances of the empire. The unfortunate battle of Pultowa wrought an intire change in Sweden, Russia, Poland, and Saxony. The hero who had dethroned a king, and thrown all the Protestants of Europe into consternation, was now a fugitive in the Turkish dominions. A few years before he gave law to the emperor, Denmark, and Augustus king of Poland, while he was feared and courted by the confederates, and the French monarch. Now the elector of Saxony was entering upon measures to recover the crown of Poland, and precipitate the unfortunate Stanislaus from a throne with the same rapidity as he had been elevated to that dignity by the king of Sweden. Augustus pleaded, that he had signed the treaty of Alt-Ranstadt by compulsion: he assembled his troops, published circular letters in Poland, and granted a general amnesty to all who had taken arms for his rival. His intention was to join the Russian forces under general Goltz, and the Polish army commanded by Siniauski, while the passes to Saxony should be strictly guarded by the militia of the electorate. About the time this junction was effected, the king of Denmark acceded to the confederacy against Sweden. In consequence, he made an irruption into Schonen, which alarmed the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, obliged him to put the militia in arms, block up all the passes, and take measures for his own defence; his minister, the baron Fabricius, residing at this very time at the little court maintained by the Swedish monarch at Bender. Had Pomerania and the duchy of Holstein become the theatre of war, some inconveniencies to the Germanic body were apprehended, which might weaken the emperor's efforts against Lewis XIV. To anticipate danger, his imperial majesty, the princes of the empire, the queen of England, and the states-general, signed a treaty for the security of Holstein and Pomerania. In this treaty appeared one very singular article, inserted at the request of the czar Peter, and Augustus of Poland, without which, they refused to accede to the measures taken by the allies: it was, that the fourteen thousand Swedish troops, quartered in Pomerania, should not be permitted to return for the defence of their own dominions, or to draw their swords in Pomerania in behalf of their natural sovereign. Nothing could be more insolent than a clause, which already supposed them prisoners of war; yet the confederates gave this agreement the appellation of a treaty of neutrality, and resolved to raise an army in its support. The project, however, never took effect: it became the subject of every conversation; it occasioned much speculation; but none of the parties adhered to their engagements, and the princes of the North were left at liberty to despoil the unfortunate king of Sweden in what manner they thought proper.

C H A P. XXV.

Containing Negotiations for a Peace with France; Revolution in the English Ministry; the Death of the Emperor Joseph; the Disposition of the Germanic Body relative to Peace: the Election of the Archduke to the Imperial Diadem; the Protestation of the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne against their Proscription; the Cession of the Sovereignty of the Netherlands to that Prince; the Emperor Charles prosecutes the War against France; he is deserted by his Allies, and at length forced to accept of the Terms proposed by Lewis at Rastadt.

IN the beginning of the new year, letters addressed to the emperor arrived from Peter the Great and Augustus king of Poland, demanding the execution of the late treaty, as they expected being attacked by the Grand Seignior. Divers councils were held upon this subject; and the whole politics of the court of Vienna were directed to prevent the Turks from entering Hungary, and assisting the malcontents. It was at length resolved to acquaint the northern monarchs, that the treaty would be executed, as soon as the rebels in Hungary could be reduced to obedience; and that, in the mean time, it answered one very important purpose, that of detaining the Swedish army in Pomerania. From this reply it was apparent, that the war had greatly diminished his strength; a circumstance of which the French monarch did not fail to make his advantage, though he entertained still greater expectations from the approaching revolution in the English ministry. It is well known that Marlborough's influence occasioned the duration of the war; and that his enemies, the Tories, were equally strenuous for peace, as the only means of clipping the wings of that hero, and setting bounds to his ambition. At length they gained their ends, by an artful application to the passions of the queen; the friends of the British general were turned out of the administration; his power greatly limited; but he was still continued at the head of the army, from an apprehension of alarming the allies, particularly the Dutch, who placed the greatest confidence in the abilities and good fortune of Marlborough.

THIS great event was succeeded by another no less important to the peace of Europe. The death of the emperor Joseph, who expired at Vienna on the seventeenth of April, gave a new turn to the politics of Christendom (A). It was now obvious, that the balance of power, the object of a bloody war for the space of nine years, would be destroyed, if the archduke annexed to the imperial diadem the Spanish monarchy. This circumstance, together with the continual solicitation of the new ministry, and the general inclinations of her people, impoverished by a long and expensive struggle, determined the queen of England to accommodate matters with France, and, if her allies were obstinate, to strike up a separate pacification.

THE emperor's death was announced to the princes of the empire, by circular letters from his mother the empress-dowager; and dispatches were immediately sent to England and Holland, where the imperial ministers laboured to demonstrate, that this event ought to effect no change in the views of the confederates, as it could not have any influence on the equilibrium they were desirous of establishing in the scale of Europe. The arguments advanced in support of this principle, were rather specious than true; yet they were embraced by the king of Portugal, the duke of Savoy, and several princes of the empire, who found their advantage in prolonging the war, and hiring out their forces: indeed, the states-general, the Portuguese, and Victor Amadeus, hoped to share in the spoils of the Spanish monarchy. This had hitherto maintained them fast in the confederacy, and induced them now strenuously to labour for its continuance.

As the queen of Great Britain had no such expectations, and had supported the chief expence of the alliance, from regard to the general interest of Europe, she now, from

(A) The emperor Joseph fell a martyr to the small-pox, and the unskillfulness of his physicians, in the prime of life and vigour of youth. He was crowned king of Hungary in 1687, and three years after he was elected king of the Romans. In 1699 he married the daughter of the duke of Brunswick-Lunenburgh, by whom he had three children, Leopold-Joseph, his only male issue, dying in his infancy. As to the character of this emperor, it is variously represented; less gentle, mild and affable than his father Leopold, he possessed fire, spirit, and ambition. Impatient of opposition, he was haughty, active, enterprising, and indefatigable: he frequently pursued from resentment what he had first undertaken from policy. Never did an emperor of Germany govern with more despotism; and the house of Bavaria is an instance of the inflexibility of his temper. His success augmented the pride of his disposition, and added fuel to a fire which had long burnt with violence. In the space of five years he saw Lombardy subdued, Piedmont evacuated, Naples reduced, the Low Countries, and even the kingdom of Spain, conquered by his own arms and those of his allies. The only reverse of fortune he ever experienced, was subsequent to the battle at Villa-Viciosa.

the same motives, signed preliminaries of a peace with France, which she sent for the approbation of her allies. Without hesitation the court of Vienna rejected them, and the count de Gallas, the imperial minister at London, laboured to give the preliminaries an invidious turn, and render them unpopular. In this he was supported by the whole weight of the Whig faction. He carried his resentment so far as to speak disrespectfully of the queen's person, and was, for that reason, forbid the court; upon which he broke out into the bitterest invectives, taxing the queen and ministry with perfidy, and a breach of faith. He accused the latter of corruption, and offered to prove juridically what he advanced; nor did the archduke Charles absolutely condemn the conduct of his ambassador. He declared he would adhere to the propositions made at Gertrudenberg; and in this resolution he was supported by the elector of Hanover, who declared he would never detach himself from the interests of the house of Austria.

Operations of the campaign.

It was otherwise with certain princes of the empire: the king of Prussia was, at this very time, secretly negotiating with Lewis; however, some differences about the conditions broke off the treaty, and determined his Prussian majesty to continue his forces with the combined army. Notwithstanding England had signed the preliminaries, her forces still acted under the duke of Marlborough in the Netherlands, where the confederates reduced Buchain. Prince Eugene had now withdrawn the Austrians from the combined army, in order to strike some blow of consequence on the Rhine; but no opportunity offered, and the season was far advanced before his arrival. Besides, the members of the empire had been extremely deficient in advancing their contingencies, and the military chest was quite exhausted. The prince complained in a letter to the elector of Mentz, and he transmitted the writing to the diet at Ratisbon, where it was perused and disregarded. It was universally believed in Germany, that the conduct of England must oblige the house of Austria to listen to proposals; they therefore thought it prudent to withhold their supplies. As to the campaign in Dauphiny, it was equally sterile in great events as those on the Rhine and in the Netherlands. The duke of Savoy was superior in forces to the enemy; but marechal Berwick posted his army with so much address, as rendered abortive all the duke's motions and stratagems. In Spain the French king, and Philip his grandson, maintained the superiority gained the preceding campaign; and, indeed, the vacancy in the imperial throne fell out seasonably to save the honour of the archduke, who was in a fair way of being driven out of the Spanish dominions, as the duke of Argyle, commander in chief of the British forces in Portugal, had orders not to enter upon action.

No sooner was the campaign finished, than the princes of the empire redoubled their endeavours to persuade the imperial court into the necessity of terminating a war, which had wholly drained the empire of resources: still, however, the ministry at Vienna proved obstinate, and the empress-regent of the Austrian dominion sent prince Eugene to the court of London, in hopes that the presence of this hero, and the strength of his arguments, might have some weight with the queen, and animate the people against the intended pacification with Lewis. Eugene was received with all the respect due to his merit and quality. He had conferences with the ministry; he was admitted to an audience of the queen; but all his endeavours proved fruitless: the arguments of the court of Vienna were no longer in behalf of the balance of power in Europe: her interest was changed, and so were the maxims of the court of London.

The electoral college assem-
bles.

MEAN time the elector of Mentz convoked the diet for the election of an emperor, at Frankfort. Letters were addressed to the electors of Triers, Saxony, Palatine, Brandenburg, Bohemia, and Hanover; but those of Bavaria and Cologne were not invited, because of their late proscription. The elector of Saxony certified to the archduke the settling of the diet, and he replied, that he entrusted all his affairs to the empress his mother. That princess had already made application to king Augustus, for his interest in procuring a seat for her ambassadors in the electoral diet, as sovereign of Bohemia; but she was answered, that her powers were insufficient, and the ambassadors instructions must be signed by the archduke. This reply they founded upon a fundamental maxim of the imperial constitution, that the electoral dignity was an office purely masculine, and incapable of descending to the female line; therefore a regent could not exercise the full powers. However, the empress, disappointed in this application, did not despair of succeeding with the electors. She endeavoured especially to gain the elector Palatine, as he owed particular obligations to the emperor Joseph; but here too she failed; for the elector replied, that her request was diametrically opposite to the constitution, which he in a particular manner, as vicar-general, was bound to preserve. Perceiving that the a electors were inflexible, the court of Vienna acquainted the archduke of what passed, and he confirmed, as king of Bohemia, the instructions given to the ambassadors.

b Now the electors of Cologne and Bavaria hoped for a favourable turn in their affairs, as their proscription was entirely an act of the late emperor, without ever consulting the Germanic body. Many of the princes had resented this exertion of power, and complained that the sentence passed upon them was illegal, and a violation of their privileges. Finding, however, that their names were omitted by the elector of Mentz as arch-chancellor, they entered a protest against the decree, whereby they were proscribed, and the election of the prince chosen king of the Romans. When this protest was published, the elector of Bavaria resided at Namur, in quality of sovereign of the Nether- lands, which were ceded by Philip V. on condition that he was placed on the throne of the Spanish monarchy. As to the archbishop of Cologne, he resided at Valenciennes, in a splendor not usual with a fugitive prince, and liberally supported by the court of France. It was believed that large sums of money were employed, in gaining over the ministers of the electoral princes; but the event shewed either the falsity of the report, or the misapplication of the money. No regard was paid to the remonstrances of either of the proscribed electors, and they were reduced to the necessity of protesting against all the proceedings of the diet.

c THE first business of the diet was to examine the powers of the several ambassadors, who represented the absent electors. Then they proceeded to regulate the ceremonial, to obviate the protests of the two proscribed electors, to satisfy the complaints made by the imperial states, concerning the imperial capitulations; and lastly, to answer the remonstrances sent by the diet at Ratisbon upon the necessity of forming a perpetual capitulation, whereby the privileges and liberties of the Germanic body might be secured and protected against all injustice. This last article had repeatedly been examined at former diets, and the electors had agreed with the other members of the empire upon a perpetual capitulation. However, as it was impossible to provide expressly against all instances in which the emperors might abuse their authority, the electors claimed a right of enlarging, retrenching, or altering the form, as they found necessary according to circumstances. Now the other members of the Germanic body presented certain articles, d which they desired might be inserted; but as the electors would only admit of some of the articles, the other members protested against the whole capitulation. They complained of the conduct of the electors, pretending that they violated the rights of the Germanic constitution, by declaring that the emperor's will, and the consent of the electoral college, were sufficient authority for declaring war, concluding peace, or forming alliances. They admitted, that when the diet sat but a few months, there might happen certain conjunctures, where it would be dangerous to wait for the consent of the states; but this could never be the case, while the diet constantly met, as was now become a necessary part of the constitution. These reasons could not persuade the electors, who unanimously agreed in their former resolution, provided they acted in nothing contrary to e the Golden Bull, the treaties of Munster and Osnabrug, and other constitutions of the empire.

ANOTHER article which gave great offence was, that the electors had stipulated with the emperor, that their ambassadors should take place in the diet of all the other German princes; a clause which piqued the pride of the antient families, who looked upon themselves in all respects upon a footing with the electors. To satisfy them this article was explained, the electors declaring that it only respected those persons lately raised to the dignity of princes, who acted in certain employments at the imperial court.

f THE next business of the diet, was to examine the protests entered by the proscribed electors. Most of the states were of opinion, that the suffrages of the princes would be without effect, and the validity of their proscription left to be determined by the diet at Ratisbon. But the Brandenburg ambassador insisted, that these electors being closely allied to France against the empire, had thereby violated their oath of fidelity, whence they forfeited the right of electors. He even advised that their vacancies might immediately be filled; but this proposal was reputed rash and precipitate.

C H A R L E S VI.

g THEY now proceeded to the election of an emperor. It was for some time whispered, that the electoral prince of Poland, who resided with great splendor at Frankfort, had an eye to the imperial throne. His noble air, obliging address, liberality, generosity, and magnificence, rendered him extremely popular. He was visited by the electors during the session of the diet, and treated with all the distinction due to his high birth.

birth and merit. Their conduct strengthened the report, and it was really believed that the king of Poland his father had already secured the interest of England, Prussia, several states of the empire, the czar of Muscovy, and the king of Denmark. The eyes of Europe were all fixed upon this prince, when it suddenly appeared that amusement was his sole motive for residing at Frankfort. The day of election was fixed, and the archduke Charles was unanimously chosen emperor and king of the Romans, on the twelfth day of October. Besides the birth and merit of this young prince, the electoral college had political reasons for giving him the preference. His powerful hereditary dominions rendered him the most natural protector of the empire, and the strongest barrier against the attacks of the Turks on the one hand, and of the French king on the other. The empire, said the archbishop of Mentz, is a wife of high family without a fortune. She must be maintained at great expence, and only the revenues of the house of Austria are adequate to the support of the dignity. Already Charles possessed the kingdoms of Hungary, Bohemia, the duchies of Austria, Silesia, the provinces of Carinthia, Suabia, together with the other estates of his family in Germany. It was by no means the intention of the electoral college to re-unite the Spanish monarchy to the imperial diadem, and his vast hereditary possessions, which would have rendered Charles VI. more powerful than Charles V. who was enabled to aspire at universal monarchy. It was sufficient for their purposes, that he succeeded to his father's estates and dignities, which would render the balance pretty equal between the houses of Austria and Bourbon. In fact, if the apprehension of seeing the crowns of France and Spain united on the same head, had occasioned a bloody war in Europe, what could have been expected from the re-union of the imperial diadem, the Spanish monarchy, the crowns of Hungary and Bohemia, and the vast possessions of the Austrian family?

the councils at Vienna.

THE Germanic body had for ten years supported the claim of the house of Austria to the Spanish monarchy. Now all were in expectation that the death of the emperor Joseph, and the elevation of the archduke to the imperial dignity, would pave the way to a general pacification, especially as England had withdrawn herself from the alliance. But Charles had other sentiments: he was governed by an ambitious ministry, who found their interest in continuing the war, persuaded him it was for his honour, and animated him to prosecute his claim to Spain with redoubled vigour. He resigned himself wholly to the management of the prince Lichtenstein, and the count Heberstein; and from their counsels arose all his objections to peace. In his heart he chimed in with the sentiments of the empress-regent, who powerfully seconded the pacific intentions of the queen of England. But the dictates of his own mind, the respect for his mother, and the voice of all Germany, were suppressed by motives of ambition, and the lustre of such a jewel as the Spanish crown, glittering in the eyes of a young monarch. Besides, his counsellors had so strongly inculcated the legitimacy of his claim, that he believed he could not renounce it, without injustice to his posterity. This alone appeared a sufficient reason for continuing the war; but he could not flatter himself with success, without the liberal assistance of his allies, whose maxims since his accession to the imperial throne appeared wholly changed. From the steps already taken by the allies, it was plain they determined to accommodate matters with Lewis, and take the lead in the negotiations for peace, in the same manner they had done in the operations for war. Charles wanted their assistance, but he would not suffer them to be judges of his right. It was with this view he insisted upon the preliminaries given in at Gertruydenberg, and sought on those terms the alliance of England and Holland, in support of his claim to the Spanish monarchy; while at the same time he wrote to the elector of Mentz, to use his influence with the diet to prevent their taking any measures contrary to his interest and intention.

The emperor sets out for Germany.

ON the first notification of his election, the emperor took ship from Barcelona, and arrived at the port of Vado, where he staid on board for several days, expecting the Genoise would send ambassadors to compliment him on his accession to the imperial diadem and crown of Spain. In this he was disappointed, and the senate explained to his ministers their motives for refusing him the latter title. At length he landed; and passing through the territories of the republic without halting, he had an interview with the duke of Savoy, near Pavia. Here the duke enumerated the services he had performed to the house of Austria, to the prejudice of his own interest: he conjured the emperor to fulfil the treaty of 1703, and the imperial decree of 1707, by which Montferrat, Valencia, Alexandria, and other places, were ceded to the house of Savoy. Charles promised all that was required, and likewise to add some other places, as soon as he had concluded peace with France.

a WHEN the conference broke up, Charles set out for Milan, where, according to some writers, he received the first advice of his election. Now he received the congratulations of all the Italian powers, which at last induced the republic of Genoa to compliment him with the title of king of Spain. In his journey to Germany he received the homage and oaths of the states of the Tyrolse; and next day he appointed forty-five counsellors, to form different boards at Vicnna, for the examination of all important affairs. Finding he was so far advanced on his way to the empire, the electoral college hastened to conclude all the forms previous to his coronation, which they imagined would give weight to his negotiations; and on the nineteenth of December, Charles entered Frankfort.

b THE day after his arrival, he swore to observe the imperial capitulation, in the manner it was proposed by the electors. The diet thought they should, in consequence of the articles they inserted, be restored to all the privileges of which they were deprived by the late emperor; but the manner destroyed the intention of their allegations, as plainly appears by consulting the capitulation (A). Here he promised to promote the felicity and aggrandisement of the empire; to take no measures for rendering the imperial crown hereditary in his family; to observe, in matters of religion, the ordinance framed at Mecklenburgh, the regulations of the diets, and the treaties of Augsburg, Munster, and Osnabrug; to consider the electors as the dearest and most important members of the Germanic body; to consult them, and be directed by their advice, in all affairs of importance; to preserve them in all their rights and privileges; to call upon them at all diets and councils assembled on the affairs of the empire; to raise no troops, erect no fortifications, or demolish no public works, without the consent of the Germanic body; to contract no alliances without the unanimous consent of the electors; to direct all his treaties and connections to the general good of the empire; but to give full liberty to the princes of the empire to form what alliances, and contract such engagements as they thought proper, provided they had no tendency to the prejudice of the emperor, or the Germanic body. In the tenth and eleventh articles it was stipulated, that the emperor should confiscate no estates, should proscribe no members, or seize upon fiefs, but with the concurrence of the Germanic body. He farther engaged to assemble, at least every ten years, a general diet, to which all the princes of the empire might carry their grievances; to leave the imperial chamber the free exercise of its ancient jurisdiction; to restore to all the princes, prelates, and members of the empire, whatever had been violently extorted from them; to admit none but persons of approved probity, and natives of Germany, into the council; and to bestow all the principal employments on high-born subjects of the empire.

The capitulation signed by the emperor.

c BESIDES these, and a variety of other less important articles, it was added, that notwithstanding this capitulation should be perpetual on the side of his imperial majesty, the electoral college should, on proceeding to a new election, be at liberty to make additions and alterations, provided they did not counteract the intentions of the Golden Bull, in any of the articles essential to the Germanic constitution. Moreover, a clause was super-added, that the college should never proceed to the election of another emperor, during the life of the present, except in the following cases:—When the emperor should fix his residence out of Germany, or make too long a stay out of the imperial dominions. In these instances the emperor might be regarded as dead, and the electoral college would be justified in proceeding to a new election.

d FROM a number of articles, which we have not specified, it appeared that the electors by no means approved of the conduct of Leopold and Joseph, with respect to France, and the electors of Cologne and Bavaria; that they were desirous of preventing any future evils of the same nature; that they condemned the excessive complaisance paid to the will of the two late emperors, to the prejudice of the rights and liberties of the Germanic body; and that they resolved to limit the imperial authority within certain boundaries. On the twenty-ninth of December the ceremony of the coronation was performed with great magnificence, and several gold medals were distributed among the electors, the princes of the empire, and the foreign ambassadors, who attended. Charles then received the homage of the inhabitants of Frankfort, and set out immediately to Vienna.

He is crowned at Frankfort.

e BY this time the queen of England had acquainted her parliament with her pacific intentions, and obtained their consent to the preliminaries. Holland was likewise upon the eve of concluding a separate treaty with France; and Charles saw himself under the neces-

It was another objection to the capitulation, that it was disapproved by divers persons of the Germanic body, who protested against it, and indeed against the proceedings of the diet (1).

Affairs of

sity of supporting a war against France and Spain, or of accepting the terms offered by Lewis. As the disturbances in Hungary necessarily divided his forces, the empress-regent had before his arrival determined to give some satisfaction to the malcontents. The emperor Joseph had, just before his death, appointed conferences at Debrazien; and the Hungarian nobility demanded, as preliminaries, the abolition of the articles of Presburgh, whereby the crown was made hereditary in the house of Austria; the reformation of all the imperial decrees relative to the affairs of Hungary; and full restitution of the liberties, prerogatives, and ancient laws of the kingdom; and security, that the subsequent treaty should be better observed than any of the preceding. It was the advice of the count de Palfi, and all the disinterested honest nobility about the court, that the demands of the Hungarians should be gratified. They represented, that driving the malcontents to despair, was the sure method of obliging them to throw themselves into the arms of the Grand Signior, who would joyfully embrace any conditions. The king of Sweden's complaint of the disregard paid to the treaty with him was well known; and it was not improbable, if that monarch could obtain an army from the Porte, but he would revenge himself on the empire, by protecting the Hungarians<sup>a</sup>.

THOUGH these arguments were equally just and obvious, they produced no effect. The ministry were actuated by private views of interest: they would lose the immense wealth in prospect, arising from the confiscated estates of the rebels, if matters were accommodated; they therefore insinuated, that the concessions required would prove injurious to the emperor's honour; that subjects, who had taken arms against their sovereign, were unworthy of his clemency; that lenity towards rebels would only encourage sedition in the other provinces; that the danger apprehended from the Turks, and king of Sweden, were merely ideal; that these two powers were sufficiently employed in supporting a war against Russia, Poland, Denmark, and Saxony, without searching for more enemies; and, upon the whole, that it would be time enough to treat with the rebels when the instructions of the Turkish ambassador, now arrived at court, should be known.

THE aga obtained an audience of prince Eugene. He told him, he was sent to assure the imperial court of the friendship and affection of the Grand Signior; to acquaint the emperor, that his highness had declared war against the czar of Muscovy, for reasons known to the whole world: but that, with respect to the empire, he would scrupulously observe the treaty of Carlowitz. The same he requested of the emperor. No great stress, however, could be laid on such general promises, which afforded suspicion they were intended as a blind to screen some secret design, as a fairer opportunity could not have happened for taking the Hungarians under the protection of the Porte. These were the sentiments of the empress-regent, who laboured, in conjunction with count Palfi, to procure at least a cessation of hostilities. At last, in despite of all the intrigues of the ministry, they carried their point. An amnesty was signed at Zathmar, and afterwards ratified by several of the Hungarian nobility. This treaty imported, that prince Ragotski should have full pardon, and restitution of all his estates, provided, in three weeks, he took an oath of fidelity to the emperor, as king of Hungary; that, if he chose it, he should have liberty to retire to Poland; that religion should be maintained on the footing established by law; that the people should have the liberty of representing their grievances to the diet; and that, if prince Ragotski did not embrace the amnesty within the time limited, all the rest of the nobility should be intitled to the advantages specified in the treaty.

End of the rebellion in Hungary.

THE treaty was signed by count Caroli, without the participation or authority of Ragotski, and the other nobility; they therefore disavowed his conduct by a solemn act, dispersed in all the palatinates of Hungary: however, they were unable, for want of troops, to enter upon action, as twenty-two Hungarian regiments had, immediately after signing the treaty, taken an oath of fidelity to the emperor. Several fortresses belonging to Ragotski likewise surrendered; and Mongatz, after sustaining a blockade for six weeks, at length opened her gates to the Imperialists. Ragotski, without money, without troops, friends, or a retreat, wandered a vagrant round Poland for some time; whence he passed into France, and then to England, to enjoy the blessings of freedom and philosophical security. Many of the other Hungarian nobility repaired to the little court at Bender. And in this manner ended the revolt in Hungary, which might have produced fatal consequences to the house of Austria, had the projects of the elector of Bavaria proved less unfortunate<sup>b</sup>.

a Now all the views of the court of Vienna centered in the vigorous prosecution of the war against France. Prince Eugene was the soul of the imperial councils, and peace was equally opposite to his interest and inclinations. His negotiation in England, however, produced nothing. The queen and her minister, the lord Oxford, were inflexibly bent on peace, and the disgrace of the duke of Marlborough. In the conference with lord Oxford, the prince demanded in general, that the queen would not detach herself from the interests of the house of Austria, and her engagements to her allies; and the English minister replied, that her majesty had already furnished her plenipotentiaries at Utrecht with the necessary instructions: that Utrecht, and not London, was the place appointed for adjusting the interests of the empire and Great Britain. By this answer, he thought to embarrass prince Eugene, and prevent his solicitations, though it did not succeed; for he so repeatedly pressed his request, that a conference was granted, and Mr. secretary St. John, afterwards lord viscount Bolingbroke, appointed to canvass the subject with the imperial minister. Eugene demanded that some expedient should be found, by which the emperor might send ambassadors to Utrecht; yet was this contrary to the emperor's former declaration, that he would send no plenipotentiaries to any congress which should be held in that city. Not satisfied with Mr. St. John's answer, he continued to press memorials upon the court, in which he magnified the vast efforts made by the house of Austria in the common cause; notwithstanding, he said, the revolt in Hungary, she constantly maintained great armies in Italy, on the Rhine, in Spain, and the Netherlands: now, being eased from the burthen of that civil war, his imperial majesty had given orders for augmenting all his forces, in the places above specified, to an hundred and three thousand effective men, exclusive of garrisons, and the army destined for the defence of Bavaria. He requested her majesty to consider that the season was far advanced; that no preparations were made for opening the campaign; that, whether war or peace was preferred, there was not a moment to lose; since, in the latter case, the good disposition of the allies would procure more advantageous terms; and, in the former, early preparations insure success; that the states-general had determined to send to Spain the four battalions promised the preceding year, where the emperor would maintain an army of thirty thousand men; that of the expences of the Spanish war, amounting this year to four millions of crowns, his imperial majesty was willing to pay a fourth, in order to render the burthen easier to England; that with the vigorous assistance of the maritime powers, the war might be brought to a speedy issue, perhaps during the session of the congress; the prince concluding his memorial with beseeching Mr. secretary St. John to obtain him a speedy answer.

As prince Eugene found, by the indirect answers of the English ministry, that all his endeavours to prevail on the queen to resume the war would prove fruitless, he took his leave, and set out for the Hague, where he conferred with the pensioner Heinsius, and the chief members of the republic. While he was here, the counts Zinzendorf and Conisburg arrived in quality of plenipotentiaries from his imperial majesty, with whom, and the deputies of the other allies, the prince held a variety of consultations on the operations of the ensuing campaign; or, if peace was the object, what terms should be demanded of Lewis. The emperor required that France should be stripped of all her acquisitions since the treaty of Munster; that she should restore to the duke of Lorraine all that Charles IV. had ceded, and absolve him from the oath of fidelity and homage; that the emperor should be put in possession of the intire Spanish monarchy, except what was granted by treaty to Portugal, and the other allied powers. To this was subjoined, that his imperial majesty would have no objection to treat with the French plenipotentiaries, provided such conditions were offered, as by alteration, addition, and modification, might in the end amount to his demands. While the emperor persisted in the resolution of making these demands the basis of a treaty, it was impossible the negotiations could advance, especially as all the other allies had their particular demands. Those of the Dutch were high; nothing less than the cession of the Spanish Netherlands, and a variety of towns to be yielded in perpetuity. Portugal demanded all those cities, towns, villages, districts, and lands in Europe and America, promised by the emperor Leopold to Peter II. and the intire property of Cape Nord, situated between the river of Amazons and that of Vincent Pinsen. The elector of Brandenburg demanded that France would acknowledge him as king of Prussia, cede to him the principality of Orange, with all the lands, chattels, and effects belonging to the house of Chalon-Orange and Chatél-Belin, to which he was legitimate heir. He also insisted upon the sovereignty of Newchatel and Völingen, and the city of Guedres. The elector of Triers insisted upon restitution of his capital, and the other towns of which he had been despoiled before and since the treaty of Munster. The elector Palatine desired to be maintained in possession of the Palatinate, and the county of Chamb; to have restitution of the places taken by France during the war. The circles, that all the places ceded by the treaty of Münster, and other subsequent treaties, should be restored. The duke of Württemberg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the bishop of Paderborn, put in their claims, and all had their particular demands: besides, prince Ragotski and the duke of Lorraine represented how much it was for the interest of all Europe, that they should be restored to their dignities and possessions.

NEVER, upon any occasion, was beheld such a number of memorials: it appeared as if nothing more was wanting than to ask and obtain; and it may be safely affirmed, that all the several demands seemed calculated rather to prolong the war than to obtain peace, the professed object of their pursuits. The duke of Savoy made large demands; and the queen of Great Britain, though the most inveterate as well as formidable enemy of France, was not without her pretensions, some of which proved extremely irksome to Lewis; particularly the cession she required of cautionary towns in America. Upon the whole, however, France might have complied with every thing required, had the emperor and states-general been less exorbitant in their demands, which had all the appearance of a design to insult misfortune, and triumph over the low condition to which the grand monarch was reduced. Had they intended to destroy the French monarchy, and divide the spoils, they could not have dictated in a more arbitrary manner; but they ought to have considered, that re-uniting Spain and the Indies to the Austrian dominions was no longer the design of the principal of the allies, who thought the emperor already sufficiently potent; and that now their high demands answered no other purpose than shewing how important England was to the confederacy, and how unequal, without her, they were to extort their pretensions. The Imperial ministers expatiated upon the moderation of the emperor; but in France and England it was said, that no branch of the house of Austria was ever void of ambition. This family had always grasped at power, and, wherever they gained a superiority, exerted it with a high hand; as was visible in the conduct of the late emperor, with respect to the Italian states, and of the present prince's insolent demands<sup>a</sup>. With respect to bestowing the Spanish monarchy on Charles, the danger was evident: as to giving it to Philip, it was only possible. In the former case, the ballance of power must necessarily be destroyed; in the latter, it was improbable it ever should, as Philip had now but a distant prospect of ever succeeding to the crown of France. These were the sentiments of the English parliament, when the congress was first opened at Utrecht.

Difficulties to the negotiations
at Utrecht.

BEFORE the congress had regulated all the formalities, the bishop of Bristol made a laboured speech, demonstrating the expediency of abridging the negotiations; which was seconded by the abbé Polignac, in that elegant and masterly style for which he was so eminently distinguished. It was proposed to fix the day for concluding the treaty, on the same footing settled before the opening of the congress; but the Dutch deputies desired time to acquaint the states-general with the proposition. A courier was dispatched to the Hague, and their high mightinesses did not appear averse to the proposal, before they had conferred with the imperial minister. Count Zinzendorf assembled at his lodgings all the ambassadors of the empire, to whom he communicated the proposition made by the bishop of Bristol, and the abbé Polignac. Those who wished to see peace established consented to it without hesitation; but the others opposed it vehemently, under pretence of scrupulously examining the several interests of the allied powers: their real motive was to raise difficulties, which might retard or break off the negotiations. Notwithstanding this, Zinzendorf made a speech in the congress, filled with the strongest assurances of his imperial majesty's sincere intentions to cultivate peace; but contradicted his professions by his demands. In answer to the claims of the emperor, the French monarch offered to oblige his grandson to renounce all pretensions to the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, and the duchy of Milan, provided the archduke would desist from his pretensions to the Spanish monarchy. The other articles implied, that, with respect to the empire, the frontiers on the Rhine should be put in the same condition as before the war; that the electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be restored to their dominions and honours; and that the most Christian king should resume all the titles he possessed in Germany at the treaty of Ryswick. The plenipotentiaries of the allies sent the French propositions to their several courts; and, upon receiving an answer, count Zinzendorf gave in a memorial, which he called the specific demands of his master, and desired an answer in writing, in hopes of raising some difficulty to the negotiation. Of this the court of Versailles was aware, and therefore adhered to the former propositions, without the trouble of replying to the specific demands. Zinzendorf waited with impatience for the expected answer, and was at last told by the marechal d'Uxelles, that as they had reciprocally exchanged propositions, that was sufficient foundation for entering upon the negotiation, without the formality of written a replies, which would only excite disputes, and spin out the conferences. Zinzendorf, fired at the disappointment, answered, that if the negotiation did not take a more favourable turn, he was determined to withdraw from the congress. He soon kept his word, and had the address to draw off with him the other allied plenipotentiaries; but still the French ministers adhered to their first resolution. The dispute was of more consequence than it might at first appear. It was the business of Zinzendorf to ensnare and puzzle; plainness and perspicuity were equally the interest of Lewis, who had ardently wished for a general pacification. He desired to treat civilly the allies in general; but the emperor and Dutch insisted upon a separate discussion of their several claims.

b MEANTIME the English and French ministers exchanged visits, which gave great offence to Zinzendorf and the Dutch deputies. They held consultations on their side, and omitted nothing in their power to frustrate the effects of the congress. But their final resolution was to push the war with vigour, in hopes of obtaining some signal advantage; which would induce the queen of England to break off her engagements to Lewis, and leave France to her destiny. As for the Dutch, they set no bounds to their pretensions; these they left to be determined by the sword. The rigorous rights of conquest they regarded as legitimate, and they resolved to consolidate with their republic whatever they should be able to wrest violently from the French king. With this view they took their measures for opening the campaign. Prince Eugene seconded their designs with all his ability, and made several motions to frustrate the effects of the enemy's activity and superiority. The earl of Albemarle, at the head of the Dutch forces, had orders to burn the vast magazines formed at Arras; however, he was prevented in his designs by the vigilance of marechal Villars.

d HAPPILY for France, the suspension of arms with England was now signed; but as they had agreed to keep the transaction a profound secret until the campaign opened, the queen was under the necessity of joining her forces to the allied army. It was generally believed, that, tired out with the clamours of her allies, and the obstructions to a general peace, she had resolved upon the vigorous prosecution of the war, than which nothing was more remote from her intentions. Eugene, more penetrating and sagacious than the rest, entertained suspicions. He discovered something mysterious in the conduct of the English, and wanted the opportunity of an interview with the duke of Ormond. The allies passed the Scheld, and encamped opposite to the enemy. Eugene held several councils of war, and proposed blending the troops in the British pay with the Austrians; but the English general declared, that he would command in person all the forces entrusted to his care by the queen his mistress. In another council it was proposed to attack M. Villars; but the duke of Ormond produced his orders not to act offensively. This immediately discovered the views of England, and made the imperial and Dutch generals declare they would prosecute the war without the queen's concurrence, and demonstrate to her, that England was of less consequence to the alliance than she imagined. Her majesty, they said, was mistaken, if she proposed setting bounds to their conquests, and e dictating their conduct.

f IN consequence, they undertook the siege of Quesnoi, which was invested by general Fagel; and two days after the trenches were opened, the duke of Ormond demanded a conference with prince Eugene and the Dutch deputies. Here he acquainted them with his orders to publish a general armistice for two months in his army, and exhorted them to embrace the same measures. They demanded time to transmit the proposal to Vienna and the Hague, and the duke granted eight days for this purpose. During this time, he proposed to the foreign generals in the English pay, to follow the example of his forces, under pain of forfeiting their pay and arrears. They likewise desired time to deliberate on the proposal, and a few days after they separated from the English, declaring their resolution to support the emperor in the prosecution of the war. Only one battalion and four squadrons of the Holstein troops, under general Walef, remained with the duke of Ormond. Their conduct extremely embarrassed the English ministry, who now poured out reproaches and menaces; Mr. secretary St. John declared, that the queen would regard their refusal as an open rupture; however, they still persisted*. The allies take Quesnoi.

g WHILE mutual recriminations passed between the English and the auxiliaries in the pay of Great Britain, the duke of Ormond withdrew his army; and, assured of the evacuation of Dunkirk, took possession of that important town and harbour. The Dutch beheld with jealousy the motion of the English forces towards their frontiers, and they saw no remedy but entering into the same pacific measures. However, the siege of Quesnoi was pushed with vigour. The besiegers having got possession of the counterscarp, were preparing to give the assault, when the garrison beat a parley, and surrendered at discretion.

* Journ. Histor. sub hos Ann.

WHILE Quesnoi engaged the chief attention of the allies, they sent a detachment of cavalry, accompanied with a great number of volunteers, to make an irruption into the very bowels of France. It is inconceivable the consternation which so inconsiderable a force spread; from the terror that appeared in every countenance, and the panic which seized the whole French nation, one would have imagined that the whole confederate army was at the gates of Paris. After all, this detachment returned without performing any thing memorable; their whole pursuit was plunder, in which they succeeded. Now the allies entered upon more vigorous measures; they invested Landreci, and the direction of the siege was committed to the prince of Anhalt-Dessau, general of the Prussian forces. Thirty-four battalions and thirty squadrons invested the place, while prince Eugene with the remainder of the army covered the siege, and neglected nothing to insure success. He fortified his camp, and so ranged his forces, that it seemed impossible to relieve the garrison. Villars, on the other hand, was no less vigilant for the protection of a town, the possession of which would open the enemy a passage into Champagne and Picardy. He resolved to force the posts which covered the navigation of the Scarpe and the Scheld, and to attack the enemy's lines at Denain, in which he succeeded by an admirable stratagem, and thereby fixed the return of the epoch of good fortune, after it had long been unpropitious to the arms of Lewis. Whatever merit we must allow prince Eugene, it was obvious from this single transaction, that he was no longer assisted by the counsels of Marlborough.

M. Villars recovers all the conquests made by the allies.

MARECHAL Villars next invested Marchienne, where the enemy had formed their magazines: on his first presenting himself, he summoned the governor to surrender; threatening, in case of refusal, with putting him to the sword. The governor, having four thousand men under his command, despised his menaces; but was forced to surrender prisoner of war in the space of four days after the trenches were opened. The loss of Marchienne determined the fate of Landreci; prince Eugene, deprived of his magazines, and the communication by water with Antwerp and Tournay, was forced to relinquish the enterprize, in a manner that enabled the French general to form enterprizes which otherwise would have been impracticable. Hempesch, governor of Douai, hearing of the fate of Denain and Marchienne, made no doubt but he would soon be besieged. To make the most vigorous resistance his situation would admit, he recalled all his detachments, and strengthened his garrison with three battalions drawn from Lisse and Bethune. He was invested on the eighth of August; and notwithstanding the most vigorous defence, the number of the garrison, the strength of the place, and the endeavours of prince Eugene to relieve the besieged, they were forced to surrender by the eighth of September, prisoners of war. Upon these reiterated disgraces prince Eugene assembled a council of war, where the chief officers advised occupying the plain of Queverain, and forming the siege of Mauberge, in case M. Villars entertained designs against Bouchaine or Quesnoi, in which the Imperialists had formed magazines, to repair the late disaster at Marchienne. This opinion was embraced, and the prince of Hesse detached before, to prepare the way for the army. Villars discovered the intention of the allies, and took measures for anticipating their design. He advanced a large body of troops, who took possession of Queverain, before the allies had scarce crossed the Scheld. At the same time he blocked up Quesnoi so closely, as rendered it impossible for prince Eugene to withdraw his artillery, and great magazines of stores and ammunition. He then invested the place, and kept up so incessant a fire from his batteries, that Ivay, a French refugee, raised to the rank of major-general, and made governor, surrendered upon honourable conditions. Thus fell the imperial artillery and magazines into the hands of the enemy, which produced more real advantage to Villars, than if he had gained a battle.

IN every attempt this great general, the pride of the empire, the terror of the Turks, and the saviour of Italy, was foiled by the French marechal, who lost no occasion of profiting by his superiority. Besides obliging prince Eugene to evacuate his camp at Malplaquet, to retire between the Sambre and the Haisne; besides forcing the garrison of fort Knoques, he now formed the siege of Bouchaine, the reduction of which place had made a considerable addition to the laurels of the victorious Marlborough. It was at this time defended by the celebrated Grovestein, and invested by the marechal in the beginning of October. A fortnight after the trenches were opened it surrendered, notwithstanding the most spirited resistance; and thus Villars recovered all the conquests made by the allies in three successive campaigns. With these expeditions the armies separated, and retired to winter-quarters; upon which Villars, loaded with glory, repaired to court, where he was received with that peculiar regard due to his merit, and to a general who had first stemmed the torrent of misfortune, and retrieved the honour of Lewis.

- a PRINCE Eugene set out for the Hague to concert the operations of the ensuing campaign with the Hollanders, and the means of repairing the late disgraces sustained by the allies. He held several conferences with count Zinzendorf on the subject of the Spanish Netherlands, of which the emperor conceived a violent desire of being in possession. This measure the Dutch opposed, because the conquest of these provinces was made chiefly at their expence. They could not, they affirmed, assent to the emperor's pretensions before the barrier granted by the emperors Joseph and Leopold was confirmed to the republic; besides a part of their expences in the war repaid. They requested the imperial minister to lay their reasons before the emperor, and demonstrate to him that it was his interest to act in concert with the United Provinces, since the least misunderstanding must encrease the misfortunes of the preceding campaign, and turn the scale wholly in favour of their common enemy c.

- MEAN time the emperor Charles assumed the title of king of Hungary, dispensing with the formality of an election, which he regarded as a mere ceremony. He thought his coronation sufficient to vest him with all the authority of his predecessors. He used less ceremony with respect to Bohemia, where he did not think even a coronation necessary to the complete investiture of the sovereignty. In the month of April the states of Hungary assembled at Presburg, to deliberate on the oath which should be tendered the new monarch; and here prince Ragotski and count Bereccini entered a protest against the validity of the coronation. The court of Vienna was immediately informed of this proceeding; but Charles, disregarding it, set out for Presburg, where he was solemnly crowned, after he had taken the same oath as the emperor Joseph, and given the strongest promises to preserve the liberties of the people inviolable. The public rejoicings on this occasion did not prevent the business of the diet. In this assembly were discussed the grievances and complaints of the nation under the former government: the deputies, among other articles, demanded, that the crown should not be made hereditary in the female line of the house of Austria, in case of failure of male issue; that an irrevocable agreement should pass between the king and the people, which should have all the force of a fundamental law; that the chief employments should be given to the natural-born subjects of the country; and that the confiscated estates, applied by former emperors to gratify the avarice of their ministers, should be restored and annexed to the revenues of the crown of Hungary.

Charles VI.
of Hungary.

- To these demands Charles made vast promises, which he determined never to perform. The Hungarians suspected his sincerity from the readiness with which he complied with all they required; and they expressed their distrust that the court of Vienna would make attempts on their prerogatives. Count Bereccini fomented their jealousy, by reminding them that the ministry of the late emperors arrogated to themselves a power unknown to the states since the foundation of their monarch; that the council at Vienna reversed all the forms of justice, and introduced dangerous maxims, such as, that the will of the prince is supreme arbiter over fortune, liberty, and life; and that the opportunity now offered for recovering the antient privileges of the nation, and re-establishing the true political equilibrium between the king's prerogatives and the people's privileges. These arguments produced the desired effects upon some minds: about six hundred Hungarians appeared in arms, in Upper Hungary; upon advice of which the court of Vienna immediately dispatched two regiments against them, to suppress this first act of rebellion and awe the country. Cardinal Saxa Zeitz, in high esteem even among the Protestants, set out for Presburg, to renew the promises made by the emperor, after which the diet was adjourned.

- FOR carrying on the war against France with greater vigour, the emperor published certain new edicts, which were deemed exceedingly oppressive, in his hereditary dominions. All the proprietors of houses, lands, and other rents, were ordered, in the space of six months, to pay into the treasury one hundredth part of their whole estate, and besides twelve per cent. interest upon the remaining capital. A part of the revenue raised by these taxes was sent to the duke of Wurtemberg, to put the army under his command on the Rhine, in a respectable posture. While this general was forming a plan for forcing the enemy's lines at Weissenberg, levying contributions, and establishing winter-quarters in Alsace, he was diverted from his purpose by a report that he was to send strong detachments to Flanders, to reinforce the garrisons of Landau and Philipsburg, and repass the Rhine with the remainder of his army. His project had all the appearance of succeeding, and he had made several masterly movements to facilitate it, g by perplexing the enemy. M. Harcourt's vigilance, however, was not to be surprised, nor his sagacity outwitted : he took all the necessary measures for the defence of his lines, and effectually frustrated all the duke of Wurtemberg's projects.

In Italy the Imperialists were rather more successful, as they got possession of Porte Hercole ; but in Spain count Staremburg, though delivered by death of his most formidable enemy, the duke de Vendome, performed nothing considerable. Here Philip, from a certainty that peace must soon ensue, ordered his generals to act offensively ; while the French king, on the side of Dauphiny, contented himself with observing the enemy's motions. As for the king of Portugal, he seconded the views of her Britannick majesty, and desired nothing better than the suspension of arms offered<sup>a</sup>.

Affairs of the North.

THE more to embarrass the imperial councils, the affairs of the North seemed to require their attention, as the king of Denmark had formed the resolution of invading the duchy of Bremen. This obliged Steinbock to demand the execution of the treaty of Osnabrug, by which the Germanic body guaranteed Pomerania, now threatened by the Poles and Muscovites, and Bremen, to the king of Sweden. General Crossau used other arguments with the king of Prussia, the elector of Hanover, and duke of Wolfembutte, to induce them to oppose the lighting up a war on their frontiers. He represented the danger of suffering the Russians and Danes to gain a footing in the empire ; and plied this topic with so much address, that they ordered a body of troops to file towards Staden. Stakelberg, who commanded in this place, distributed the German auxiliaries in the outworks ; but scarce had the Danes began working upon their lines of circumvallation, when the Prussians and Hanoverians evacuated their posts, retired into the territories of Hamburg, and there halted for fresh instructions. In consequence, the Danes after a brisk siege reduced Staden, and the Saxons without resistance entered Pomerania. An offer was made by the czar and king of Poland of giving Stetin to his Prussian majesty, in consideration of his assisting them with a train of artillery and ammunition ; which he refused, though the aim of his policy soon after appeared, which was to attain the sequestration of Swedish Pomerania, in hopes soon of acquiring the property. It was soon after this that Steinbock, the Swedish general, burnt the rich town of Altena, which was filled with Danish stores of provision and ammunition, and reduced the inhabitants to the most wretched state of misery and distress. Some writers have endeavoured to excuse this action as arising from accident ; but it is beyond doubt, that Steinbock demanded heavier contributions than the inhabitants were able to pay ; that he gave them notice to remove their effects, and then took this cruel revenge. How far he might be justified by the laws of war for retaliating in this manner the barbarous conduct of his enemies, is what we will not pretend to determine ; certain it is, that Altena had taken no part in the confederacy against Sweden ; the burghers had been forced by the Danes to suffer their town to be made a magazine. Steinbock's proceeding was undoubtedly very impolitic : all Germany exclaimed against the Swedish barbarity, and the violence done to an imperial city.

It was now apprehended that the troubles in the North might be attended with dangerous consequences to the empire ; to prevent which, the princes of the Germanic body assembled at Brunswick, where appeared ambassadors from the emperor, the king of Prussia, the dukes of Hanover and Wolfembutte, the bishop of Munster, and the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. They represented, that in the present situation of affairs they could not provide too diligently for the defence of Lower Germany, and stopping the progress of those violences, the lamentable effects of which had already been felt by the maritime circles. It was then resolved to form an alliance of neutrality, to be ratified by the diet ; to levy an army of twenty thousand men, at the expence of the contracting parties ; and to give the command of this army to prince Eugene, with orders to take post on the Elbe. It was therefore resolved to oblige the belligerent powers to evacuate the frontiers of Germany in the space of three weeks, and to obtain security for repairing the damages they had committed in several provinces of the empire ; or, in case of refusal, to declare them enemies to the Germanic body. It was farther stipulated, that this declaration should be made in the strongest terms to the court of Sweden, and the czar of Muscovy ; that the places held in the duchy of Mecklenburg should be abandoned ; that the towns in Pomerania and the duchy of Bremen should be sequestered in the hands of the emperor ; that the revenues of Bremen should be assigned to his Danish majesty, after the expences of sequestration were deducted ; that the Swedes should not be suffered to return to Poland ; that they should be prevented from garrisoning the towns they possessed in the empire ; that they should be compelled to repass the sea, without being molested by the Muscovites, Poles, or Danes ; that if either of the contending powers should be defeated, then the imperial army should join the a weaker party, and maintain the ballance equal; but that, if the Swedes were joined by any other power, the imperial army should act against them, without admitting general Steinbock's excuses on account of the king his master's absence; that when the empire was evacuated, if the belligerent powers shewed an inclination for peace, the empire and Germanic body might offer their mediation, and propose a congress at Lubec. Such were the conditions of the treaty signed at Brunswick in January A. D. 1713.

b WHILE the princes of the empire were deliberating on the means of securing the tranquillity of the war in Germany, the Swedish general Steinbock was carrying all before him. Without tracing him through operations foreign to our design, it is sufficient, that his progress was so rapid as to oblige the czar to solicit the king of Prussia and elector of Hanover to embrace the league against Sweden. He went in person to the courts of Hanover and Berlin, where he negotiated with so much address as gained some advantage, though he did not succeed in the principal object of his visit to the two German electors. Soon after the king of Prussia died, and the arms of Peter the Great were so successful, that the whole Swedish army surrendered prisoners of war; upon which the Poles and Muscovites returned to Pomerania, while the Danes laid close siege to Tonningen, under a pretence that the duke-administrator of Holstein had violated the neutrality. This obliged the young king of Prussia to declare to the Danes, that, if they persisted in persecuting the duke, he would, in conjunction with his allies, take effectual measures for the protection of the house of Gottorp. By withdrawing his troops, he said, his Danish majesty could only live upon a good footing with the princes of the empire. This steadiness and spirit shook the resolution of Denmark; and the king immediately wrote to the court of Berlin, that he was ready to terminate his differences with the duke of Holstein. He also consented, that, during the negotiation, Tonningen should, for eight days, be supplied with all manner of provision; and that the emperor should nominate a time and place for the sitting of a congress, for a general pacification among the northern powers. In this manner did the resolutions of the assembly at Brunswick, and the steadiness of the king of Prussia, command the respect of his Danish majesty.

d It was otherways with the czar and king of Poland, who at this time were laying siege to Stetin in Pomerania, defended by general Meyerfeld, an officer who joined the fire, the activity of youth, to the experience of forty campaigns. They had begun to batter in breach, when the king of Prussia declared, that he was charged with the sequestration of Pomerania. Augustus of Poland, the king of Denmark, the czar, and the elector of Hanover, all opposed the pretensions of Prussia: they declared they had a just right by treaty to certain places in Pomerania; but the king of Prussia declared, that the sequestration would continue only until a peace was concluded, when Stetin should be restored to Sweden, upon his being reimbursed in the necessary expences of the sequestration. In a word, he acted with so much stability, that a treaty to this purpose was signed, and all the powers withdrew their forces; though the king of Denmark expressed his dissatisfaction at these arbitrary proceedings, and issued orders for seizing all the vessels that entered the ports of Pomerania, without regard to the flags and protections of Poland and Russia. Here too the Prussian monarch acted with his usual address; but with less regard to equity, and the rights of the empire, than he had hitherto demonstrated. He signed a treaty with the Danish minister; the direct tendency of which was to plunder the duke of Holstein, by sequestrating his dominions, until differences were compromised with the ducal family, provided the king of Denmark consented to the sequestration of Pomerania.

f WHILE the emperor and the Germanic body were diligent in composing the disturbances in the North, they seemed totally indifferent to the peace of the empire on the other side. The emperor flattered himself that the French monarch, greatly advanced in years, and broken with incessant care, must soon finish his career; and that his death, and the subsequent minority, would produce a revolution in the affairs of his kingdom, favourable to the empire. Hence arose his obstinacy and insurmountable objections to the propositions offered by Lewis°. On their side, the Dutch seemed rather sedulous to extend the flames of war, than to cherish the blessings of tranquillity. They refused to grant the ambassadors of Cologne and Bavaria passports, in which should be recited the titles of their masters, because these princes, they alledged, had lost the rights of electors, in consequence of their proscription. France retaliated, by raising difficulties about acknowledging Charles VI. in quality of head of the empire. He was elected without the consent of the electors of Cologne and Bavaria, while at the same time the ambassador of Hanover was admitted into the diet, though his right was disputable. These reasons were specious; they seemed to prove the election irregular, and to justify the dissent of the French monarch. On other occasions, the conduct of the diet would have scarce been noticed: at a negotiation the parties endeavoured to profit by every circumstance. The court of France hoped, that, by relaxing in this article, they might be able to obtain other advantages in favour of the proscribed electors in her alliance. It was the earnest desire of Lewis to gain over the Dutch; but the artifices of Zinzendorf, and the influence of Eugene, raised a thousand difficulties.

The duke of Savoy accedes to the treaty of Utrecht.

Now, however, the duke of Savoy began to express less attachment to the house of Austria; whether nature or interest operated with him, is not material. At length his eyes were opened; and, tired with a war in which his friends and enemies equally contributed to his ruin, he beheld in a true light his opposition to his own daughter's elevation, only to support a family celebrated for ambition and ingratitude, of both which his own experience furnished him with instances. He resolved therefore to commit his affairs into the hands of the queen of England, who undertook to mediate his peace with Lewis. That princess laboured to procure for him the crown of Sicily, and the reversion of the Spanish monarchy, in default of male issue of the direct line. Mr. St. John, then lord Bolingbroke, executed a treaty to this purpose, with that peculiar address which acquired him the reputation of the finest gentleman, and the most refined politician, of his country. In consequence, the queen withdrew her fleet and forces from Portugal and Catalonia; a proceeding which greatly cooled the affections of the Dutch to the house of Austria. This republic, invariably steady to her interest, perceived that her strength alone, combined to that of the house of Austria, was insufficient to cope with France and Spain. She became more difficult to the proposals of count Zinzendorf, and plainly indicated an intention of pursuing the footsteps of England, Portugal, and Savoy; for both these last courts acceded to the treaty of Utrecht towards the close of the preceding year. They were possibly confirmed in this resolution by the solemn renunciation of Philip V. of his pretensions to the crown of France, by which was removed all dread of the union of two great monarchies, the apprehension of which had already cost rivers of blood. By a similar act the dukes of Berry and Orleans renounced any right they might have to the Spanish succession. There was now no longer room for clamour against the ambitious designs of Lewis; a circumstance, which, joined to the success of his arms, greatly embarrassed the republic. Still, however, there was a party in the provinces, who strongly urged supporting the house of Austria, and prosecution of the war; but the opposite faction gained ground daily. The province of Holland long declared for pacific measures: this operating with the real interests of the provinces in general, and the influence of the queen of England, at length determined the states-general to drop the emperor's alliance, notwithstanding the warm remonstrances and profuse promises of Zinzendorf. The count represented to their high mightinesses, that the emperor being first in dignity and power of all the allies, they ought chiefly to consult him in the article of peace; that it was greatly to be feared the facility with which Tourney was surrendered, was only a trap to disengage the republic from the protection of the house of Austria, in order, one day, to drive them with the more facility out of the Spanish Netherlands. He observed, that, in the war terminated by the peace of Nimeguen, the emperor and Germanic body had actually snatched the republic out of the jaws of inevitable destruction; in grateful return for which, it was now the duty of the provinces to assist in procuring them some equivalent.

The Dutch
follow his example.

To these arguments, enforced with great warmth in the public assembly of the states, Zinzendorf joined intrigue. He caballed with the elector of Hanover and the duke of Marlborough, and endeavoured to gain their influence with the states-general; but all his art could not succeed. He was answered, that England alone was not detached from the alliance, but the courts of Savoy and Portugal likewise; that now was the time to profit by her Britannic majesty's kind intentions to the republic; that though they could not now obtain all the advantages they proposed, yet there was still enough offered to render peace preferable to a war attended with multiplied disgraces; and that, in hesitating to accept the terms, they might in the end be forced to solicit more disadvantageous conditions.

ZINZENDORF tried all in his power to animate the Dutch, and raise their desponding courage with the hopes of vast succours from the czar of Muscovy, and the kings of Poland and Denmark; but these prospects were too remote to have weight with the republic. She perceived, that, while she waited for northern succours, her provinces might be laid desolate, and her subjects become the victims of ambition and obstinacy: she therefore, at once, determined upon peace under the mediation of England, beginning with signing the barrier and guarantee treaties of succession to the Spanish monarchy.

- a No sooner had the Dutch seriously resolved on a peace with France, than the negotiations of Utrecht assumed a very different aspect. Almost all the clouds raised by jealousy and resentment were immediately dissipated. The republic granted the passports before refused to the plenipotentiaries of the two proscribed electors, and the congress was again opened by the most able set of ministers who ever conducted any negotiation. All practised the utmost refinements of policy; each enforced his master's rights with the most energetic elocution: the abbé Polignac shone in a peculiar manner, and supported, with astonishing fortitude, the fatigue of a tedious negotiation, in which the rights of so many powers were to be adjusted with his master. The specific demands, as they were called, of the different states of the empire, gave abundance of trouble. All the little German princes insisted upon particular treaties, and a separate discussion of their rights; but the perseverance and ability of the plenipotentiaries triumphed over all difficulties.

b Now the deputies of the four associated circles represented to the British ministers, that, by the treaty of Nordlingen, they had embraced the alliance; that they had fulfilled all their engagements, and sustained the enemy's heaviest shocks at their own expence, without demanding subsidies from Great Britain; that, notwithstanding this, her Britannic majesty thought proper to conclude a separate peace, without stipulating a barrier for the circles, or any equivalent for the oppressive expences of the war; that it would be equally for the glory of the queen, the honour of her ministers, the good of the empire, and of Europe in general, that some reparation should be made; and that they expected this, at least, from the queen's goodness and equity. However warmly they urged this request, it was but little regarded. France had now obtained her principal aim: she left the empire destitute of allies, and could, in these circumstances, make her own conditions. But to preserve the appearance of moderation, a memorial relative to the affairs of the empire was drawn up, and given to the earl of Peterborough, with a request he would have it presented to his imperial majesty.

- c WHEN the earl gave in this paper to the emperor, he remarked, that the queen of England had made the utmost efforts to support the house of Austria in Spain, Flanders, Hungary, and Germany. She felicitated herself on having been instrumental in appeasing the disturbances in Hungary, in dispelling the storm that menaced the empire from the North, in assisting to fix the imperial diadem on his head, in procuring him the possession of the Milanese, Naples, and Sardinia, together with several other advantages. He said, that Great Britain, drained of men and money, obliged her majesty to conclude peace; that the conditions were honourable and profitable, and such as his imperial majesty, by accepting, would have added a variety of precious jewels to his crown; that the queen proposed now stipulating for his imperial majesty the best terms which circumstances would admit, and procuring for him the cession of those places possessed by the Spaniards on the frontiers of Tuscany; that the possession of such vast dominions as his imperial majesty enjoyed, could not possibly be secured, except by a solemn treaty, guaranteed by the chief powers in Europe; and that, while the queen had contributed more than any other ally to the advancement of the common cause, in reducing the enemy's ambition within limits, she had room to hope that the confederates would not deny her the glory of giving peace to Christendom, security to every individual, and a just satisfaction of their claims to all the different parties.

d CHARLES resented the high stile in which the English minister spoke of the grandeur of his mistress: he regarded this as an oblique reflection upon himself, and declared, that he would never suffer the queen of England to prescribe laws to the empire; that his pretensions to the Spanish monarchy were too indisputable for him to renounce his claim, or allow the smallest province to be dismembered from it; that he protested against all treaties made to his prejudice; and that, unless the negotiations speedily took a favourable turn, he would recal his plenipotentiaries, oblige the states of the empire to follow his example, and put an end to the congress. The court of Vienna entertained a notion, that the treaty of Utrecht was calculated to ruin the house of Austria; yet all the states of Germany, Protestant and Catholic, so ardently aspired after peace, that the emperor could not destroy their expectations of this blessing, without causing their desertion of his interest. Accordingly, when the imperial reply was related to the French plenipotentiaries, they expressed their uneasiness that Europe was not yet to taste the sweets of liberty: but said, that the emperor's resolution would prove more injurious to himself than to the most Christian king<sup>a</sup>.

- f In fact, the emperor's menaces did not retard the course of the negotiation. After long disputes, it was agreed, that the Imperialists should evacuate Catalonia, and that a neutrality should take place for Italy; that an armistice should be published in Catalonia and Italy; and that, on the day of its publication, the Imperialists should surrender Barcelona, or Tarragona, at their option; that all persons belonging to the court at Barcelona should have liberty to carry off their effects; and that the Imperialists, in general, should be transported by sea on board English vessels; that all prisoners on either side should be released; that an amnesty should be published in Spain, and the utmost influence of the queen of England, and the most Christian king, be exerted to persuade Philip to leave the Catalans in the full possession of their liberties.

Nothing could exceed the spirit of the Catalans on this occasion. They knew they could expect no support; yet they ventured, in defence of liberty, to denounce war against France and Spain. We have elsewhere related the particulars.

Neutrality
signed for Italy.

THE neutrality signed for Italy gave hopes that the emperor would now be disposed to surrender all the acquisitions from the different states, violently made by his two immediate predecessors. Leopold and Joseph had, under colour of the war, seized upon a great number of cities, which they promised to surrender at a peace; but Charles thought himself not bound by their promises. The estates held in Italy and Germany were too considerable to be willingly renounced: he must restore Comacchio to the pontiff, Mantua to the family of Guastalla, Montferrat to the duke of Savoy, Mirandola and the marquisate of Concordia to the legitimate sovereign; and, in Germany, the archbishopric of Cologne and principality of Liege to the prelate-elect, and all the estates of Bavaria to the duke of that name. Justice required, that restitution should be made of all the places we have mentioned; but Lewis thought himself concerned only in what related to his allies. Accordingly he wrote to his ministers at the congress to make the following propositions: that the archbishop-elect of Cologne should be restored to all his estates, effects, dignities, honours, papers, moveables, &c. possessed by him at the commencement of the war: that the same restitution be made to all his domestics and subjects, who have suffered in consequence of their fidelity and attachment: that all foreign troops shall be withdrawn from the city and citadel of Liege, from the citadel of Huy, and the town of Bonn: that the elector of Bavaria shall in the same manner have restitution made of all his estates and dignities, except the Higher Palatinate, and the rank of first secular elect, which shall remain in the house of Palatine, during the lives of the present elect and prince Charles his brother. Moreover, the king demanded, that the house of Bavaria should have the island of Sardinia, to indemnify their loss, during the life of the elector-palatine. He likewise required, that the elector should have an equivalent for his losses, consequent on the infraction of the treaty of Landau. He consented that the Dutch should have garrisons in Namur, Luxemburg, and Charleroi; but insisted, that if these conditions were not accepted within a limited time, he should be at liberty to revoke or alter them at pleasure. It was further proposed, that the treaty of 1697 should be confirmed, as it determined the frontiers of Germany and France. Here the Rhine formed the barrier, and each party was to possess the towns and fortresses on their own side in the manner they thought proper. Lewis promised to acknowledge the emperor in that quality, and to restore Brisack, with all its dependences to the right of the river, reserving for himself all upon the left, including fort Mertier. With respect to the forts round Hunningen, and the bridge of Strasbourg, a variety of separate articles were inserted. To conclude, the king ceded to the emperor the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, except that part already assigned to the duke of Savoy, and the Spanish Netherlands, under certain restrictions.

THESE propositions were signed by the French plenipotentiaries and the bishop of Bristol, who presented them to the imperial minister. Zinzendorf took the alarm at this project, on seeing the house of Austria stripped of the greater part of the Spanish monarchy: he therefore refused signing the articles. He complained of the presumption of giving law to the emperor; and said, that the hand and seal of the English minister had the appearance of an intention to compel his imperial majesty into their measures. Such violent proceedings deprived him, he alledged, of all possibility to conclude a treaty, though his inclinations strongly led him to a pacification. The English minister returned frequently to the charge; but Zinzendorf was inflexible. His conduct was approved at the court of Vienna, where several councils were held upon the subject of the proposals. As they determined to reject them, they were now to cast about for the means of frustrating the general peace, without declaring their intention of continuing the war. For this purpose a truce was proposed, during which each of the parties should enjoy their conquests, without the emperor's renouncing his claim to the Spanish monarchy; a thought which Charles could not support after the treasure, the labour, and the blood spent in this pursuit. The project was relished by most princes of the Germanic body. Under the shadow of this truce they hoped to enjoy repose, and rapidly to regain their former vigour, as the emperor must grant all they required, from the necessity of his affairs, and the assistance they

a they could afford in the prosecution of his claim to the Spanish succession. Charles on his side had many advantages in view : he flattered himself that, before the expiration of the truce, Lewis would sink under the pressure of old age, leaving his crown to a minor, which could not fail of distracting the affairs of the kingdom : then would be the season for making conquests on the Rhine, the Moselle, and even in Spain. The prospect of the elector of Hanover's mounting the throne of Great Britain, in case the queen's death occurred during the cessation of hostilities, was another signal advantage which the emperor figured to himself. In George he doubted not he should find a staunch friend, and a zealous assertor of the imperial dignity, and the rights of the house of Austria : besides, by this truce he should remain in possession of Catalonia, a province the most
b inviolably attached to his person and family. Naples, Mantua, Milan, all the Italian dominions, and the two electorates, would remain in his hands, from the revenues of which he should be able to save a large sum for the prosecution of the war. In a word, the expedient was well imagined ; but it supposed the concurrence of all the other powers concerned, many of whom had a direct interest in opposing proposals which would deprive them of great part of their dominions. Upon this rock it split : all were too much attached to their own interest to pay so extraordinary a compliment to the emperor. In truth, they all agreed only in the resolution of putting their affairs on the best footing possible, and establishing the general repose of Europe. It is rejected.

In pursuance of this scheme, the Dutch tried their influence with count Zinzendorf :
c they urged his consent to the French propositions ; but he answered, that his instructions were to conclude a truce upon the conditions we have specified. After this declaration he absented himself from the congress, and the other powers proceeded to the final conclusion of their several treaties, while the imperial minister had recourse to protests, which he lodged in the town-house of Utrecht. At Vienna, the peace was no less contested than the negotiations were at Utrecht. Libels were published against her Britannic majesty, accusing that princess of breach of engagement with the emperor and Germanic body, and violation of the most sacred treaties. Whether the accusation was justly founded, will appear by consulting the treaty, as inserted in our History of France.

A FEW days after the conclusion of the treaties between France, England, Holland, d Savoy, &c. Zinzendorf quitted Utrecht in disgust, and particularly incensed against the queen of England and the states-general, and leaving count Kirkener to direct the affairs of the imperial court. To this minister some overtures of accommodation were made ; but as he had no instructions, he contented himself with hearkening to them without entering into a negotiation. He held, nevertheless, some conferences with the Bavarian minister, and proposed the marriage of the archduchess with the electoral prince ; by which means the vast possessions of the house of Austria might one day descend to the family of Bavaria ; but the Bavarian minister replied, that his master would be satisfied with the restitution of his dominions and dignities by a solemn treaty*. Finding all hopes of gaining the elector, or obtaining better conditions, vanished, Charles now
e seriously reflected upon the means of pursuing the war ; though the departure of the empress at this time from Catalonia was looked upon as a most impolitic measure, because thereby he seemed to renounce his claim to the Spanish monarchy. Staremborg, however, conducted matters with such dexterity, that the Catalans not only remained firm, but appeared more than ever attached to the house of Austria.

For the more vigorous prosecution of his views, the emperor obtained a million of crowns from the diet at Ratisbon ; besides which, he was promised some millions more, to be paid at certain installments. On the twenty-fourth of May prince Eugene repaired to the camp at Mulberg, behind the lines at Etlingen. He reckoned upon an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men, instead of which he found only forty thousand, f all the circles having been deficient in their quotas. Couriers were dispatched to Vienna and Ratisbon ; and the diet replied, that they had already authorised his imperial majesty to force the circles, by military execution, to comply with their engagements ; and that, attentive to the inclinations of the emperor, they had commissioned the elector of Mentz to borrow of Christiern Koss, and other bankers, the sum wanted, which might be paid out of the arrears of the contingents, and the other revenues of the circles. Such an obstruction as this, in the very beginning of the emperor's pursuit, seemed inauspicious. Eugene, and all men of sense and discernment, formed unfavourable prognostics, especially as this resolution of borrowing money, upon extremely doubtful security, was opposed by several members of the diet, who thought the renewal of the g war contrary to the interest of the Germanic body. They said, that if the issue of the war proved unfortunate, then Suabia and Franconia would fall a prey to the enemy ; and if it was successful, that instead of adding to the emolument of the empire in general, it would only be strengthening the hands of the emperor, raising the power of the house of Austria, and enabling it to trample on the liberties of the Germanic body.

It was now apparent, that the emperor's only resource was a trial of that authority given him by the diet, to enforce their edicts by military execution; but this he foresaw would only expose his own weakness, and increase the number of the discontented. Great as these obstacles were, prince Eugene was not discouraged. After visiting the lines at Etlingen, he took measures for covering the Palatinate, and all the possible precautions for passing the Rhine; but he was obstructed by M. Villars, who was posted between Philipsburg and Landau, to which he proposed laying siege. His march thither filled the empire with terror, and obliged Eugene to exert his utmost abilities to force the marechal to retire; but in this he could not succeed, except by defeating his army, or cutting off his provisions. The one appeared impossible, and the other would prove tedious, especially as the prince was himself greatly strained for forage and provision. While he was meditating the means of extricating the empire, Landau surrendered to the French, and they were now preparing to invest Friburg. Already the marechal had seized upon Keiserlauter, the fort of Manheim, and the citadels of Linenga and Volstein. Eugene perceived that his design was on Friburg, and he endeavoured to put the lines which covered that important town, in a state of defence. However, the marechal forced the lines, and took the city, after an obstinate resistance. His army, indeed, was so much superior, that he carried all before him, and was enabled to execute whatever he attempted.

Several towns surrender to the French.

Rastadt.

THE reduction of Friburg cooled the emperor's ardour, and brought him to reflect on his own inferiority, and the impossibility of prosecuting a claim against two powerful monarchies, in which he could rely only upon the genius of his general, unsupported by men or money. Eugene was now permitted to open a negotiation with M. Villars. He accordingly sent him notice that he was charged with full powers to enter upon conferences at the castle of Rastadt. Here the two generals met on the twenty-seventh of November, and exchanged mutual compliments of admiration and esteem. Such was the secrecy observed in this negotiation, that all the politicians in Europe doubted whether it was successful. The conferences opened with fixing the frontiers of the empire and the French monarchy. Prince Eugene demanded restitution of Landau, Philipsburg, and Friburg, without which, he said, the deputies of the states of the empire must be called, which would greatly protract the negotiation. Villars was too delicate again to offer the same propositions made at Utrecht; but he was unwilling to part with Landau. Philipsburg and Friburg he freely ceded, but Lewis would restore none of his conquests on this side the river Queisch. Next they proceeded to the interests of the proscribed electors, both of whom the emperor readily reinstated in their former dignities and possessions, in hopes of procuring easier terms in other articles; in which, however, he proved mistaken. It is true, the article of repairing the losses sustained by the electors from the retention of their dominions, took up some time; nor was this point clearly settled before the subsequent treaty on the frontiers of Switzerland. On the sixth of February the plenipotentiaries separated, and then it was universally believed that the conferences were broke off; but before this every thing had been adjusted, except one equivocal expression, respecting a town in Italy, which the ministers left to be determined by the courts of Vienna and Verfailles. A few days afterwards the plenipotentiaries again met at Rastadt, and signed the treaty in the manner in which it is inserted in the close of the History of France.

IN this manner was finished a tedious war, in which all Europe was involved, and the empire in particular, as Germany was the most important scene of action. It had continued almost during the reign of three emperors, all of whom seized this opportunity of extending the prerogatives of the imperial diadem. For some years they dictated laws to Italy; they even became arbitrary in the empire. Two electors had been divested of their dignities, and stripped of their dominions by the sole imperial authority, without consulting the Germanic body, who murmured, without presuming to oppose an act so oppressive and destructive of their liberties. In a word, France may in some respects be deemed the deliverer of the empire; had not Lewis continued the war; had he granted reasonable terms at Utrecht, the emperor would have always maintained his superiority, and the privileges of the constitution would have been subjected to the arbitrary decrees of the house of Austria.

O R, Constitution of the Emperor Charles IV.

T O U C H I N G T H E
Elections of Emperors, the Functions of the Electors, and the Succession and Rights of the Princes of the Empire.

Enacted partly at Nuremberg the 10th of January, 1356, and partly at Metz the 25th of December of the same Year.

In the Name of the holy and indivisible Trinity. So be it.

- a CHARLES, by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, and king of Bohemia; to render the memory of the thing perpetual—EVERY kingdom divided against itself will be destroyed; and because its princes have made themselves the companions of thieves, God hath spread among them a spirit of stupidity and giddiness, that they may grope along at noon-day, as if they were in the midst of darkness: he hath taken the candlesticks from the place where they stood, that they might be blind, and leaders of the blind. In effect, those who walk in darkness jostle against each other, and it is in division that the blind of understanding commit such wickedness—Say, Pride! how wouldst thou have reigned in Lucifer, hadst thou not called Dissention to thine aid? Say, envious Satan! how wouldst thou have b expelled Adam from Paradise, if thou hadst not seduced him from that obedience which he owed to his Creator? Say, Discord! how wouldst thou have destroyed the Roman republic, if thou hadst not animated Pompey and Julius to an intestine war against each other? Say, Luxury! how wouldst thou have ruined the Trojans, if thou hadst not separated Helen from her husband?—But thou, Envy! how often hast thou attempted to ruin by division the Christian empire, which God hath founded upon the three cardinal virtues, Faith, Hope, and Charity, as upon an holy and indivisible Trinity; vomiting the old venom of Discord among the seven electors, which are the pillars and seven principal members of the holy empire, by the brightness of whom the holy empire ought to be illuminated as by seven torches, the light of which is reinforced by the c seven gifts of the Holy Spirit?—Wherefore, being obliged, as well on account of that duty imposed upon us by the imperial dignity with which we are cloathed, as in order to maintain our right of elector, in quality of king of Bohemia, to prevent the dangerous consequences which divisions and dissensions may hereafter produce among the electors, of which number we are; we, after having maturely deliberated in our court and solemn assembly at Nuremberg, in presence of all the princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, and other princes, counts, barons, noblemen, gentlemen, and cities, being seated on the imperial throne, cloathed in the imperial habits, with the ornaments in our hands, and the crown upon our head, by the fulness of our imperial power have made and published, by this firm and irrevocable edict, the following laws, in order to cultivate d union among the electors, establish an unanimous form of election, and block up every road to that detestable division, and the extreme dangers which attend it. Given in the year of our Lord 1356, being the ninth convocation, the tenth day of January, of our reign the tenth, and of our empire the second year.

* The original kept at Frankfort is a kind of register, containing several sheets of parchment without binding or cover. It is pierced through the middle to admit a golden wire, the ends of which are fastened by a seal of gold, about the size of half a crown, which is hollow, one side representing the figure of Charles IV. upon a throne; on the exergue are these words, Carolus IV. Rom. Imp. semper Augustus, Rex Bohemice. On the reverse is a kind of city gate; and in the middle, Aurea Romana. The character is pretty legible for the time; but this original is not correct. It is carefully preserved in a square wooden box, and called the Golden Bull, on account of the seal and wire, which are of that metal.

C H A P. I.

How and by whom the Electors are to be conducted to the Place where the King of the Romans is elected.

I. WE declare and ordain by the present imperial edict, which shall last for ever, of our certain knowledge, full power, and imperial authority, that as often as the election of a king of the Romans to be emperor shall happen for the future, and the electors, according to antient and laudable custom, shall travel to the place of such election, every prince elector shall be obliged, when required, to conduct and escort in safety, and without fraud, through his countries, territories, and places, and even farther if he can, all his co-electors, or their deputies, towards the city appointed for the election, both in going and returning, on pain of perjury, and of losing (though for that time only) the voice and suffrage which he ought to have in the election: he or they who have been negligent or rebellious in this point, being declared to have incurred from that day, the said penalties, without having recourse to any other declaration than the present.

II. WE moreover ordain and command all the other princes who hold fiefs of the holy Roman empire, under whatever denomination, such as counts, barons, soldiers, and vassals, noble and not noble, burghers, and corporations of boroughs, cities, and all other places of the holy empire, upon the ensuing election of a king of the Romans to be emperor, to conduct and escort in safety, and without fraud, (as already mentioned) through their territories, and elsewhere, as far as lies in their power, every prince elector, or the deputies he shall send to the election, for whom, as well as for himself, he shall have demanded of any of them such safe-conduct: and in case any one shall have the presumption to contradict this present order, he shall likewise incur all the following penalties; to wit, in case of contravention by the princes, counts, barons, gentlemen, soldiers, and vassals, perjury and privation of all the fiefs which they hold of the holy Roman empire, as well as of all others whatsoever; together with all the other possessions, of what nature soever they may be: and with regard to corporations and burghers, who shall contravene what is ordered above, they shall be reputed perjured, and at the same time deprived of all the rights, liberties, privileges, and favours, which they may have obtained from the holy empire, and incur in their persons and effects, the imperial ban and proscription: wherefore, we now deprive all such of all rights whatsoever; we likewise permit all and every one to fall upon such proscribed delinquents, attack, offend, and outrage them with impunity, without demanding any other permission from the magistrates, or dreading the least punishment from the empire, or from any other whatsoever; forasmuch as the said proscribed delinquents are convicted of the crime of felony against the commonwealth, and even against their own honour and safety, having rashly, as disobedient rebels and traitors, despised a thing of importance to the public good.

III. WE likewise ordain and command the citizens of all the towns and corporations, to sell or see sold, to each elector, or his deputies for the election, in going and coming, at a reasonable price, and without fraud, such provisions and other things as shall be found necessary for them and their retinue, on pain of incurring the penalties mentioned above, with regard to the said burghers and corporations hereby declared guilty of the same crime.

IV. If any prince, count, baron, soldier, vassal, noble or ignoble, burgher or corporation, should be so rash as to raise any obstruction or hindrance to, or lay any ambush for the electors, or their deputies, in going to the election of a king of the Romans, or in returning from it, and attack, offend, or disturb them in their own persons, or the persons of their domestics and followers, or even in their equipages, whether they have demanded the ordinary safe-conduct, or have not thought proper to demand it, we declare every such person and all his accomplices to have incurred the above specified penalties, according to the quality of the persons as above distinguished.

V. AND even though one prince elector should be at enmity, having a difference or process with any one of his colleagues, that quarrel shall not hinder them (if required) from granting the said conduct and escort to the other, or his deputies for the said election, on pain of losing his voice in the election, for that time only, as observed above.

VI. IN the same manner, if the other princes, counts, barons, soldiers, vassals, nobles or plebeians, burghers and corporations, entertain a grudge against one or more electors; or if there is any difference or war between them; they shall, nevertheless, without contradiction or fraud, conduct and escort the prince elector, or princes electors, or his or their deputies, both in going to and returning from the place of election, if they would avoid the penalties with which they are threatened by this edict, and which they will incur so soon as they shall act in contradiction to it.

VII. AND

VII. AND for the greater security and more ample assurance of all those things above-mentioned, we will and ordain, that all and every one of the princes electors, and other princes, counts, barons, nobles, towns, or corporations, to promise by letters, and oblige themselves by oath, to accomplish and perform all those things faithfully and without fraud; and whosoever shall refuse to grant this obligation shall incur the aforesaid penalties, to be executed against the recusants according to the condition of each.

VIII. If any prince elector, or other prince holding of the empire, of whatever quality or condition he may be, count, baron, or gentleman, their successors or heirs, holding fiefs of the holy empire, shall refuse to accomplish, or have the presumption to trespass upon, our decrees and imperial laws above-written, or afterwards to be specified; if he is an elector, his co-electors shall, from thenceforward, exclude him from their society; he shall be deprived of his voice in the election, of his rank, dignity, and right of prince-electors; nor shall he be invested with the fiefs which he may hold of the holy empire; and if the same laws be contravened by any other prince or gentleman as aforesaid, neither shall he be invested with the fiefs which he may hold of the empire, or of any other person whatsoever; and in the mean time he shall, from thenceforward, incur the personal penalties specified above.

IX. AND although we understand and ordain, that all princes, counts, barons, gentlemen, soldiers, vassals, cities, and corporations, shall be indifferently obliged to furnish the said escort and conduct to each elector or his deputies aforesaid, we nevertheless think proper to assign to each elector a particular escort and conductors, according to the countries and places through which he shall pass, as will be seen more at large in the sequel.

X. FIRST then, the king of Bohemia, arch-cupbearer of the holy empire, shall be conducted by the archbishop of Mentz, the bishops of Bamberg and Wurtzburg, the burgraves of Nuremberg, Hohenloe, Wertheim, Brunick, and Hanau, and by the cities of Nuremberg, Rothemberg, and Windesheim.

XI. THE archbishop of Cologn, arch-chancellor of the holy empire in Italy, shall be conducted by the archbishops of Mentz and Triers, the count-palatine of the Rhine, the landgrave of Hesse, the counts of Catzerellebogen, Nassau, Deitz, Issenburg, Westerburg, Runkel, Limburg, and Falkenstein, and by the cities of Wetzlar, Geglerhausen, and Fridberg.

XII. THE archbishop of Triers, arch-chancellor of the holy empire among the Gauls, and in the kingdom of Arles, shall be conducted by the archbishop of Mentz, the count-palatine of the Rhine, the counts of Spanheim and Veldens, the burgraves and weldgraves of Nassau, Issenburg, Westerburg, Runkel, Limburg, Dietz, Catzerellebogen, Eppenstein, and Falkenstein, and the city of Mentz.

XIII. THE count-palatine of the Rhine, grand-steward of the holy empire, shall be conducted by the archbishop of Mentz.

XIV. THE duke of Saxony, grand-marshal of the holy empire, shall be conducted by the king of Bohemia, the archbishops of Mentz and Magdeburg, the bishops of Bamberg and Wurtzburg, the marquis of Misnia, the landgrave of Hesse, the abbots of Fulden and Hirschfeld, the burgraves of Nuremberg, Hohenloe, Wertheim, Brunick, Hanau, and Falkenstein, as also by the cities of Erfurd, Mulhausen, Nuremberg, Rothemberg, and Windesheim.

XV. AND all those who have been named, shall, in like manner, be obliged to conduct the margrave of Brandenburg, arch-chamberlain of the holy empire.

XVI. WE moreover will, and expressly ordain, that every prince elector, who would have such safe-conduct and escort, shall give due intimation to those by whom he would be conducted and escorted, specifying the road that he shall take, that they may have time and convenience to prepare the said conduct according to his demand.

XVII. WE likewise declare, that the present constitutions touching the said conduct, are to be understood, so as that each of those above-mentioned, or any other, though perhaps not mentioned above, who, in the case aforesaid, may be required to furnish the said conduct and escort, shall be obliged to grant it in his own territories and countries, and even beyond them as far as he can, without fraud, on pain of incurring the penalties above expressed.

XVIII. WE likewise command and ordain the archbishop of Mentz for the time being, to send letters patent by couriers, to each of the said princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, his colleagues, to intimate the said election, and express the day and time at which these letters may, in all probability, be delivered to each of the princes.

XIX. THESE letters shall specify, that in three months after the date mentioned in them, all and each of the princes electors shall repair, in person, to Frankfort upon the Maine, or send thither ambassadors authentically authorized, and furnished with a valid procuration, signed with their own hands, and sealed with their great seal, to proceed to the election of a king of the Romans, as future emperor.

XX. Now

XX. Now, how and in what form these letters are to be expedited, and the solemnity <sup>a</sup> which is to be inviolably observed on that occasion; together with the form and manner in which the princes electors must draw up and frame their powers, orders, and procurations, for the deputies whom they send to the election, will be more clearly expressed at the end of the present decree; which form, prescribed in that place, we ordain, of our full power and imperial authority, to be every where observed in every circumstance.

XXI. THINGS being come to such a crisis, as that the certain news of the death of the emperor or king of the Romans, arrive in the diocese of Mentz, we command and ordain, that, in the space of one month, reckoning from the day on which this advice is received, the archbishop of Mentz shall, by letters patent, make it known to the other princes electors, giving the intimation mentioned above: but if the archbishop should <sup>b</sup> chance to neglect or delay this intimation, then the other princes electors, of their own free motion, even without being called upon, and in consequence of the fidelity with which they are obliged to assist the holy empire, shall, in three months as above expressed, repair to the said city of Frankfort, to elect a king of the Romans as future emperor.

XXII. Now, no prince elector, or his ambassadors, shall, at the time of the said election, enter the said city of Frankfort with more than two hundred horse, among which may be fifty men at arms, or fewer, but never more than that number.

XXIII. ANY prince elector, thus called and invited to the election, and refusing to come or send his ambassadors with his letters patent, sealed with his own seal, containing a full, free, and intire power to elect a king of the Romans; or being actually come, or <sup>c</sup> having sent ambassadors in his default; if afterwards the same prince, or his said ambassadors, should retire from the place of election before the king of the Romans, as future emperor, be elected, and without having solemnly substituted, and left a lawful proxy to act as above, he shall for that time be deprived of his voice in the election, and of the right he had to vote in it, which he has thus abandoned.

XXIV. WE likewise enjoin and command the citizens of Frankfort, that, by virtue of the oath which we will them to take on the Holy Evangelists for that purpose, they shall protect and defend with all possible care, fidelity, and vigilance, all the princes electors in general, and each of them in particular, together with their domestics, and each of the two hundred horsemen, which they may bring to the said city, against all insult and at- <sup>d</sup> tacks, in case any dispute or quarrel should happen among them, either for or against us, failing which, they shall incur the penalty of perjury, with the loss of all their rights, liberties, favours, or grants, which they enjoy, or may enjoy from the holy empire, and shall be immediately put in their persons and effects to the imperial ban; and then and there it shall be lawful for any person of his own proper authority, without being obliged to have recourse to a magistrate, to attack with impunity these said citizens, whom in that case, we, by these presents, deprive of all right, as traitors, renegades, and rebels to the empire; and those who attack them on this subject, shall have no cause to apprehend the smallest punishment, either from the holy empire or any other quarter.

XXV. BESIDES, the said citizens of Frankfort shall not introduce, nor upon any pre- <sup>e</sup> tence whatever admit, into their city, any stranger, of what quality or condition soever he may be during the whole time employed in the election, except only the princes electors, their deputies or proxies, each of whom may introduce two hundred horse as aforesaid.

XXVI. BUT if after the entry of the electors, any stranger should be found in the city, or in their presence, the said citizens, in consequence of the oath which they shall have taken for that purpose, by virtue of this decree, upon the Holy Evangelists as above-mentioned, shall be obliged to expel him immediately, and without delay, under the penalties above pronounced.

C H A P. II.

Of the Election of the King of the Romans.

I. NEXT day after the electors or their plenipotentiaries shall have made their entry into the city of Frankfort, they shall, early in the morning, repair to the church of St. Bartholomew the Apostle, cause the mass of the Holy Ghost to be sung, all assisting at it, that the same Holy Ghost illuminating their hearts, and spreading among them the light of its virtue, they may be strengthened, by its assistance, to chuse for king of the Romans, and future emperor, a just and good man, well qualified for the safeguard of a Christian <sup>f</sup> people.

II. Immediately after mass, all the electors or plenipotentiaries shall approach the altar where the mass hath been celebrated; and there the ecclesiastic princes electors, the gos-

a pel of St John, in principio erat verbum, &c. being unfolded before them, shall lay their hands with reverence upon their breasts; and the secular princes electors shall actually touch the said gospel with their hands, at which their whole family shall be present, unarmed.—Then the archbishop of Mentz shall present to them the form of the oath; and he with them, and they or the plenipotentiaries with him, shall take the oath in this manner:

III. “ I, N. archbishop of Mentz, arch-chancellor of the holy empire in Germany, “ and prince-elect, swear upon the Holy Evangelists, here placed before me, by the “ faith which I owe to God and the holy Roman empire, that, according to my best dis“ cernment and judgment, with the help of God, I will chuse a temporal chief for the b “ Christian people; that is to say, a king of the Romans, future emperor, who shall be “ worthy of that station, as far as my discernment and judgment enable me to know:
 “ and, upon the same faith, I will give my voice and suffrage in the said election, “ without any bargain, or hope of interest, promise, or reward, or any such thing,
 “ under whatsoever denomination it may be: so help me, God, and all the saints (B).”

IV. AFTER having taken the oath, in the form and manner aforesaid, the electors, or the ambassadors of those who are absent, shall proceed to the election; and from thenceforward they shall not quit the city of Frankfort until they shall have, by a plurality of voices, elected and given to the world, or to the Christian people, a temporal chief; namely, a king of the Romans, future emperor.

c V. BUT if they should delay the accomplishment of the election for thirty successive days, reckoning from the day on which the oath is taken, then, these thirty days being expired, they shall have no other nourishment than bread and water; nor shall they quit the said city until all, or the majority of them, shall have elected a temporal conductor, or chief of the faithful, as aforesaid.

VI. Now, after the electors, or the majority of them, shall have thus chosen him in this place, the election shall hold, and be reputed, as if it had been unanimous, and without contradiction.

VII. AND if any one of the electors, or their ambassadors, should be a little late in his arrival at Frankfort, provided he comes before the election is finished, we will, that d he shall be admitted to the election, in the situation in which it happens to be at his arrival.

VIII. AND as, by an ancient, approved, and laudable custom, all that is above written hath been invariably observed to the present time; we, for that reason, will and ordain, of our full power and imperial authority, that, for the future, he who is, in the manner aforesaid, elected king of the Romans, shall, immediately after his election, and before he can meddle with the administration of the other affairs of the empire, confirm and approve, without delay, by his letters and seal, to one and all the princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, as to the principal members of the empire, all their privileges, letters, rights, liberties, immunities, concessions, ancient customs and dig-e nities, and all that they have obtained and possessed of the empire to the day of his election; and, after being crowned with the imperial crown, he shall confirm all these things anew.

IX. THIS confirmation shall be executed by the prince elected, to each of the princes electors in particular; first, under the name of king, and afterwards renewed under the title of emperor; and the prince elect shall be bound to maintain, without fraud, and of his own free motion, the said princes in general, and each of them in particular, far from giving them the least trouble or hindrance.

X. FINALLY, we will and ordain, that, in case three electors, being present, or the ambassadors of those that are absent, should elect a fourth among them, namely, a prince f elector, whether present or absent, king of the Romans, the voice of the prince elected, if present, or of his ambassadors, if absent, shall have full force, and augment the number and majority of votes, in the same manner as that of the other princes electors.

(B) Instead of this expression the Protestant electors say, “ Help me, God, and his Holy Evangelists.”

C H A P. III.

Of the Place and Precedence of the Archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers.

In the name of the holy and indivisible Trinity, and for the increase of our happiness. Amen.

CHARLES IV. by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, and king of Bohemia, to perpetuate the memory of the thing.

I. THE union and concord of the venerable and illustrious princes electors, constitute the ornament and glory of the holy Roman empire, the honour of the imperial majesty, and the advantage of the other states of this republic, the sacred edifice of which these princes support, as being the chief pillars, by their piety, which is equal to their prudence. They strengthen the hands of the imperial power; and it may be averred, that the more strait the knot of their mutual friendship is tied, the more abundantly do the Christian people enjoy all the conveniences that attend peace and tranquillity.

II. WHEREFORE, and in order henceforth to prevent the disputes and jealousies that may arise among the venerable archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, electoral princes of the holy empire, on account of the precedency or rank which they ought to enjoy in sitting in the imperial and royal assemblies; and that, for the future, they may live with one another in a tranquil state of heart and spirit, and unanimously exert themselves, and employ their whole care, in the affairs and to the advantage of the holy empire, for the consolation of the Christian people; we have, by the deliberation and advice of all the electors, ecclesiastic and secular, decreed and ordained, and we decree and ordain, of our full power and imperial authority, by this present, perpetual, and irrevocable edict, that the said venerable archbishops shall sit, namely, he of Triers opposite to and facing the emperor; he of Mentz, both in his diocese and province, and even out of his province, if within the extent of his German chancery, (except only in the province of Cologne) shall sit at the emperor's right hand; and the archbishop of Cologne shall likewise, in his province and diocese, and out of his province, through all Italy and France, sit at the right hand of the emperor; and that shall be in all public imperial acts, as well as in judgments, collations, and investitures of fiefs, festivals, councils, and all other assemblies, where they deliberate and treat of the honour and advantage of the Roman empire. And we will, that this order of sitting be observed among the said archbishops of Cologne, Triers, and Mentz, and their successors for ever, without any change or contestation.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Princes Electors in common.

I. WE likewise ordain, that as often as the emperor or king of the Romans shall be present in the imperial assemblies, either at council, at table, or on any other occasion, with the princes electors, the king of Bohemia, as a crowned and consecrated prince, shall occupy the first place immediately after the archbishop of Mentz or Cologne; that is, either of these, who for the time being, according to the quality of places, and variety of provinces, shall be seated on the right of the emperor or king of the Romans, conformable to the tenor of his privilege: that the count Palatine shall, after him, possess the second place on the same side; that on the left the duke of Saxony shall occupy the first place after the archbishop, who shall be seated on that side of the emperor; and that the marquis of Brandenburg shall place himself by the duke of Saxony.

II. AT all times when, and as often as the holy empire shall become vacant, the archbishop of Mentz shall have the power, which he hath had of old, to invite by letters the other princes his colleagues to the election.

III. ALL these, or such among them as may be able and willing to assist at the said election, being assembled for that purpose, the elector of Mentz, and no other, shall collect the particular votes of his co-electors in the following order.

IV. HE shall first ask the opinion of the archbishop of Triers, to whom we declare the first vote belongs, in the same manner as we find it always did belong, to the present time; secondly, of the archbishop of Cologne, to whom belongs the honour and office of placing first the crown upon the head of the king of the Romans; thirdly, of the king of Bohemia, who takes the precedency in eminence, as the right and merit of his royal dignity among the a the secular electors; fourthly, of the count Palatine of the Rhine; fifthly, of the duke of Saxony; and sixthly, of the marquis of Brandenburg. The archbishop of Mentz having in this order collected the suffrages of all the other electors, shall inform the princes his colleagues, disclosing his own intention, and the person to whom he gives his own vote, being by them required so to do.

b V. WE likewise ordain, that, in the ceremony of imperial festivals, the marquis of Brandenburg shall present water to wash the hands of the emperor or king of the Romans; the king of Bohemia shall, for the first time, serve him with drink: which service, however, he shall not be bound to perform with the royal crown upon his head, in conformity with the privileges of his kingdom, unless he chooses to do it of his own free will; the count Palatine of the Rhine shall be obliged to bring in the meat; and the duke of Saxony exercise his office of arch or grand-marshal, as he hath of old been accustomed to do.

C H A P. V.

c I. MOREOVER, as often as the holy empire shall become vacant, as hath been said, the illustrious count-palatine of the Rhine, arch-steward of the holy Roman empire, shall be provisor or vicar of the empire, in the quarters of the Rhine, Suabia, and the jurisdiction of Franconia, on account of the principality or privilege of the county palatine, with power to administer justice, nominate to ecclesiastic benefices, receive the revenue of the empire, invest with fiefs, and receive faith and homage, on behalf and in the name of the holy empire: all these things, however, shall be received in their time by the king of the Romans, after he is elected, to whom homage and allegiance must be sworn anew, except for the fiefs of princes, and those which are usually bestowed with the standard, the investiture and collation of which we specially reserve to the emperor alone, or king of the Romans. At the same time, the count-palatine shall understand that he is expressly forbid to alienate or mortgage any thing belonging to the empire, during the time of his administration or vicariate.

d II. AND it is our will, that the illustrious duke of Saxony, arch-marshal of the holy empire, shall enjoy the same right of administration in those places where the Saxon law is observed, in the same manner, and on the same conditions, as those specified above.

e III. AND although, by a custom very antiently introduced, the emperor or king of the Romans is obliged to answer, in the causes instituted against him, before the count-palatine of the Rhine, arch-steward, prince elector of the holy empire; the said count-palatine shall not exercise that jurisdiction, except in the imperial court, where the emperor or king of the Romans shall be personally present; and no where else.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Comparison between the Princes Electors, and other common Princes.

f WE ordain, that in all ceremonies and assemblies of the imperial court, from this day forward, the princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, shall invariably keep their places to the right and left, according to the order and form prescribed; and that no other prince, of what condition, dignity, pre-eminence, or quality soever he may be, shall be preferred to them, or any of them, in any action whatsoever that regards the imperial assemblies, either in walking, sitting, or standing upright, with this express condition, that the king of Bohemia shall nominally and invariably have the precedence in one and all the actions and celebrations of the imperial assemblies aforesaid, over every other king, whatever dignity or particular prerogative he may have, and whatever cause or circumstance may have brought him thither.

C H A P. VII.

g In the name of the holy and indivisible Trinity, and for the increase of our happiness. Amen.

CHARLES IV. by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, and king of Bohemia, to perpetuate the memory of the thing.

I. AMONG the innumerable cares which we daily employ, for putting in a prosperous condition the holy empire, where we preside by the assistance of the Lord, our principal intention is to cultivate and maintain for ever, among the princes electors of the holy empire, a salutary union, concord, and sincere charity, being certain that their councils are the more useful to the Christian world, the more distant they are from all error, the more purely that charity reigns among them, all doubt being banished, and the rights of each being clearly declared and specified.

CERTES, it is generally manifest and notorious to all the world, that the illustrious the king of Bohemia, the count-palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, and the margrave of Brandenburg; the first, by virtue of his royalty, and the others, by virtue of their principalities, have a right, vote, and seat, in the election of a king of the Romans, future emperor, with the ecclesiastical princes, their co-electors, with whom they are all reputed, as they are really in effect, true and legitimate princes electors of the holy empire.

II. NEVERTHELESS that, for the future, no cause of scandal or division shall be raised among the sons of those secular princes electors, touching their right, voice, and faculty of election; and that the public weal may not run any risque of being retarded or troubled by dangerous delays, we, by God's assistance, desirous to prevent the dangers that may ensue,

III. DECREE and ordain, of our power and imperial authority, by the present perpetual law, that in case the said secular princes electors, or any of them, should happen to die, the right voice and power of election shall be devolved freely, and without contradiction of any person whatsoever, to his eldest son, being legitimate and laic; and in case the eldest shall be no longer alive, to the eldest son of the eldest, being in like manner of the laity.

IV. AND if the said eldest son should die without male-issue legitimate, and of the laity, the right, vote, and power of election, shall be devolved, by virtue of the present edict, to his second brother, descended in a direct legitimate paternal line, and afterwards to his son, being of the laity.

V. THIS succession of the eldest-born and heirs of those princes, shall be perpetually observed with regard to the right, vote, and power aforesaid.

VI. ON this condition, however, that if the prince elector, or his eldest son, or his second son of the laity, should die, leaving heirs male legitimate, and of the laity, under age, the eldest brother of the eldest defunct, shall be tutor and administrator of the said minors, until the eldest of them shall have attained the lawful age, which age in a prince elector, we will and ordain to be eighteen years complete; and when the elector shall have attained that age, his tutor or administrator shall be bound to resign to him immediately and intirely, the right, vote, power, and office of elector, and all in general that depends thereon.

VII. AND if any one of those principalities should become vacant in behalf of the empire, the emperor or king of the Romans for the time being, may dispose of it, as of a thing lawfully devolved to him and to the holy empire.

VIII. WITHOUT prejudice, however, to the privileges, rights, and customs of our kingdom of Bohemia, in what regards the election of a new king in case of vacancy, by virtue of which, the natives of Bohemia may elect a king according to the established custom, and the tenor of the said privileges obtained of the emperors or kings our predecessors, which privileges we have no intention to prejudice by the present imperial sanction; on the contrary, we expressly ordain, that our said kingdom be maintained to them, and that their privileges shall be preserved for ever, according to their form and tenour.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Immunities of the King of Bohemia, and the Inhabitants of the said Kingdom.

I. AS the emperors and kings our predecessors, have granted to the illustrious kings of Bohemia, our ancestors and predecessors, as well as to the kingdom and crown of Bohemia, a certain gracious privilege, which hath subsisted in the said kingdom and crown of Bohemia, a certain gracious privilege, which hath subsisted in the said kingdom without interruption, from time immemorial, by a laudable custom indisputably observed during all that time, and prescribed by use without any contradiction or interruption; namely, that no prince, baron, noble, soldier, vassal, burgher, inhabitant, peasant, or other person of that kingdom, or its appurtenances, of what estate, dignity, pre-

a pre-eminence, or condition soever he may be, shall, for any cause or pretext, by any person whatsoever, be summoned or cited without the kingdom, or before any other tribunal than that of the king of Bohemia, and the judges of his royal court; we, being desirous of renewing and confirming the said grant, use, and privilege, ordain, of our authority and full imperial power, by this perpetual and irrevocable constitution, that if, notwithstanding this privilege, custom, and grant, any prince, baron, noble, vassal, citizen, peasant, or any other person above denominated, shall be cited or summoned to any tribunal without the kingdom, for any cause whatsoever, civil, criminal, or mixed; he shall by no means be bound to appear, or answer at any time, either in person or by proxy; and if this foreign judge, who does not live within the kingdom, whatever authority he may have, shall proceed against him for contempt or non-appearance, even to an interlocutory or definitive judgment, and pronounce one or more sentences in the above-said causes and affairs, any manner of way: We, of our authority, and full imperial power, declare all the said citations, orders, proceedings, sentences, and executions whatever, pronounced and fulfilled in consequence, null and of no effect, so as that nothing can be executed or attempted to the prejudice of this privilege.

b II. UPON which we expressly add and ordain, by this imperial edict, perpetual and irrevocable, enacted by the same full power and authority, that, as in the said kingdom of Bohemia, it hath always been observed, from time immemorial, that no prince, baron, noble, soldier, vassal, citizen, burgher, peasant, or any other inhabitant of the kingdom of Bohemia, of what estate, pre-eminence, dignity, or condition soever he may be, shall be permitted to appeal to another tribunal, from any proceedings, interlocutory or definitive sentences, mandates, or judgment of the king of Bohemia, or his judges; or from the execution of the said sentences and judgment given against any of them by the tribunals of the king, the kingdom, and other said judges; and if, notwithstanding this prohibition, appeals are made, they shall be declared null, and the appellants from that time really and actually incur the penalty decreed.

C H A P. IX.

d Of the Mines of Gold, Silver, and other Metals.

WE ordain by the present perpetual and irrevocable constitution, and of our knowledge declare, that our successors, kings of Bohemia, as also one and all of the princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, present and to come, may justly and lawfully have and possess all the mines and mineries of gold, silver, tin, copper, iron, and lead, and all sorts of other metals; as also the salt-pits already discovered, or that shall afterwards be discovered in our said kingdom, in the same manner as the said princes in their principalities, lands, dominions, and appurtenances, have been accustomed to possess them, without the least exception of their rights: they may also afford retreat to the Jews, and receive for the future, the rights and toll, formerly established in the same manner as hitherto observed, and lawfully practised by our predecessors, the kings of Bohemia of happy memory; and by the princes electors, and their predecessors, according to the antient, laudable, and approved custom, and the course of time immemorial.

C H A P. X.

f I. WE moreover decree, that the king of Bohemia, who, after us, shall succeed to that kingdom, may, during his reign, coin gold and silver money, in all or any of the places of his kingdom or its dependencies, in the form and manner hitherto observed in the said kingdom, as it hath at all times been lawful for our predecessors, kings of Bohemia, to do, according to their continual possession of that right. We likewise will and ordain, by the present imperial constitution and perpetual favour, that the kings of Bohemia shall be at liberty to buy and acquire of other princes, noblemen, counts, and of any other persons whatever, castles, and hereditary lands, of what nature soever they may be; and receive them by gift or mortgage, on condition that they shall be bound to leave them as they found them, fiefs as fiefs, and freeholds as freeholds, &c. in such a manner, however, as that for the estates which the kings of Bohemia shall have thus acquired or received, and which they shall have thought fit to unite to the kingdom of Bohemia,

Bohemia, they shall be obliged to pay the ordinary and accustomed duties which were due from them to the empire :

II. WHICH present constitution and favour we likewise extend, by virtue of this our present imperial law, to all the princes electors, ecclesiastic as well as secular, and their successors and lawful heirs, upon the terms and conditions prescribed above.

C H A P. XI.

Of the Election of the Princes Electors.

I. WE likewise decree that the counts, barons, nobles, feudatories, vassals, officers, soldiers, citizens, burghers, and all other persons of what estate, dignity, and condition soever they may be, subjects to the churches of Cologne, Mentz, and Triers, as they have not, in times past, so neither shall they for the future be cited, drawn, or removed without the territory, bounds, or limits of the jurisdiction of the said churches and their dependencies, at the instance of any plaintiff whatsoever, nor obliged to appear before any other tribunals and judges, than the ordinary judges of the archbishops of Mentz, Triers, and Cologne, as we find the custom at all times to have been.

II. AND if, notwithstanding our present constitution, any one of the subjects of the churches of Triers, Mentz, and Cologne, should be summoned or cited for any cause, civil, criminal, or mixed, or other affair, before some other judge, without the territories, bounds, and limits of the said churches, or of either of them; the person thus cited shall not be bound to appear or answer; declaring the citation, proceedings, and interlocutory or definitive sentences, given or to be given against him, by such judges without the jurisdiction of the said churches, and all that ensues by execution or other attempt, void and of no effect.

III. To which we expressly add, that the counts, barons, feudatories, nobles, vassals, officers, soldiers, citizens, peasants, and all other subjects of the said churches, of whatever estate, dignity, or condition they may be, shall not appeal from the proceedings, interlocutory and definitive sentences, or mandates, of the said archbishops and their churches, or their officials or secular judges, or from the executions made, or to be made, in consequence, against them, in the jurisdiction of the archbishop or said officials, to any other tribunal whatsoever, provided justice be not denied to the plaintiffs in the tribunals of the said archbishops and their officials; and we forbid all other judges to receive such appeals, which we declare void and of no effect.

IV. BUT in case that justice shall be denied; we permit all those of the above denominations, to whom justice shall have been denied, to appeal, not indifferently to any other ordinary judge or subdelegate, but immediately to the tribunal of the imperial court, and to the judge there presiding, reversing and annulling all the proceedings which shall have been carried on elsewhere to the prejudice of this constitution.

V. WHICH, by virtue of our present imperial law, we likewise extend to the illustrious count-palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, and the marquis of Brandenburg, princes electors, secular or laic, and to their successors, heirs, and subjects, in the same form and manner as above.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Assembly of the Princes Electors.

In the name of the holy and indivisible Trinity, and for the increase of our happiness.
Amen.

CHARLES IV. by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, and king of Bohemia, to perpetuate the memory of the thing.

I. AMONG the different cares that incessantly employ our mind for the good of the public, our imperial highness having considered, that the princes electors of the holy empire, who are the solid basis and immoveable pillars upon which it stands, cannot conveniently communicate together on account of their being removed at such a distance from one another, we have found it necessary, for the good and safety of the empire, that they should meet oftener than usual, when, being duly informed of the abuses and disorders which reign in their respective provinces, they may report the circumstances, confer together, and concert means for remedying them by their wholesome counsel and sage precaution.

II. WHEREFORE, in our solemn court held by our highness at Nuremberg, with the venerable ecclesiastic princes electors, the illustrious secular princes electors, and several other princes and noblemen, after mature deliberation with the said princes electors, with their advice, and in behalf of the commonweal, we have thought proper, with the said princes electors, ecclesiastic as well as secular, to decree that, for the future, the said princes electors shall personally assemble once a year, in one of our imperial towns, four weeks successively after the feast of Easter; and that, for the present year, at the same ensuing term, shall be celebrated by us and the said princes, a conference, court, or assembly of that nature, in our imperial city of Metz; and then, on one of the days of the said assembly, we, with their advice, shall nominate the places where they shall meet the following year.

AND this present constitution shall continue in force no longer than we and they shall please to observe it; but while it remains in force, we shall take under our protection and safeguard the said princes electors, both in coming to our court, in sojourning in the place, and in returning from it.

III. AND that the negotiation and expedition of the common affairs concerning the public repose, may not be retarded by feasts and entertainments, which are usual on such occasions, we likewise decree, with their unanimous consent, that, during the said assemblies, it shall not be lawful for any person whatever to make any general entertainment for the princes; but plenty of private treats, which bring no hindrance to the expedition of affairs, yet even these in moderation.

C H A P. XIII.

Of the Revocation of the Privileges.

WE likewise decree and declare, by this our imperial, perpetual, and irrevocable edict, that all the privileges and letters of concession, which we, the emperors or kings of the Romans, our predecessors of glorious memory, may have granted of our proper motion, or in another manner under any terms whatever; or which we, or our successors, emperors or kings, may for the future grant to any person whatever, of what quality, condition, or pre-eminence soever he may be, even to cities, boroughs, or corporations of any places whatever, with regard to rights, favours, immunities, customs, &c. shall not prejudice or derogate from the liberties, jurisdictions, rights, honours, and seignories of the princes electors of the holy empire, ecclesiastic and secular, or of any of them, although in the said privileges and letters granted, as said is, in favour of any person or persons of whatever pre-eminence, dignity, or condition he or they may be, or of the said corporations or communities, it should be expressly specified that they cannot be revoked, except this clause of non-revocation should be specially and literally inserted in the body of the said letters; which privileges and letters, so far as they prejudice and derogate in some things from the liberties, jurisdictions, rights, honours, and seignories of the said princes electors, or of any of them; we have, of our certain knowledge, full power, and imperial authority, revoked and annulled; we revoke and annul, and by these presents understand and hold them as revoked and annulled.

C H A P. XIV.

Of those who are deprived of their feudal Estates, as being unworthy to hold them.

AND as, in several places of the empire, the vassals and feudatories preposterously and maliciously make a verbal resignation or demission of the fiefs which they hold of their lords, that they may have room, after the said resignation, to defy and declare war against them, and, under pretext of open hostility, attack, invade, occupy, and retain the said fiefs and lands, to the prejudice of the said lords; we decree, by this perpetual constitution, that all such resignations or renunciations shall be reputed void, if they are not made freely and really, and the resignees put in corporal and real possession of the said fiefs; so as that those challengers, or senders of defiance, may never trouble, either by themselves or others, or afford advice, favour, and assistance to any one, in order to trouble or disturb their lords in the benefices or fiefs they have resigned: we will, that those who do the contrary, and attack their lords in their benefices and fiefs so resigned, in any manner of way, or trouble or endamage them, or afford counsel, assistance, or favour to those who commit such attempts, shall then, and by so doing, lose the said fiefs and benefices, be declared infamous, and put to the ban of the empire; be incapable of re-enjoying joying the said fiefs and benefices, on any pretence whatever; or of being invested in them anew, in any manner of way; declaring, that any such concession or investiture, against the present constitution, shall be without effect. Lastly, we decree, that he or they who shall dare to act fraudulently against his or their lord or lords, and attack him or them with premeditated design, without having made the said resignation, whether the defiance hath or hath not been made, shall, in so doing, incur the said penalties, by virtue of this present sanction.

C H A P. XV.

Of Conspiracies, or Combinations.

I. WE likewise disapprove, condemn, and of our certain knowledge declare void, all combinations, conventicles, or illicit societies, detested and forbid by the laws, both within and without the cities, betwixt city and city, individual and individual, or city and individual, on pretence of consanguinity, township, or any other colour whatever; as also all confederacies, covenants, and customs, by such corruption introduced, which any city or person may have already made, or shall presume hereafter to make, whether among themselves or with others, without the authority of the lords whose subjects, officers, or servants they are, or in whose districts they remain; the said lords not being nominally excepted; in like manner as they have been prohibited and annulled by the sacred laws of the divine emperors our predecessors; excepting, nevertheless, those confederacies and leagues which are known to have been made by princes, cities, and others, for the preservation of the general peace of the provinces and countries between them; which being specially reserved by our declaration, we ordain, that they shall remain in full force and vigour, until we shall think proper to decree otherwise.

II. WE ordain, that every individual who shall dare, for the future, to make leagues, combinations, and covenants of that sort, against the disposition of this edict, and our antient law published on that subject, besides the penalty mentioned in the said law, shall from thenceforward incur the mark of infamy, and a fine of ten livres of gold; and that every city, which shall in like manner violate our present law, shall also incur the fine of one hundred livres of gold, with the loss and privation of its imperial privileges; one half of which pecuniary mulcts shall be appropriated to the imperial treasury, and the other to the lord of the district, to the prejudice of which the said leagues shall have been made.

C H A P. XVI.

Of the Pfsalburgers, or People who have forfeited their Freedom.

I. BESIDES, complaint having been often made to us, that certain citizens, and subjects of princes, barons, and others, seeking to shake off the yoke of their original subjection, and even being so rash as to pay no manner of regard to it, have been received citizens of other towns, (a practice frequent in past times) and, notwithstanding, continue to reside personally in the dominions, towns, boroughs, and villages of their first lords, whom they presume to abandon by this fraud, pretending to enjoy the liberties of the towns of which by these means they have acquired the freedom, and to be protected by them: which citizens are, in Germany, vulgarly called Pfsalburgers: now, as it is not just that any person should profit by guile and fraud, we, with the advice of the princes electors, ecclesiastic and secular, and of our certain knowledge, full power, and imperial authority, have ordained, and by this present perpetual and irrevocable edict ordain, that the said citizens and subjects, who thus attempt to baffle those to whom they owe subjection, shall not, from this day forwards, in any of the territories, places, or provinces of the holy empire, enjoy, in any shape, the rights and liberties of the towns wherein, by such fraud, they either have been or may be received as freemen; unless they shall really and personally remove themselves into the said towns, where they may acquire an actual settlement, by continual, true, and unfeigned residence, undergoing the usual impositions, and proportion of the municipal expence; otherwise, if any persons have been or shall be received, their reception shall be reputed void; and those received, of what dignity, rank, and condition soever they may be, shall not enjoy, in any case, or on any pretext whatsoever, the rights and liberties of the said cities; and this, notwithstanding whatever rights and privileges may have been obtained, and customs at any time observed, which, so far as they are contrary to this our present law, we, of our certain knowledge, and full imperial power, revoke by these presents, and ordain to be deprived of all force and value.

II. WITHOUT

a II. WITHOUT prejudice, however, to the rights which the princes, noblemen, and others, thus abandoned, have over the persons and effects of their subjects who abandon them in this manner; and as for those who, contrary to the disposition of this our present law, have already presumed, or shall hereafter presume to receive the said citizens and subjects of others, if they do not absolutely send them back in one month after publication made to them of these presents, we declare, that, as often as they transgress our present law, they shall incur the fine of hundred marks of pure gold; one half of which shall irrecoverably be applied to the imperial treasury, and the other to the lords to whom those who are thus received did belong.

b C H A P. XVII.

Of Challenges.

I. WE moreover declare, that those who, pretending to have just cause to challenge any one, shall send him a challenge at an improper time, in the places where he hath not his fixed residence, and where he doth not ordinarily dwell, cannot with honour ravage his lands, nor burn his houses, or by any other way hurt his possessions (A).

c II. AND, forasmuch as it is not reasonable that deceit and fraud should be of advantage to any one, we will and ordain, by this present perpetual constitution, that challenges of this kind given, or hereafter to be given, to any noblemen or other persons whatever, with whom the challenger has lived in society, familiarity, or honourable friendship, be of no account; and that it be by no means allowed, under pretext of such challenge, to hurt any one by burning, pillaging, and ravaging, unless the challenge has been proclaimed publicly for three natural days, either to the person himself challenged, or in the place of his ordinary and usual abode, and that proclamation has been testified by sufficient witnesses. We ordain, that whoever dares to challenge and attack any one in the aforesaid manner, shall incur from thenceforward a mark of infamy, as though he had given no challenge, and that he shall be punished as a traitor by every judge, according to the rigour of the laws.

d III. WE forbid and condemn also, all kinds of unjust wars and quarrels, and likewise burnings, unjust ravages and violences, unlawful and unusual taxes and impositions, as also the exactions usually made for safe-conducts and safe-guards, which people have been obliged by force to accept of, and this under the penalties with which the holy laws ordain the said outrages to be punished.

C H A P. XVIII.

e TO you the illustrious and magnificent prince, lord, &c. margrave of Brandenburg, arch-chamberlain of the holy Roman empire, our co-electors, and most dear friend, we intimate to you, by these presents, the election of a king of the Romans, which for reasonable causes ought to be made without delay; and we call you according to the duty of our office, and the custom of the said election, that within three following months, counting from such a day, &c. you are to appear personally, or by your ambassadors or proxies, whether one or more, having sufficient charge and commission, at the place appointed by the sacred laws enacted for that purpose; there to consult, treat, and agree with the other princes your and our co-electors, about the election of a king of the Romans, who, by the grace of God, shall be afterwards created emperor; and there to abide till the conclusion of that election, and otherwise to act and proceed as it is expressed in the holy laws for that purpose ordained: failing of which, we will finally proceed in it, with the other princes your and our co-electors, according as the authority of the said laws ordains, notwithstanding the absence of you or your ambassadors.

C H A P. XIX.

g WE N. by the grace of God, &c. of the holy empire, &c. make known unto all by these presents, that whereas, for reasonable causes, the election of a king of the Romans ought to be proceeded on without delay, and that we desire earnestly, as bound also by the honour

(A) Another proof of the bad state in which the empire then was;

and estate of the holy empire, that it be not exposed to any eminent dangers, we having a firm <sup>a</sup> persuasion and sincere confidence in the fidelity, ability, and prudence of our dear and well-beloved, such persons, &c. have made, constituted, and appointed them, as we make, constitute, and appoint them with all right, manner, and form, in the fullest and most effectual manner that we are able, our true and lawful proxies and special ambassadors, them or each of them virtually, so that there shall be no distinction of rank among them, but what shall be begun by one, may be finished and properly concluded by another; and this to treat in every thing with the other princes our co-electors, as well ecclesiastic as secular, to assemble with them, and conclude upon the choice of a person properly qualified to be elected king of the Romans; and to assist at the treaties which shall be made upon the election of such a person, and there to treat and deliberate for us in our place, <sup>b</sup> and in our name; as also, in our said name and place, to nominate the same person, and to consent to his being elected king of the Romans, and elevated to the holy empire; and to take, upon our conscience, every oath that shall be necessary, agreeable, and usual; even as far as concerns the things to be after mentioned, or any of those that have been mentioned, to substitute and virtually revoke any other proxy or proxies; and to do all and every thing that shall be necessary and useful to be done, as far as concerns the fore-said affairs, till the conclusion of the treaties of this nomination, deliberation, and election, or other such similar and equally useful and important matters, although they or any one of them should require a more special commission, or be of greater consequence, or more particular, than those already mentioned; the whole as we could do ourselves, if we were per- <sup>c</sup> sonally present at the negotiations of the said treaties of deliberation, nomination, and future election, having, and willing to have, and firmly promising always to be satisfied with, and to ratify every thing that shall be negotiated, treated, or done, or in any manner ordained in the fore-said affairs, or in any of them, by our fore-said proxies or ambassadors, as also by their subdelegates, or by those that shall be substituted by them, or by any of them.

C H A P. XX.

Of the Union of the Principalities of the Electors, and of the Rights thereto annexed. <sup>d</sup>

In the name of the holy and undivided Trinity, and to the increase of our happiness. So be it.

CHARLES IV. by the grace of God, emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, and king of Bohemia, for the perpetual remembrance of the thing.

As all and every one the principalities, in virtue of which it is known that the secular electoral princes have a right and voice in the election of a king of the Romans, future emperor, are so attached and inseparably united to that right, and to the functions, dignities, and other rights thereto pertaining, and thereupon depending, that the right and voice, the office and dignity, and the other rights belonging to each of the said principalities, cannot fall but to him who publicly possesses the principality, with the land, the vassalages, fiefs, dominions, and their dependencies; we ordain, by this present imperial edict, perpetual and irrevocable, that, for the time to come, each of the said principalities shall remain, and be so strictly and indivisibly joined and united with the voice of election, the office, and all other dignities, rights, and appurtenances, concerning the electoral dignity, that whoever shall be peaceable possessor of one of the said principalities, shall enjoy also the free and peaceable possession of the right, voice, office, dignity, and all other appurtenances that concern it, and shall be reputed by every one true and lawful elector; and as such he, and he only, shall have a right to be invited, received, and admitted, with the other princes at all times, and without any opposition to the elections of the kings of the Romans, and to all the transactions which shall concern the honour and welfare of the holy empire; provided that none of the afore-said things, which are or ought to be inseparable, may be at any time divided or separated one from another; or may, in judgment or otherwise, be reclaimed separately, or so declared by sentence in any court of judicature, willing, that all audience be denied to him who shall demand the one without the other; and that if by surprize or otherwise he should obtain it, and that thereupon there should follow any process, judgment, sentence, or any other encroachment, upon our present constitution, the whole, in every circumstance whatever, be of no effect, and actually void. <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

C H A P. XXI.

Of the Order of the Proceſſion among the Archbishops.

I. FORASMUCH as we have ſufficiently explained, in the beginning of our preſent conſtitutions, the order of place, whenever the princes electors ſhall be hereafter obliged to aſſemble with the emperor or king of the Romans, about which formerly there have been many diſputes; we have alſo judged it expedient to preſcribe the order to be obſerved by them in public proceſſions.

b II. For this cauſe we ordain, by this preſent imperial and perpetual edict, that as oft as, in the general aſſemblies, the emperor or king of the Romans ſhall be preſent, and the ſaid princes, the emperor, or the king of the Romans, deſire to go out in public and in ſtate, and that he orders to be carried before him the imperial ornaments, the archbiſhop of Triers ſhall go firſt and alone before the emperor or the king, in a right and direct line; ſo that, between the emperor or the king and him, there ſhall be none but the princes, to whom it belongs to carry the imperial or royal enſigns.

c III. But when the emperor or the king ſhall march, without cauſing the ſaid enſigns to be carried, then the ſame archbiſhop ſhall go before the emperor or the king in the aforeſaid manner, ſo that there be abſolutely none between them, the other two archbiſhops electors keeping in the ſaid proceſſions, each the place which hath been already aſſigned him in the ſeſſions, according to the province in which they then ſhall be.

C H A P. XXII.

Of the Order of the Proceſſion of the Eleſtoral Princes, and of thoſe who are to carry the honorary Enſigns.

d TO declare the rank which the princes electors ought to keep in marching with the emperor, or with the king of the Romans, in public and in ſtate, and of which we have already made mention, we ordain, that every time, during the holding of an imperial diet, the princes electors ſhall march in proceſſion with the emperor or king of the Romans, in all actions or ſolemnities whatever, and that they ſhall there carry the imperial or royal ornaments. The duke of Saxony, carrying the imperial or royal ſword, ſhall march immediately before the emperor, being in the middle between him and the elector of Triers: the ſaid elector of Saxony ſhall have on his right the count-palatine of the Rhine, who ſhall carry the globe or imperial apple; and on his left the marquis of Brandenburg, carrying the ſcepter. All three marching abreſt, the king of Bohemia ſhall immediately follow the emperor or king of the Romans, without any one marching between the emperor or ſaid e king and him.

C H A P. XXIII.

f I. EVERY time that the ſolemnity of the maſs ſhall be celebrated before the emperor or the king of the Romans, and the archbiſhops of Mentz, Triers, and Cologne, or two of them, ſhall be there preſent, at the confeſſion which is ſaid at the beginning of the maſs, at the kiſſing of the goſpel, and the bleſſing preſented after the Agnus Dei; and alſo at the benedictions which are given at the end of the maſs, and at thoſe which are ſaid when ſitting down at table, and at the thanks given after the repaſt, that order ſhall be obſerved, which we have thought proper to eſtabliſh with their advice and conſent, which is, that the firſt ſhall have that honour the firſt day; the ſecond, the ſecond day; and the third, the third day.

g II. We declare, in this caſe, that the order of priority or poſteriority among the archbiſhops, ought to be regulated by the order and time of their conſecration: and that they may anticipate one another by teſtimonies of honour and reſpect, and that their example may oblige the other electors mutually to honour themſelves, we deſire that he, whom the order about the aforeſaid things ſhall regard as firſt, ſhall offer to his colleagues the civility and loving compliment of inviting them to accept of that honour; and, after that, he ſhall proceed to the aforeſaid things, or any one of them.

C H A P.

C H A P. XXIV.

The following Laws have been published in the Diet of Metz, on Christmas-day 1356, by Charles IV. Emperor of the Romans, semper Augustus, King of Bohemia, assisted by all the Princes Electors of the sacred Empire, in Presence of the venerable Father in God the Lord Theodoric, Bishop of Alba, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, and of Charles, eldest Son of the King of France, illustrious Duke of Normandy, and Dauphin of the Viennois.

I. IF any one has entered into any criminal conspiracy, or made oath or promise to engage in any such with princes and gentlemen, or even with private or any other persons whatever, not excepting plebeians, against the life of the reverend and illustrious princes electors of the holy Roman empire, ecclesiastic as well as secular, let him perish by the sword, and all his estate be confiscated, as guilty of treason; for they constitute a part of our body, and, in these rencounters, the laws punish the will with the same severity as the crime itself: and though it were but just that the sons of such a parricide should die the same death, because from them the same examples may be apprehended, nevertheless we grant them their lives out of our particular bounty. But our will is, that they shall be deprived of the succession of their mother or grandmother; as likewise of all the effects they might expect by right of inheritance and succession, or by the will of their other relations or friends, to the end that, being ever poor and necessitous, they may be for ever accompanied by the infamy of their father; that they shall never attain to any honour or dignity, not even to those conferred by the church, but be reduced to such extremity, as that they shall languish in continual indigence, and thus find their punishment in living, and their relief in dying. Our will is also, that those who shall presume to intercede for such people may be branded with perpetual infamy.

II. WITH regard to the daughters of those criminals, in what number soever they may be, we ordain, that they shall enjoy the falcidium, or fourth part of the succession of their mother, whether she hath, or hath not, made a will, that they may have a middling subsistence as daughters, rather than an intire advantage in the name of heirs: for, in effect, the sentence ought to be the more moderate with respect to them, as we are persuaded d the weakness of their sex will prevent them from committing crimes of that nature.

III. WE also declare the emancipations, which such persons may have made of their sons and daughters, since the publication of the present law, null, and of no effect. Likewise, we declare void, and of no account, all settlements of dowry, donations, and all other alienations, which may be made by fraud, or even of right, from the time that they shall have begun first to act in these plots and conspiracies. If women, after having withdrawn their dowry, find themselves in that state, that, whatever they shall have received of their husbands under the title of donations, they must reserve it to their sons, when the term of their possession shall expire; they are to know, that all these things, which, according to law, ought to return to the son, shall be applied to our treasury, except the falcidium, or e fourth, which shall be deducted from them for the daughters, and not for the sons.

IV. WHAT we have said of these criminals, and their sons, ought also to be extended to their attendants, accomplices, and servants, and their sons. Nevertheless, if any of the accomplices, touched with a desire of true glory, discovers the conspiracy in its beginning, he shall, for that discovery, receive from us honour and reward: but as to him who shall have been concerned in these conspiracies, and discovers them only very late, yet still before they have been discovered by any other, he shall only be judged to deserve impunity, and pardon of his crime.

V. WE ordain also, that if any outrage committed against the said electoral princes, ecclesiastic or secular, be discovered, the punishment of that crime may be prosecuted anew, f even after the death of the guilty person.

VI. As also, for this crime of treason against the said princes electors, the servants of the accused person may be put to the torture.

VII. WE ordain, moreover, by this present imperial edict, and will, that, even after the death of the guilty person, an information may be commenced against him, that, the crime being proved, his memory may be condemned, and his effects confiscated: for, from the time that any one forms the design of a detestable crime, he is from thenceforward in a manner guilty, and tormented in his soul.

VIII. For this reason, from the time that any one is found guilty of such an outrage, we will, that he shall no more have the power to sell, or alienate, or give freedom to his g slaves, nor even to demand the payment of his just debts.

<sup>a</sup> IX. WE ordain likewise, with regard to this, that is to say, for the crime of conspiracy against the electoral princes, ecclesiastic or secular, the servants of the criminal may be put to the torture.

X. AND if any one of these criminals die, during the drawing up of the process, we will that his effects be put into the hands of justice, by reason that it is still uncertain who shall be his heir.

C H A P. XXV.

That the Principalities of the Electors may be preserved intire.

<sup>b</sup> IF it is expedient that all principalities be preserved intire, that justice may be strengthened, and that good and faithful subjects may enjoy a perfect repose, and profound peace, it is without comparison much more reasonable, that the great principalities, dominions, honours, and rights of the electoral princes should also remain intire; for where the danger is most to be feared, there the greatest precaution ought to be used, lest the pillars being defective, the whole edifice should fall in ruins.

<sup>c</sup> I. WE will then and ordain, by this perpetual imperial edict, that from henceforth, and for ever, the great and magnificent principalities, such as the kingdom of Bohemia, the county-palatine of the Rhine, the dukedom of Saxony, the marquitate of Brandenburg, their lands, jurisdictions, homages (A), and vassalages, with their appurtenances and dependencies, cannot be parted, divided, or dismembered in any manner whatever, but shall remain in all time coming, united and preserved intire.

<sup>d</sup> II. THAT the eldest son succeed thereto, and that all the dominion and all the right belong to him alone, provided he be not a lunatic, or have such other great and remarkable defect, as absolutely hinders him from governing; in which case, he being excluded from the succession, we will that the second son be called to it, if there is one in the same line; if not, the eldest of the brothers, or lay relations on the father's side, who shall be found the nearest in the direct and male line (B). Who nevertheless shall be bound to give continual proofs of his goodness and liberality to his other brothers and sisters, contributing to their subsistence, according to his good will, and the extent of his estate; prohibiting him expressly from parting, dividing, or dismembering the principalities, and their appurtenances and dependencies, in any manner whatever.

C H A P. XXVI.

Of the Imperial Court, and of its Session.

<sup>e</sup> I. ON the day that the emperor or the king of the Romans would solemnly hold his court, the electoral princes, as well ecclesiastic as secular, shall assemble for an hour, or thereabouts, at the place of the imperial or royal residence, where, the emperor or the king being clothed in all the imperial ornaments, shall mount on horseback, with all the electoral princes, who shall accompany him to the place prepared for the session, each in the order and manner already prescribed, and inserted in the ordinance which regulates the processions of the said electoral princes.

II. THE arch-chancellor, in whose arch-chancellorate the imperial court shall be held, shall also carry, at the end of a silver rod, all the imperial or royal seals.

III. BUT the secular electoral princes shall carry the sceptre, the apple, and the sword, in the manner which has been already mentioned.

<sup>f</sup> IV. SOME other inferior princes, who shall be deputed by the emperor, and in his choice, shall carry, immediately before the archbishop of Triers, proceeding in his rank, first, the crown of Aix-la-Chapelle, and in the second place that of Milan, which shall never be done but before the emperor, when adorned with the imperial crown.

V. THE empress also, or the queen of the Romans, being attired in the habits and ornaments of state, shall go after the emperor or king of the Romans, and also after the king of Bohemia, who immediately follows the emperor; but she shall be at a convenient in the collateral line, and the difficulty is not determined, whether the order of lines, or the proximity of degrees, ought to be followed: a question which has since been often disputed in the empire.

(B) There is no regulation made for the succession distance, and accompanied by her principal officers, and maids of honour, and shall a proceed thus as far as the place of the session.

C H A P. XXVII.

Of the Functions of the Electoral Princes in the Assemblies where the Emperors or Kings of the Romans solemnly hold their Court.

WE ordain, as oft as the emperor or king of the Romans would solemnly hold his court, and the electoral princes shall be obliged to perform the duties of their office, b that the following order shall be observed.

I. THE emperor or king of the Romans being seated in his royal chair, or on the imperial throne, the duke of Saxony shall perform his office in the following manner. There shall be put before the place of the imperial or royal session a heap of oats, of such a height as to reach the horse's breast, or the saddle upon which the duke shall be seated: and the duke having in his hands a silver rod, and a measure also of silver, which together shall weigh twelve marks, and being on horseback, he shall fill the measure with the oats, and shall give it to the first groom he meets: after which, thrusting the rod among the oats, he shall retire; and his vice-marshal, namely, the count of Papenheim, approaching, or in his absence the marshal of the court, shall give allowance to plunder the oats. c

II. WHENEVER the emperor or the king of the Romans shall be seated at table, the ecclesiastic electoral princes, that is to say, the archbishops, standing by the table, with the other prelates, shall bless it, according to the order before by us prescribed. The blessing being given, the same archbishops, if they are there present, or even two, or one of them, shall take the imperial or royal seals from the hands of the chancellor of the court; and the archbishop, in whose archchancelloriate the court shall be held, going in the middle of the two other archbishops, who shall be upon his right and left, and holding with him the silver rod, to which the seals shall be hung, all three shall carry them thus, and shall place them with respect upon the table, before the emperor or the king: but the emperor or the king shall restore them to the said archbishops again forthwith; and he in d whose arch-chancelloriate the ceremonies shall be performed, as has been said, shall hang about his neck the greatest seal, and shall carry it thus all the time of dinner, and after, till he has returned to his lodgings, mounted on a horse belonging to the palace. But the rod, which we have spoke of, ought to be of silver, of the weight of twelve marks; and the three archbishops ought each to pay the third, as well of the weight of the silver as of the price of the workmanship. The rod and the seals shall remain with the chancellor of the court, who shall do with them as he pleases; and therefore, as soon as that archbishop, who had the privilege of carrying the great seal about his neck from the palace to his lodgings, as has been said, shall be there arrived, he shall send, by some one e of his domestics, to the said chancellor of the imperial court, the said seal upon the same horse; and the archbishop, according to the decorum of his proper dignity, and the friendship which he shall bear to the said chancellor of the court, shall be bound to compliment him also with the horse.

III. THEN the marquis of Brandenburg shall come on horseback, having in his hands a basin and ewer of silver, of the weight of twelve marks, with water and a fine napkin; when, alighting, he shall present to the lord the emperor, or to the king of the Romans, the water to wash in.

IV. THE count-palatine of the Rhine shall enter also on horseback, carrying four dishes of silver full of victuals, each dish of the weight of three marks; and, having dismounted, he shall place the dishes upon the table before the emperor, or king of the Romans. f

V. AFTER them shall come the king of Bohemia, chief cup-bearer, being also on horseback, and holding in his hand a cup or goblet of silver, of the weight of twelve marks, covered, and full of wine and water; and, having dismounted, he shall present it to the emperor, or king of the Romans, to drink.

VI. WE ordain also, according as it has hitherto been practised, that the secular electoral princes having performed their offices, the vice-chamberlain of Falkenstein should have the horse, the basin, and ewer of the marquis of Brandenburg; the master of the kitchen of Nortemberg the horse and dishes of the count-palatine of the Rhine; the vice-cupbearer of Limburg the horse and goblet of the king of Bohemia; and the vice-marshal of Papenheim the rod and measure of the duke of Saxony. Provided still, that these officers g be personally present at the imperial or royal court, and there performing the duties of their offices; otherwise, and if they be all absent, or any of them, then the ordinary officers a officers of the emperor, or king of the Romans, shall serve instead of the absent, each in his office; and as they shall perform the offices, they shall also enjoy the advantages.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Of the Imperial and Electoral Tables.

I. THE imperial or royal table must be placed in such a manner as to be six feet higher, than the other tables of the hall, and the days of the solemn assemblies, none shall sit down at it but the emperor or king of the Romans alone.

b II. AND also the seat and table of the empress or queen shall be erected at the side, and lower by three feet than that of the emperor or king of the Romans, but higher also by three feet than those of the electors. As to the tables and seats of the electors, they shall be erected all of the same height.

III. SEVEN tables shall be erected for the seven electors, ecclesiastic and secular, at the bottom of the imperial table, namely, three on the right side, and three on the left, and the seventh directly over-against the emperor or king of the Romans, in the same order as we have prescribed in the chapter of the seats and rank of the electoral princes, so that no one of what quality and rank soever, shall place himself at their tables, or in the spaces betwixt them.

c IV. NONE of the said electoral princes, after having performed his office, shall be allowed to go and sit down at the table prepared for him, before all the other electors his colleagues, shall have also performed their offices: but when any one of them, or more, shall have performed theirs, they shall retire nigh the table, and there shall keep themselves on foot, till all the rest having also finished the said duties of their offices, they shall all sit down at the same time, each at his own table.

d V. FORASMUCH as we find by very certain relations and traditions, so antient, that there is no remembrance of the contrary, that it hath been always happily observed, that the election of a king of the Romans, future emperor, ought to be kept in the city of Frankfort, and the coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle; and that the elected emperor ought to hold his first royal court at Nuremberg: therefore we will, for many reasons, that the same be practised in time coming, provided there be no lawful hindrance.

VI. As oft as any elector, ecclesiastic or secular, who shall have been called to the imperial court, cannot for some lawful reason go there in person, or that he shall send an ambassador or deputy; that ambassador, of what rank or quality soever, although, in virtue of his power, he ought to be admitted in the place of him he represents, shall not sit down at the table appointed for him that shall have sent him.

e LASTLY, All the ceremonies of this imperial court being ended, all the scaffolding or building of wood, which shall have been made for the seat, and for the tables of the emperor or king of the Romans, and the electoral princes assembled for these solemn ceremonies, or to give the investiture of fiefs, shall belong to the master of the household.

C H A P. XXIX.

Of the Rights of the Officers, when the Princes do Homage for their Fiefs to the Emperor or King of the Romans.

f I. WE ordain by this present imperial edict, that whenever the electoral princes, ecclesiastic as well as secular, shall receive their fiefs, or sovereign rights, from the hands of the emperor or king of the Romans, they shall not be obliged to pay or give any thing to any one. For as the money which is paid under this pretext is due to the officers, and as the electoral princes have the superiority over all the officers of the imperial court, having even in these kinds of offices their deputies established and hired for that purpose by the emperors, it were absurd, that deputed officers should demand money or presents from their superiors, unless the said electoral princes shall have a mind to give them any thing out of their own good will and liberality.

g II. BUT the other princes of the empire, ecclesiastic as well as secular, when receiving their fiefs, as we have said, of the emperor or king of the Romans, shall give to the officers of the imperial or royal court, each sixty-three marks and a quarter of silver; unless any one of them can prove his exemption, and make appear, that by an imperial or royal privilege he is dispensed with from paying the said sum, and all the other rights usually paid when the investiture is taken; and it shall be the master of the household of the emperor peror or king of the Romans, who shall divide the said sum of sixty-three marks and a quarter of silver, in the manner following, a

FIRST, he shall take ten marks of it himself : he shall give as much of it to the chancellor of the empire or king of the Romans : to the secretaries, notaries, and directors, three marks ; and to him who seals, for the wax and parchment, a quarter, without obliging the chancellor or secretaries to give any thing for it, besides a certificate of the fief received, or of the simple letters of investiture. In like manner, the master of the household shall give, of the said sum, ten marks to the cup-bearer of Limburg, ten to the master of the kitchen of Nortemberg, ten to the vice-marshal of Papenheim, and ten to the vice-chamberlain of Falkenstein, provided they be personally present at these investitures, and there perform the duties of their offices ; otherwise and in their absence, the officers of the court of the emperor or king of the Romans, who shall perform the duty of the absent, and shall have had the trouble of it, shall also receive the profit and advantages. b

III. BUT when the prince mounted on horseback, or on any other beast, shall receive the investiture of his fiefs from the emperor or king of the Romans, whatever that beast may be it shall belong to the grand marshal, that is to say, to the duke of Saxony, if he is present, if not to his vice marshal of Papenheim, and in his absence to the marshal of the emperor's court.

C H A P. XXX.

Of the Instruction of the Electoral Princes in the Languages. c

I. FORASMUCH as the majesty of the holy Roman empire ought to prescribe laws, and command people of different nations, manners, customs, and of different languages, it is reasonable, and the wisest judge it so, that the electoral princes, who are the pillars and key-stones of the empire, be instructed, and have the knowledge of several languages, because, being obliged to ease the emperor in his most important affairs, it is necessary that they understand many people, and mutually make themselves understood by many. d

II. THEREFORE we ordain, that the sons or heirs of the illustrious princes electors, namely, of the king of Bohemia, of the count-palatine of the Rhine, of the duke of Saxony, and of the marquis of Brandenburg, who probably know the German language, because they ought to have learned it from their infancy, being arrived at the age of seven years, be instructed in the Latin, Italian, and Slavonian languages ; so that when they arrive at their fourteenth year, they may be skilful therein, according to the talent that God hath given them ; which qualification we judge, not only useful but necessary, because the use of these languages is very common in the empire, for the administration of the most important affairs.

III. WE leave, nevertheless, to the option of the fathers the manner of this instruction, so that it shall depend upon them to send their sons or relations, whom they shall judge will probably succeed them in the electorate, to places where they may conveniently learn these languages, or to give them preceptors and young companions in their own houses, by whose instruction and conversation they may be instructed in these languages. e

HISTORY of the UNITED PROVINCES, or Republic of HOLLAND.

S E C T. I.

Containing a short description of Holland; a character of the people; a view of the different departments of the republican government; of the commerce of the provinces; religion, &c. &c.

<sup>a</sup> A Variety of circumstances conspire in rendering the history of the United Provinces entertaining and instructive. The inhabitants of this country have ever been celebrated for their valour, their perseverance, and love of liberty, which remain unaltered amidst the vicissitudes of time, and the most singular reverses of fortune. The extraordinary revolutions, the complex form of the established government, the opulence, commerce, artificial beauty, and other peculiarities of this country, as well as the industry, frugality, temperance, simplicity, and natural disposition of the people, merit the utmost attention of the politician and philosopher. It is not the province of the historian to enter deeply upon such researches; but our plan requires that we should sketch the outlines of the situation, constitution, and whatever regards the present state of the country, previous to an historical detail.

<sup>b</sup> THE United Provinces, or Republic of Holland, consists of the northern part of the Netherlands, bordered to the south by Flanders, Brabant, Flemish Guelderland, and the duchy of Cleves; on the east, the frontiers extend to the territory of Embsen, and the bishopric of Munster, while some portion of the northern skirts, and the whole western coast, are washed by the German ocean; we include not the conquests of the Republic, which are precarious and eventual. The whole country is delightfully watered, and divided by large rivers, fine canals, and extensive lakes, that present a scene exquisitely beautiful and astonishing to the eye of a stranger. From this happy disposition of land and water, Holland derives the utmost commercial advantages: domestic industry is promoted by the facility of carriage, and foreign trade absolutely required from the small proportion of fertile soil, to the number of inhabitants. No part of Europe, of the same extent, contains half the number of beautiful cities, towns, and villages, all distinguished by an air of nearness peculiar to Holland. Every street, we may say every farm, is bordered by a canal; ships and houses are almost every where blended together, and half the people seem to live upon the waters. Some inconveniences however attend the natural situation of the provinces. To render the soil fertile, it is usual at certain seasons to open the sluices, and overflow great part of the country; when the waters are drawn off, heaps of mud and slime remain, which impregnate the air with noxious exhalations, productive of various diseases. This defect in the atmosphere is however considerably corrected by frequent sharp and keen easterly winds, that purify the air, but on account of their suddenness and severity prove dangerous to the human constitution. Sir William Temple, an accurate observer, relates, that he has seen a moist hot southern wind instantly yield to chilling eastern blasts, without any intermediate temperature: in his own words, they succeed like the cold and hot fits of an ague. We may likewise reckon among the inconveniences of Holland, the great obstruction to commerce, from the long and rigorous frosts which entirely shut up the canals; and the extreme flatness of the lands, sunk below the level of the waters, and secured from inundations by vast dykes, kept in repair at a prodigious expence <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> As to the manners of the people, like those of every other nation, they are influenced by the climate and the nature of the government. Cold, phlegmatic, uninventive, and brutal, they prosecute every measure with indefatigable perseverance, and accomplish the most arduous attempts, without a spark of genius, of liberality, or the true spirit of enterprise; by the single virtue of patience they have become proficient in science and the arts. Holland has produced poets, painters, and sculptors; wits of the first class have started up, like grapes in Siberia, contrary to the usual course of nature; but these are phenomena which appear like comets, only once in a century, to excite the astonishment of mankind. In general, every passion, every appetite, except that of gain, seems extinguished; quarrels are seldom seen, unless occasioned by drunkenness; jealousy is never felt, and love is unknown among Dutchmen. The dulness and insensibility of the Batavians became proverbial among the ancients; their descendants are no less distinguished by the moderns for their want of feeling, of refinement, and of passion. The reader will form a sufficient idea of the national character from a single observation of Sir William Temple. “I have known,” says that ingenious writer, a man employed four and twenty years about the making and perfecting a globe, and another thirty in the inlaying of a table.”<sup>b</sup> In a word, invincible patience, and an invariable attachment to self-interest, are the lineaments that distinguish and mark the character of a Hollander. Spain has had proofs of their courage, France has experienced their arrogance, and Great Britain still bears shameful and unrevenge marks of their avarice and cruelty.

Government
of the cities.

THE government of the republic has in it something no less peculiar than the temper of the inhabitants; we can indeed easily trace the latter in the former. Caution and phlegmatic prudence appear in their tedious deliberations, a solicitous regard to freedom in every part of the constitution; composed of seven sovereign provinces, each enjoying its own independent privileges, the state may be termed a confederacy, united by one common interest, and founded upon the league formed at Utrecht, to oppose the tyranny and oppression of Philip II. Guelderland, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Overijssel, Groningen, and Friesland, are all separate republics, acknowledging no authority, subordinate to no other power than that vested in their particular states; even the provinces are divided into smaller republics. Every city possesses certain sovereign privileges; and in the provincial states resolutions are formed, not by a majority, but concurrence of voices. The provincial states cannot seize an offender, pardon a crime, or frame laws, within the jurisdiction of a city. Every thing relative to itself, and unconnected with the rest of the provinces, is transacted by its own magistrates: for instance, the sovereign authority resides in the senate of each city; the office of senator continues for life, and formerly the members of this supreme court were elected by the freemen and burghers: now the power of filling vacant places is in the standing senate; whence the government of each city is aristocratical. From this it may be supposed, that the people have absolutely surrendered their privileges; but when we consider the check given to this oligarchy by the annual burgomasters, the small emolument of office, the simplicity required in magistrates, their numerous connections with the body of the people, we shall find that liberty is strictly guarded, while the inconveniences of tumultuous assemblies are avoided. It would be descending to a tedious minuteness to enter upon a description of each particular city-office; sufficient it is, that burgomasters are elected by a majority of voices in the senate; that they preside by turns; that they represent the dignity of the government, and support the honour of the city upon all occasions; that they dispose of all inferior offices, issue out money from the common treasury, for the safety, convenience, and all the expences of the city. Great trust, dignity, and authority, are annexed to this office; yet the salary scarce amounts to 60 l. per annum; nor do the burgomasters assume more state than ordinary citizens in their habits, their attendance, their tables, or any part of their domestic conduct.<sup>c</sup>

states.

THE provincial states are composed of deputies chosen by the senate. Here is lodged the sovereign power, and in certain cases an appeal from the city-judicatures. The reader will entertain a clearer idea of the whole, by tracing the regulations of a particular province. In Holland the sovereignty of the province is represented by nineteen deputies, chosen out of the nobility, the senators, and magistrates; the nobles have only one voice, the cities eighteen, according to the number called Stemms. Amsterdam has but a single voice in the states, and the smallest city in the province enjoys the same prerogative. Though the nobility possess but one vote in the states, yet is their influence very considerable, having in their hands the vast employments civil and military, the direction of the ecclesiastical revenue, the right of sending deputies to the states-general, and the nomination of a counsellor in the two supreme courts of judicature. The votes and sentiments of the nobility are delivered by the pensioner of Holland, who assists at all the previous deliberations. Notwithstanding the vast credit of the pensioner's office, he is but the servant of the province, and takes place behind all the deputies; yet from the perpetual duration of his employment, the seat he holds in the several provincial assemblies, his collecting opinions, digesting resolutions, proposing all subjects of deliberation, and, above all, assuming a power to determine whether any important affair, on which the benefit or prejudice of the state highly depends, shall be concluded by a majority of voices, give the pensioner the utmost consequence in the republic. This is the general scheme of government in all the provinces; but with certain peculiarities in each, for which the reader must consult political writers. There is no certain rule for the sitting of the states in all the provinces; in Holland they assemble at the Hague in the months of February, June, September, and November: in the three-

- a first sessions all vacancies are filled up, forms renewed, and taxes adjusted; in a word, the general good and regulation of the province is debated: the last sitting is expressly set aside for determining the proportion of charges, to be supported by the province, with respect to the whole republic. On extraordinary occasions, the provincial states are convoked by the commissioned counsellors, or Gecommitteerde Raaden, properly a provincial council of state, composed of a deputy from the nobles, one from each of the chief cities, and one from every three of the lesser towns. This council sits constantly at the Hague, prepares business for the provincial states, and executes their resolutions. The general revenues of the provinces are managed by a chamber of accounts, who, besides this trust, have the absolute direction of the ancient demesnes, without being questioned by the states. A number of inferior regulations and circumstances peculiar to each province take place; but it is our design to exhibit only the general plan of the several departments that compose the republic <sup>d</sup>.

- WE come now to the union of the seven sovereign provinces, which may aptly be compared to the league of several princes, formed for their mutual security, repose, and defence: each preserves his own sovereignty, while he enters upon certain engagements peculiar to the confederacy; they are united into one body by treaty, but they are separated by their particular privileges: no one has the right of imposing laws, or interfering in the government of another; but he is absolute in what does not respect the league, and within his own jurisdiction. Some politicians have supposed the states general possessed of sovereign authority, because they are composed of deputies from the provinces that form the republic, and receive foreign ambassadors; but it must be considered, that the office of deputy continues but for a limited time, that the periods of their deputation are fixed by the provinces, and that they are incapable of coming to any resolution without consulting their constituents, and receiving their authority: out of the deputies are formed three several colleges, the states general, the council of state, and the chamber of accounts, which are to the republic in general, or the union of the seven provinces, what the departments of the same names are to each province. To the states general, the provinces send two or more members at pleasure; by this no variation is made in the determinations of the states, as resolutions are formed upon the votes of the provinces, and not the voices of the deputies. Should a province send twenty deputies, still it possesses but one voice. Almost all the provinces differ in the time limited to their deputies; one sends for a year, another for more, and some for life. Holland sends to the states general one of her nobles, who is perpetual, two deputies from the eight principal towns of the province, one from North Holland, two from the provincial council of state, and the pensioner. Every province presides in turn for a week, and is represented by the person best qualified among her deputies. This president is seated at the middle of a long table, the greffier or secretary at the bottom; and a foreign ambassador admitted to an audience, takes his place opposite to the president. The greffier, by order of the president, reads all papers, proposes the question, calls the votes; then the president concludes; or should he refuse determining by a plurality, his place is filled up by the president of the ensuing week. In this channel do all common affairs flow; but in cases of peace and war, of foreign alliances, of raising or coining money, or where the privileges of the provinces are concerned, then each distinct province or member of the union must be consulted, his assent procured, and nothing determined by majority. Never but in one instance has this constitution been infringed. In the year 1668, Sir William Temple was dispatched by Charles II. to form the triple alliance; in executing this commission, the utmost secrecy and dispatch were necessary: had the business passed through the usual forms, the scheme of the alliance would have been frustrated by foreign ministers, whose duty and interest it was to oppose it. Engaging the voice of one city would have effectually baffled all the schemes of the British minister; but he had the ability and address so powerfully to enforce the necessity of expedition, that the states general concluded three treaties, formed and signed instruments in the space of five days, without consulting the provinces, agreeable to the essential laws of their constitution. In this, however, the deputies hazarded their lives; for had the provinces disapproved their proceedings, their heads would have been the forfeit <sup>e</sup>.

- ANOTHER department relative to the general union of the provinces, is the council of state, composed of deputies from each province; here the number deputed is fixed and invariable. Holland sends three; Guelderland, Zealand, and Utrecht two each; Friesland, Overijssel, and Groningen, a deputy for each province; the whole council amounting to twelve members. Matters are concluded by the personal, not the provincial voices; and every deputy has his turn in presiding. Formerly the power of assembling the states general resided in this council; it also represented the states general during their recess, executed their resolutions, and judged of the necessity of their meeting. At the earl of Leicester's resignation, the provincial states obtained a power of continuing the states general by their constant respective deputies, under pretence of the too great authority residing in the council of state, who, to prolong and augment their own power, seldom convoked the states general. At present the business of the council of state may be reduced to five classes: their deliberations regarding the security, defence, and protection of the state; and the operations of the war: the orders for marching the troops, the regulation of military discipline, the superintendence of the fortifications, magazines, &c. and the administration of the finances, and proportions of the several provinces to support the general expence of government. With respect to the operations of war, the council always consults with the states general, except when profound secrecy and dispatch are required. The power of the council over the fortifications extends only to those places conquered since the union of Utrecht, and the provinces of Overyssel and Guelderland, which are deemed the frontiers; in a word, this council superintends the army, the garrisons, the public revenues, and the contributions raised in the enemy's country. At the close of the year it forms a sketch of the supplies for the current year, which it presents by way of petition to the states general; implying by the name, a request rather than a demand upon the provinces, with which they may either comply or not, as they see reasonable. Besides the deputies, the stadtholder has a seat and vote in this council; but he is excluded the presidency: at present the treasurer-general has a seat, but only a deliberative voice. We need not enter into particulars; enough has been said to point out the nature of this department<sup>f</sup>.

accounts.

To ease the council of state, and support a part of the load of public business, the chamber of accounts was erected by consent of the seven united provinces: its first institution was in the year 1607, it was confirmed in 1622, and considerably extended in 1651. It is composed of two deputies from each province, making in all fourteen. It states and examines the accounts of all the receivers, passes the accounts of the admiralty, and registers the orders of the council of state, with respect to the finances<sup>g</sup>.

miralty.

We shall conclude our description of the government of the United Provinces, with mentioning one more department of considerable importance; we mean the council of admiralty, in which the absolute direction of naval affairs resides. When the states general, by advice of the council of state, has destined a fleet upon any enterprize, and determined its force and number, all the rest devolves upon the admiralty, which is divided into five departments, or different councils, cemented however by certain bonds of union. The province of Holland enjoys the benefit of three of these courts, Zealand has one, and Friesland another: each is composed of seven deputies, four chosen out of the province where the council resides, and three nominated by the other provinces. Here the admiral, or, in his absence, the vice-admiral presides. Besides the care of equipping fleets, and issuing out money for naval services, the admiralty has a judicative power, taking cognizance of all crimes, frauds, and piracies committed on the high seas; or in the payment or collection of the duties upon merchandize. The revenue arising from commerce is wholly appropriated to the purposes of the navy. One circumstance of a very extraordinary nature, that fully displays the precaution of the government against corruption, or bias from consanguinity, or other attachments, is, that no person related in the third degree, influenced by dependence or obligation, can ever be deputed members of the admiralty. This is an indispensable law, and deemed so essential, that all petitions for its abolition have been constantly rejected. When a deputy is appointed, he must swear before the states general, that he was elected by fair suffrage, without the least exertion of undue influence or corruption, bribes or promises; that he will religiously obey the orders issued out by the states general, in concurrence with the provincial states; in a word, that he will promote, with all his ability, the general good of his country, without favour or attachment to any particular province<sup>h</sup>.

Of the dignity of stadtholder.

THE dignity of stadtholder, though not essential to the government of the republic, is however so important to its security, upon certain occasions, that it ought not to be omitted in a description of the political machine. This sovereign office would seem to owe its birth to the nature of the government, in which all deliberations are so tedious, as frequently to endanger the state. To remedy this defect, a stadtholder was created in Holland, as formerly a dictator at Rome, to answer present exigencies, and expedite measures. In the long war with Philip II. the infant republic stood in want of a head to support tottering liberty, and oppose the powerful efforts of the house of Austria. William I. prince of Orange, appeared of all men the best calculated to answer the purposes of the republic. He was then governor of three provinces, Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht; his ability confessed; his detestation of tyranny, and ardent love of freedom, had rendered him the darling of the people. He had exposed himself to the greatest dangers in the public service; he had formed the noblest designs, and executed them with a vigour and intrepidity, that justly entitled him to the character of a patriot, hero, and statesman. These qualities, and the necessities a of the state, raised William to the dignity of stadtholder, with the following rights and privileges annexed. He was captain-general of the forces of the republic, by sea and land; he disposed of all commissions in the army and navy; he directed the operations of war, and led the troops in battle; he had a seat, but not a voice, in the states general; he was president of the council of state; but to retrench his authority, and set bounds to the extension of the stadtholder's power, a council was given him, composed of deputies, from the states-general, and the council of state, who attended him into the field, and concerted with him all the operations of the campaign. Such was the origin, and such the authority vested in the stadtholder. We shall have occasion to mention further particulars in the course of our narrative: what strange revolutions, tumults, and dissensions this dignity produced; how b it was abolished by a perpetual edict, and afterwards made hereditary in the illustrious house of Orange<sup>1</sup>.

WHATEVER surprise the texture of this constitution, the nature of the country, and the disposition of the people, may excite, we shall find still greater cause of astonishment in the prodigious commercial power and wealth of the United Provinces. Politicians remark, that the most fruitful countries are seldom the richest. The necessities of life shooting up almost spontaneously, render the toil and labour of the inhabitants unnecessary. This damps the spirit of enterprise, checks that ardour excited by necessity, and renders mankind indolent, because they can live without industry or danger. In the poverty of the United Provinces we shall find the causes of the vast strides they made to opulence and grandeur. The c country, in a manner, produces nothing but pasture; at least the produce is very inadequate to the number of inhabitants, and the immense concourse of cities, towns and villages. Of the seven, only three are maritime provinces, and fit for the purposes of commerce. Not a single material for ship building is the growth of the Netherlands; the Dutch are forced to penetrate almost to the frigid zone for the fundamental requisites of navigation. Even the harbours of the United Provinces are incommodious. The disadvantages of the Texel are well known. At Helvoetsluys nature has formed a large basin of water, defended from storms by a variety of little encircling islands; but access is rendered difficult and dangerous by large sand-banks and ridges, that cannot be passed without pilots. The harbour of Flushing, though it has some advantages, is greatly exposed to storms and tem-
d pests. From Poland, and other northern countries, the Dutch, for a long time, drew the necessities of life. Still they are supported in these by dint of traffic. No country in Europe is so loaded with taxes. Every commodity, every necessary, pays a duty, to support the unavoidable expences of the government. War, the cruellest enemy to industry, has proved friendly to Holland. During a bloody contest, that continued forty years, the republic attained to the highest pitch of grandeur. Under such inauspicious circumstances did this common-wealth launch out in the pursuit of commerce and navigation. The civil wars in France, the troubles in Germany, and the religious persecutions in every part, crouded the Provinces with ingenious mechanics and artists; because here they might practise the dictates of conscience, and enjoy the fruits of industry, in security and repose. New manu-e factures were every day erected; and trades, too big for the wealth of individuals, were conducted to advantage by joint stocks. The destruction of Antwerp was the greatest advantage to Holland; it opened markets, before wholly engrossed by that opulent city. When Philip II. came into possession of Portugal, he prohibited the inhabitants from trading with his rebellious subjects of the United Provinces. This, instead of answering the king's design, proved highly beneficial to the republic. It gave spur to her industry, and forced her to attempt a trade directly with the East-Indies. The India commerce was put into the hands of a company, and managed with so much prudence, industry, and œconomy, that, in the space of six years, a capital of six hundred thousand pounds was increased to six millions sterling, after clearing all charges and expences. After this, the company rose with incon-f ceivable rapidity for a number of years; and though the profits have been long diminished, yet, in point of wealth, dominion, and real power, the Dutch East-India company is now infinitely beyond any other commerical establishment, and a potent state of itself, taken independant of the republic of the United Provinces. The governor general of Batavia has the court, the state, splendor, and appointments of a sovereign prince. He makes war and peace at pleasure; can assemble an army, upon the shortest notice, of thirty thousand men; and equip a fleet of fifty sail of the line, without building a single vessel*. The success of the fisheries, of the Levant trade, begun under the auspices of Henry IV. of France, and of the East-India company, gave birth to a company for conducting the trade to the West-Indies; which set out with an unexpected tide of fortune, and would have ascended g by continued progression, had not the large dividends made, the eager pursuit of conquest, and the neglect of the regular course of traffic, ruined that commerce. The Dutch were driven out of the Brasil, whence the Portuguese drew such immense treasures. Still, however, the West-India company is possessed of several important settlements in Africa, of some valuable islands in the West-Indies, of the profitable establishment at Surinam, and of several late-established factories on the continent of South-America. We have elsewhere treated so largely of the Dutch East-India commerce, that to add would be to render it prolix. Upon the whole, next to that of Great-Britain, the trade of the United Provinces is certainly the greatest; and that of the India company alone equal in value to half the commerce of Europe. As to the present low condition of Holland, as a maritime power, her temporizing, shuffling, and supine indolence, we shall advance no conjectures. We take up the pen as historians, not as professed political writers.

Of the religion of the United Provinces.

To conclude this sketch of the present state of the United Provinces, we shall subjoin a few remarks on religion, the remote cause of the grandeur of the republic. The restraint on conscience, the establishment of the inquisition, and the bloody persecution of heretics, excited the revolt of the Provinces, in the reign of Philip II. The reformists were unanimous only in denying the papal supremacy, and reducing belief from the authority of tradition to that of scripture. In a variety of other circumstances they differed, particularly with respect to discipline. Every leading doctor formed a sect; and religious sectaries became as numerous in Germany, France, and the Netherlands, as scholars of rival schools had ever been in Greece. All were equally obnoxious to the apostolic see, and the professors of the popish doctrines. They were stigmatized with the name of heretics, persecuted by the sword in this world, and damned to eternal perdition in the next. This indiscriminate persecution of the schismatics and reformists seems to have first suggested the idea of a toleration of conscience in the Seven Provinces. The multitudes of sectaries from Germany and France, that had taken refuge in the Netherlands, before the persecution commenced in this quarter, and the necessity of exerting every means to oppose the tyranny of Philip, after the arrival of the duke of Alva, in quality of governor, rendered an union of all the different sects, for their mutual defence, almost unavoidable. Accordingly, at the union of the Seven Provinces, by the treaty signed at Utrecht, every province was left at liberty to regulate the affairs of religion in the manner most conducive to her interest; but with this express proviso, that no man should be oppressed on account of his particular tenets, and that all should remain free and unrestrained in points of conscience. It is true, the superiority in point of numbers, of the Calvinists and Lutherans, procured an act, in the year 1583, declaring the evangelical religion the public belief, and enjoining that this only should be professed in the Seven Provinces; but policy has induced the government to wink at infractions of this ordinance; to favour no curious inquiries into the faith of any man; to offer no violence to conscience; and to afford the protection of the laws to every industrious subject, whose opinions break not out into expressions and actions prejudicial to society. The Roman catholic religion alone is excepted from this common protection; while Jews, Anabaptists, Arminians, Brownists, and Familists, are allowed the exercise of their several doctrines. At Amsterdam every sect known in Europe, almost in the whole world, hath its public meetings. The Calvinists however compose the body of the people. They are possessed of all the authorized churches in the dominions of the republic, and their clergy alone are maintained by the public, by certain salaries paid them by the state, without tythes, lands, or contributions on the people. Thus, freedom of sentiment has rendered the country populous, and softened all that theological acrimony and rancour that disturbs the tranquility of other nations, poisons society, and produces effects the most opposite to the dictates of true religion. Ambition and faction are here disabled from concealing their seditious designs and selfish views under the cloak of religion. In Holland, the difference of religion makes none in affection; Jews and Christians live in the strictest ties of amity; they argue without resentment, they dissent without enmity, and they agree without confederacy; all from the freedom of the constitution, and the coldness of the passions. All are citizens associated by the bands of society and government, under the impartial protection of indifferent laws, with equal encouragement of arts, industry, and genius; and equal freedom of sentiment, speculation, and inquiry. Whoever requires more, may be justly suspected of secret designs, arising from other motives than religion; or, at the best, he must be deemed unreasonable and narrow-minded<sup>1</sup>.

Containing the antient state of the Seven United Provinces. The revolutions which first reduced them under the dominion of the house of Burgundy, and afterwards of the house of Austria, &c. &c.

<sup>a</sup> FOR many ages the Low Countries have been the theatre of war, and scene of bloody battles. No soil in Europe has been so drenched with human gore, owing partly <sup>Ancient history of Batavia.</sup> to the obstinate valour of the inhabitants, but chiefly to the ambition of the neighbouring princes. The natives of the country now composing the republic, ever aspired at liberty and military glory; the one they regarded as essential to the security of the other. Julius Cæsar, having experienced the valour of the Batavians, employed them successfully against the Gauls; they every where routed and dispersed that ferocious and warlike people <sup>a</sup>. The Batavian cavalry bore the highest reputation, and the infantry fought with the same order, discipline, and intrepidity in the marshes and waters, as upon firm land: even the Romans dreaded their resentment <sup>b</sup>. They became the body-guards of the emperors, who reposed equal confidence in their fidelity and courage; Galba dismissed them from this trust, but with marks of favour and esteem. In all important expeditions, in every dangerous enterprize, where obstinate boldness was required, the Batavians were selected, as troops already sufficiently approved. They generally composed the forlorn hope of the Roman army, sustained the first shock of the enemy, and made the first attack with an impetuosity peculiar to themselves. Vitellius was so sensible that the fate of the empire depended on the Batavian cohorts, that, apprehensive of irritating them, he released their general, who had been confined for high crimes and misdemeanours <sup>c</sup>. They were exempt from tributes and imposts, in consequence of bearing the honourable title of allies to the empire. Afterwards they obtained the appellation of the friends and brethren of the Romans; but this was particularly applicable to the inhabitants of Betaw, an island formed by the Rhine, Vahal, or Wabaal. The government of this people seems to have been monarchical; and it is conjectured, that Clodius Civilis is descended from their kings; Civilis, that hero whose patriot eloquence roused the Batavians to throw off the Roman subjection; whose courage obtained many victories over the Roman general Cerealis; and whose valour shone more conspicuous and bright in adversity, after he had been defeated by the German legion. We know little more of the ancient history of the Batavians, than that the fierce and warlike spirit of the people obliged the Romans to maintain strong garrisons on the banks of the Rhine; that they revolted against Constantine; that they performed signal services to Theodossius in Britain; and that, with the rest of the empire, they <sup>d</sup> fell under the power of the Franks; were governed by Charlemagne, and his descendants, until, upon the decline of that house, the great lords and officers of the crown, taking advantage of the weakness of the reigning princes, rendered their governments hereditary in their families (A).

<sup>e</sup> AFTER the fall of Charlemagne's empire, the provinces of the Netherlands experienced frequent revolutions. Sometimes they were distinct and independent on each other; at other times they were united in one monarchy under the same prince. Some provinces had their kings, some were under the government of dukes, and others of counts. Frise-land might be termed a kingdom; Brabant and Guelderland, dukedoms; and Holland and Flanders, counties, or earldoms. Utrecht was a bishopric, the prelates of which became generals and sovereigns, wielding the sword and scepter oftener than the crozier. We shall exhibit such an imperfect sketch of the government of the Provinces under the period we are mentioning, as history authorises <sup>d</sup>.

lem, Leyden, and Delft, at the close of the eleventh century. Historians are unanimous, that Tbieri, general of Charles the Bald, was the first count of Holland. He was invested in that dignity by the sovereign, against the inclinations of the people, who hazarded a battle, and were defeated in the field, in defence of their liberties. Afterwards they revolted, forced Tbieri to take refuge with his king, and were a second time conquered, and forced to submit. To confirm the count in his new dignity, and secure him against future rebellions, Charles put to death every man who possessed any authority in the country <sup>a</sup>. It is farther asserted, that Lewis, brother to Charles, invested the same Tbieri in the province of Zealand; yet it is more consistent with the known policy of Charles and Lewis, to suppose that Tbieri only acted as his governor, or lieutenant. Of the immediate successors of this count we know nothing. Some historians speak of a Tbieri, marquis of Vluerding, supposed to be the descendant of the first count of Holland. His ambition drew him into a war with the emperor Henry, out of which his spirited conduct extricated him with honour and advantage. He afterwards, by accident, killed in a tournament the brother of the bishops of Liege and Cologne, which again involved him in a war. The enraged prelates entered Holland, laying waste all before them, and reduced Dordrecht. Tbieri met them, gave battle, and defeated them; but died of a wound received from a poisoned arrow <sup>b</sup>. His brother Florence succeeded to his territories, and with them inherited the war against the bishops, who had levied fresh forces, and again invaded Holland. They were defeated by the new count, who did not long survive his victory. In the pursuit he was wounded, and expired a few days after. It not improbable, that the Tbieri we have been last mentioning, was the first count of Holland, notwithstanding the express assertions of some writers to the contrary; and that the dominion of that province was obtained, not by gift, but by conquest. Both Tbieri and his brother Florence were ambitious, warlike princes: it is allowed, they greatly extended their territories, and it is not improbable, they incurred the resentment of the emperor, by denying his sovereignty over the province of Holland. Florence dying, during the minority of his children, Gertrude, his widow, took the government into her hands, and conducted the reins with so much address, that she obtained a peace equally advantageous and honourable. Young Tbieri, son of Florence, was frequently molested during his tutelage by William bishop of Utrecht. As soon as he came of age, he fully avenged the insults committed by this ambitious and perfidious prelate. We know nothing further of his government, nor indeed of the counts of Holland, until the province came under the dominion of the house of Burgundy. We are only told, that they were engaged in constant wars with their neighbours and powerful vassals, who were eternally stirring up factions, and exciting revolts, in hopes of recovering their liberty. In a civil war Florence IV. lost his life, being besieged, and taken in his own castle, by the lords of Egmond, Brederode, Amstel, and Waerden. His son John fell a victim to the turbulent and seditious humour of his subjects, notwithstanding he had sacrificed his prime minister Boerselen, to appease their resentment <sup>c</sup>.

THOUGH the dignity of count was hereditary, yet before they entered upon the government, the approbation of the barons, the chief lords, and the people, was required, to whom they swore religiously to observe all their rights and privileges. On their accession, the counts made a circuit to all the towns and cities, promising each, in particular, the security of its liberties and peculiar privileges. After they had taken the oaths, the people immediately paid the tax imposed for the support of their authority, which, in general, was very moderate and easy. According to the laws of succession, the female succeeded in default of the male line; hence it was, that the province of Holland frequently passed into foreign families, by marriages. At the death of William IV. Margaret, his sister, succeeded, married the prince of Bavaria, and annexed Holland to the dominions of her husband. As we cannot enlarge upon this subject, we shall only remark, that when the dukes of Burgundy became sovereigns of this province, and indeed of the Netherlands, they altered the ancient form of government, appointing a count for the government of each city, and a stadtholder in every province, to administer justice in their name. It was not before the 14th century, that the provincial states were established, or rather renewed. The stadtholder assembled the nobles and deputies from the chief cities, and, in conjunction with them, regulated the affairs of the provinces. Soon the states assumed a power of convoking themselves. This produced numberless disputes between them and the stadtholders. William I. of Orange, that great assertor of the freedom of his country, was engaged in constant contentions upon this subject, with the provincial states. The debate was referred to the duchess of Parma, who decided, that the states had an undoubted right to assemble themselves, but with the knowledge and approbation of the stadtholder. Afterwards the prince obtained a contrary judgment <sup>d</sup>.

- <sup>a</sup> It is mentioned, in honour of Guelderland, that it was the last province to receive the Roman yoke, and the first that asserted liberty, upon the decline of the empire. Charlemagne bestowed extraordinary privileges on Nimeguen, the capital of the province. In the reign of Charles the Bald, the people elected Otho du Pont their chief, and the government continued many years in his family. It passed from father to son, and would seem to be hereditary, but, in fact, it was elective. The people called the governors tutors, implying, that they elected them for their defence and security. By marriage, the government of Guelderland devolved on Otho, count Nassau, who was approved and confirmed by the people. In his administration, Guelderland was erected into an earldom, by the emperor Henry III. By his son Gerhard, the county of Zutphen was annexed to Guelderland; but whether by marriage, purchase, or conquest, is not precisely determined. Henry Nassau, earl of Guelderland and Zutphen, extended his dominions, and performed signal services in Italy to the emperor Frederic. This prince died in 1162, and was so well esteemed, that the people immediately elected his son Gerhard II. The whole of Gerhard's life was employed in waging war with the bishop of Utrecht. He entailed the county on his brother Otho, who succeeded him; but the crusade, at that time preached up in the Low Countries, healed up the breach, and reconciled the count and bishop. Gerhard III. who succeeded his father Otho, is distinguished only for encouraging monks, and building monasteries. His son Otho the Crooked, after sustaining the strangest reverses of fortune, and living for some time in captivity, raised Guelderland to a powerful, opulent, and respectable province. Arnheim, Gosch, Bemmel, Herderwyk, and other towns that lay open and exposed, he surrounded with walls, and strengthened by fortifications, conferring upon them a variety of privileges. After mortgaging the city of Nimeguen for twenty thousand marks of silver to William king of the Romans, he attacked and reduced it, annexing this capital of the ancient Batavians to Guelderland. Towards the close of his life, he was chosen guardian to Florence V. earl of Holland. The guardianship was disputed with him, but he defeated his enemies in a bloody sea-fight, before Dyveland, carried his point, and soon after expired <sup>k</sup>.
- His son Renaud was in hopes of enlarging his dominions, by the addition of Limburg. With this view, he married a daughter of the duke of Limburg; but the duchy was not annexed to Guelderland till the death of her brother Henry. It was disputed with the duke of Brabant, a bloody battle ensued, Renaud gained his ends, but he was soon after imprisoned by his ambitious son, and detained a captive for the last six years of his life. While his father lived, Renaud surnamed the Red, assumed no other title than that of son to the earl of Guelderland. His marriage into the house of Mechlin produced a war with the duke of Brabant, who claimed some part of what Renaud deemed his wife's fortune. The duke was defeated, and to the glory of a victory, Renaud had the additional honour of erecting Guelderland into a duchy, by an edict of the emperor Lewis of Bavaria. This mark of the emperor's esteem had almost proved fatal to Renaud. During his attendanc at Francfort, his dominions were invaded by the combined forces of Liege and Brabant. He flew to the relief of his subjects, met, defeated, and dispersed the enemy. In a word, this prince, so highly celebrated for his valour, clemency, and justice, raised Guelderland to the utmost power the province ever attained only to be sunk the lower by the contention among his children.
- THE younger aspired at succeeding his father, the elder maintained his birthright, and both made preparations for deciding the dispute by the sword. Renaud the Gross, the eldest, fortified himself in Tbil, while Edward, the younger, assembled an army at Nimeguen. The nobility and people took different sides; Edward was victorious; he took his brother prisoner, kept him two years confined, defeated the duke of Brabant, and was afterwards slain in a mutiny of his own officers <sup>l</sup>. His death set Renaud at liberty, and restored him to his right, which he lived but few months to enjoy.
- <sup>f</sup> BOTH the brothers dying without issue, the confusion of the province was augmented. Their two sisters disputed the succession; the people were divided. The lords of Eckeren supported the pretensions of Margaret, the elder sister; and the Bronchorst faction, always zealous for the younger branch, espoused William, duke of Juliers, and son of Mary, the younger sister. This civil war was brought to an issue only by the death of Margaret, by which the claim of the young duke remained undisputed. William distinguished his valour in several wars with the duke of Brabant, in all which he proved victorious. His dominions fell to his brother Renaud, who made war on the earl of Holland, fought the bloody battle of Gorcum, and died without issue <sup>m</sup>.
- By Renaud's death, the duchy of Guelderland passed out of the house of Juliers into that of Egmond. A daughter of William, duke of Juliers, and grand-daughter of Mary, his mother was married to the lord of Egmond. Her portion consisted of the duchy of Guelderland.

Guelderland and county of Zutphen; but her husband lived but a few days to enjoy this vast accession to his honour and dominions. It was his son Arnaud who first took possession of his mother's inheritance. Arnaud claimed the duchy of Juliers by the same right he held Guelderland. He maintained a war to gain possession; but the inhabitants could never be brought to acknowledge his sovereignty: at last, after having governed forty-eight years, he was confined by his own son, tired out with the expectation of succeeding at the decease of a superannuated father. The unnatural Adolphus entered upon a dangerous alliance, marrying Catherine of Bourbon, whence he became brother-in-law to Charles duke of Burgundy, who punished him for the want of filial duty, by depriving him of his dominions. The duke invited Adolphus to his court, endeavoured to reconcile him to his father; but finding him inexorable, he had him arrested, and then released old Arnaud, after first obliging him to sell the duchy of Guelderland, the county of Zutphen, and to disinherit his son. By the death of his father, and the duke of Burgundy, slain at the battle of Nanci, Adolphus recovered his dominions, uniting the dominions of Burgundy, Guelderland, and Zutphen, in his own person. His first wife being dead, he married Mary, only child and heiress of Charles duke of Burgundy, who had been forced into the match by the citizens of Ghent. They chose him general of their forces against the French king, and Adolphus was slain bravely defending Tournay. His son Charles, born of the last marriage, succeeded, and was taken prisoner and detained fourteen years by the enemy, during which time his aunt was acknowledged sovereign by the people. He no sooner procured his release, than his subjects received him with open arms; and indeed his conduct merited their utmost attachment and fidelity. Nothing could be more spirited and vigorous than the whole series of his administration; but he was at length obliged to yield to the irresistible power of the emperor Charles V. by which means Guelderland passed from the house of Bourbon into the Austrian family <sup>a</sup>.

Ancient history of Zealand.

WITH respect to the ancient history of Zealand, writers differ widely; some asserting that Lewis le Debonaire presented the islands that compose this province to the earl of Holland, provided he would protect them against the Germans; others, on the contrary, affirming, that the emperor Henry invested Baldwin earl of Flanders, in the isle of Walckeren, and all its dependencies. One writer in particular agrees to both assertions, and alleges, that the earls of Holland and Flanders were long engaged in the war for the property of Zealand. Certain it is, that the earls of Holland had the sovereignty of this province at a very early period; that the two provinces were always united under the same governors, and that they had the same stadtholder, when the desertion of the Netherlands produced the union of Utrecht. As we have already exhibited a sketch of the ancient history of Holland, it would be unnecessary to dwell upon that of a province connected with it in interest, laws, government, and sovereignty <sup>b</sup>.

Ancient history of the province of Utrecht.

THE province of Utrecht has experienced four different forms of government: first it was dependent on the kings and dukes of Friseland; next the government became ecclesiastical; or, in other words, the sovereigns were bishops, who extended their dominion over several of the adjacent countries. Charles V. effected the third revolution, by divesting the bishops of their temporal sovereignty, and rendering himself absolute master of the liberties and privileges of the province. The last change of government happened at the general union of the seven provinces, to oppose Philip II. While Utrecht was dependent on Friseland, it necessarily felt the revolutions which were ever changing the situation of that warlike province. Pepin Heristal first asserted the liberty of Utrecht, and recovered its independency; as he proposed fixing the sovereignty in his family, he omitted nothing that could engage the clergy in his interest. With this view, he not only assembled a kind of ecclesiastical council, but determined to restore the old custom of governing the province by states, in which the bishops and clergy should have voices: the happy influence of this institution shewed how wisely it had been projected; it continued under Charlemagne and his successors; and to the provincial state of Utrecht is the world obliged for that excellent collection of the ancient laws of the Franks. Pepin Heristal was not satisfied with diffusing happiness through every part of his own dominions; his soul aspired after a more universal benevolence; he dispatched missionaries to convert the idolatrous inhabitants of Friseland to Christianity. Willidibrod was sent to preach the gospel among those barbarians; Utrecht was erected into an episcopal see by pope Sergius, in favour of Willidibrod, and he became the first bishop. Charles Martel conferred many additional privileges on the infant bishopric; he endowed it with lands, and freely gave away what cost him little more than the trouble of framing the necessary charter. These were indeed happy times for the church; when the whole of piety consisted in liberality to the clergy, and the most profligate could purchase future felicity by founding a convent, or adding a few acres to the ecclesiastical domain <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> THE first bishops of Utrecht laboured assiduously in the vineyard of salvation; their industry and zeal were whetted by the ambition of extending their jurisdiction. As Christianity spread itself over the neighbouring country, so did the authority of the bishops, who made subjection the test of the sincerity of their converts: in a word, the superstitious generosity of the people, so increased the power of the bishop of Utrecht, that in a short time he became a powerful temporal prince, able to make head against the earls of Holland, the most formidable of the surrounding powers, and even the emperor himself. About the close of the tenth century, a descent of the Normans, the pests of Europe, almost wholly destroyed the city and province of Utrecht; nothing sacred or prophane escaped their fury; churches, houses, and cornfields were set on fire; the city was burnt to ashes, and the cathedral reduced to a heap of ruins; but Baldric, who had great interest with the emperor Otto, soon rebuilt the episcopal city, and procured such immunities as rendered it the capital of Holland, if we may credit some old verses inscribed on the wall of the church of St. Martin at Utrecht. Baldric was the first bishop who coined money by authority <sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 995.

<sup>b</sup> ADELBOLD, counsellor of state to the emperor Henry II. being elected bishop of Utrecht, carried his pretensions farther than any of his predecessors. Some historians allege, that he was the first bishop who made use of the sword to extend his power; but this is certainly a mistake, as we find the bishops engaged in bloody wars at a much earlier period. He maintained a long dispute with the earl of Holland, which they decided by the sword; and was afterwards engaged in a war with the earl of Guelderland. Adelbold's example was copied by his successors, who made equal use of spiritual and temporal weapons to extend their authority. Jealous of their ecclesiastical rights, they became warriors, and compelled where they could not inspire respect: sometimes they were supported by the emperor, but often opposed, their pride giving offence to the imperial authority: it frequently happened that the rigid exertion of their spiritual power, excited revolts among their own subjects; and the election of bishops was seldom unattended with bloodshed. The neighbouring states interposed; the competitors were supported by the earls of Holland and dukes of Guelderland; so that the sword rather than the votes of the canons generally confirmed the bishops.

A. D. 1017.

<sup>c</sup> As it is not our intention to give a regular succession of the bishops of Utrecht, we shall think it sufficient to mention the peculiarities that distinguished this dignity. What right those prelates had to temporal authority, will appear from the following observations. Utrecht was originally detached from Friseland, to be erected into an episcopal see: the bishops, by extending their authority over the surrounding towns and cities, came to be obeyed as sovereigns; they were elected by the city and chapter, and, after taking possession of the episcopal throne, acknowledged and obeyed as temporal sovereigns. All seditions, tumults, and revolts among the people, were punished as rebellions against the lawful sovereigns. The bishop's jurisdiction extended beyond his own province. Woerden, a city properly belonging to Holland, had long been the subject of contention between the bishops and earls. Bodegrave had likewise occasioned wars between the bishops of Utrecht and earls of Holland; and although the latter possessed certain castles at Dordrecht, where they often resided; yet the bishops claimed a temporal authority over half the island. To the time of Henry of Bavaria, the episcopal jurisdiction extended over Overijssel, and the greater part of Friseland. Henry sold the sovereignty to Charles V. and in the instrument of sale are reckoned the towns of Zell, Dipenheim, Coeverde, Oldenzeel, and the territory of Drenth.

<sup>d</sup> SEVERAL changes in the magistracy of Utrecht happened under William de Nassau: that prelate became the most illustrious of his age, though his parentage was unknown, and his ignorance so extraordinary, that the pope refused him a bull, at a period when no great portion of learning was required to qualify for a bishopric. William was engaged in constant disputes with his neighbours, and with his own subjects; at last, their rebellion became so general, that they banished the nobility, who had sided with the bishop; changed the form of government, and lodged the legislative power in the people; artisans and mechanics were divided into companies, each of which had a vote in the election of magistrates. The new magistrates regulated the affairs of the city, changed the seal and the arms in despite of the bishop, who was at last compelled to renounce his dignity.

A. D. 1288.

<sup>e</sup> WILLIAM of Mechlin was the first of the succeeding prelates who attempted to restore the episcopal authority; his efforts were bold, but unsuccessful: the magistrates of Utrecht, seconded by the Hollanders, made him prisoner. He broke out of confinement, fled to Rome, levied an army, and waged war against his subjects: often vigorous, sometimes vanquished, he fell at last in battle; leaving the magistrates and people in the full possession of their liberties, and the supreme authority. His successor, less enterprising and ambitious, prudently confirmed the privileges of the magistrates, granting them charters to that effect; which he had scarce signed, when he suddenly expired. The succeeding bishops made a handle of this extraordinary event, as if it had been a judgment from heaven to avenge the impiety of surrendering the rights of the church. They endeavoured to recover the authority of which they were unjustly divested; long struggles ensued, and the people, whenever they found themselves unable to resist, called in the assistance of some neighbouring power. David, the natural son of Philip duke of Burgundy, was so violently opposed by the magistrates, that he abdicated the episcopal throne. Frederic prince of Baden being elected bishop, he retired to Mentz, unable to support the seditious humour of his subjects; Maximilian, to whom he was allied, opposed his dismissal, and prevailed on him to return to Utrecht: he might have lived in peace, had not his ambition and avarice again obliged the people to revolt. Philip, the bastard son of Philip of Burgundy, was next elected: as this prince had always been bred at court, where he had learned only the art of war and politics, he found himself greatly embarrassed with the ecclesiastical dignity. In his spiritual capacity Philip acquired no great reputation; he therefore pursued the maxims of a temporal prince, rendered himself respectable by his prudence, and formidable by his valour: the troops of France and Guelderland experienced his ability in the field. Erasmus highly extols this prelate; but his amours drew upon him the censures of the church.

HITHERTO the bishops of Utrecht were the friends and allies of the imperial crown; Charles V. wanted an opportunity of appropriating the sovereignty to himself; and he succeeded in the following manner: Henry, son of the count palatine of Bavaria, was preferred to a great number of other competitors, and elected bishop of Utrecht by a great majority; he was hardly established in his new dignity, when he cited the senate and magistrates of Amsterdam before his tribunal, for permitting clandestine marriages. Instead of obeying the prelate's summons, the Hollanders preferred their complaints to Charles V. as earl of Holland. That prince annulled the bishop's sentence, and removed the excommunication denounced against the senate; declaring both were unjust, arbitrary, and contrary to the privileges of the city. His ambition did not stop here; he encroached on the liberties of Utrecht, and so excited the resentment of the people, that one day they shut the gates and denied him entrance. The prelate raised an army, the magistrates called in the forces of Guelderland, a bloody war commenced, and the country was desolated by the episcopal forces, who destroyed all before them with fire and sword: he soon, however, was unable to support his army; the troops mutinied for want of pay, and the bishop applied to the emperor for money. Charles, like a true politician, seized this opportunity of accomplishing his design; he furnished the sum required, on condition that the bishop ceded to him the sovereignty of Utrecht and its dependencies. The first treaty was signed at Schoonhoven; but the magistrates and people, incensed at the bishop's dishonourable proceedings, so contrary to their liberties, deposed him, elected another, and resolved to defend their privileges against all the power of the empire. In the short war that ensued, the province was cruelly harassed, but the spirit of the people was invincible: at length, some persons attached to the emperor and the deposed prelate, privately introduced a body of imperial forces into the city, the bishop returned, and made his public entrance, and three days after proposed to the clergy and council the necessity of yielding to the emperor, and making entire cession of the sovereignty to a prince able to protect them, and who would undoubtedly obtain by force what they now had an opportunity of granting as a favour. Warm debates arose in the assembly, but to little purpose, as the town was already in the possession of the Imperialists. At length, all agreed in signing an instrument, whereby the sovereignty was perpetually vested in the house of Austria.

SOME years after Charles V. united the province to Holstein and Zealand. An instrument was drawn up, whereby the provinces were to be governed by the stadtholder, cemented so strictly as never to be separated by marriage, sale, bargain or engagement, and united so intricately, that the same laws should take place in all; criminals banished from one province should not be screened in another; in a word, it was proposed, that the government, money, customs, and laws, should be the same in Holland, Utrecht, and Zealand; each however, reserving its own peculiar rights, exclusive of the general union. This plan of union could not, however, for a long time be rendered complete, or fully executed; it was nevertheless renewed in 1584. The other provinces were alarmed at the confederacy; but such arguments were urged as quieted their apprehensions; and the union at last became general among the seven provinces.

No people on earth were more passionately enamoured of liberty, or more obstinate in the defence of freedom, than the inhabitants of Friseland. The fortune, the military skill,

- a the power of the Romans however prevailed. Drusus attacked them in every quarter with such irresistible impetuosity, that they were forced to submit to the Roman empire. At the death of this general they revolted, massacred all the Romans in the province, defeated the army sent against them under Apronius, and again gloriously recovered their liberty, after having lived forty years in subjection *. Complaints were carried to the emperor Nero, that the Frisons had not only abjured his sovereignty, but seized upon certain land belonging to the empire, and allotted for the maintenance of the Roman troops. The ambassadors of the province boldly appeared at court, asserted to the emperor's face, that no nation exceeded the Frisons in equity and valour; protested their desire of living in amity with the Romans, but not in subjection; and concluded with demanding a place in Pompey's theatre, to which they understood they had a right as ambassadors w.

- b For a long series of years the Friselanders enjoyed their liberty; but most historians relate, that on the decline of the Roman empire, they fell under the dominion of the Franks. Adalgise, who is considered as the first Christian king of Friseland, refused to pay the Franks homage; a war ensued, and Pepin was forced to give battle to Radbode, the succeeding monarch, who pursued the independent system of his father. Radbode was defeated, but his valour procured him Pepin's esteem, whose daughter he married. This harmony was of short duration; Charles Martel returned with a numerous army, gave battle to Radbode, A. D. 715. and was compleatly overthrown, with prodigious slaughter: Charles left the Friselanders unmolested, while he had other business in hand; but as soon as he was at liberty, he determined to wipe off the late dishonour. He invaded the province with a formidable squadron and numerous army, fought divers bloody battles, and at last so far subdued the spirit of the inhabitants, that they consented to acknowledge his superiority, but not his sovereignty: the former expression was equivocal; the latter would be a plain confession that they were subdued *. Under Charlemagne the province was absolutely conquered, the Friselanders agreeing to pay a tribute of thirty pounds of silver annually. It was the policy of Charlemagne to govern the province by counts or lieutenants: Friseland was assigned to the direction of a governor, with the title of Potestas or Podestad. Forteman the Great was the first person invested with this title and employment; he presided at courts of justice, representing the emperor's person, and executed all the orders of the imperial court. The great services performed by Forteman and the Friselanders, against the Saxons, so won upon Charlemagne that he exempted the province from every mark of servitude, declared it free, and left the inhabitants to fix upon what plan of government they thought proper. They made no alteration, but continued Forteman for his life in the government.

- c THE administration of Ludigman, the second podestad, was less fortunate. In his time the province was invaded by the Normans, and after the defeat of the Friselanders wholly destroyed; those barbarians sparing no sex, age, or condition. Haarman, the fourth podestad, was in the same manner infested by the Danes, enemies no less cruel than the Normans. Sigefrid, their king, exerted the most despotic tyranny; but the valour of Haarman rescued the Friselanders, expelled the Danes, and slew their king. Galem, the next podestad, took every precaution to secure his coasts against those swarms of barbarians issuing annually out of the northern kingdoms. All his endeavours could not, however, prevent great numbers from settling in the country, where their descendants continued for a term of years r.

- d WILLIAM, earl of Holland, and king of the Romans, bestowed many valuable privileges on the Friselanders. He hoped, by gaining their affections, he should obtain the sovereignty of the province; but the podestad Sierdama, supported by a numerous body of the people, declared, they would never betray their country to oblige an emperor; and to convince William of their resolution, they struck a medal, on the reverse of which was this motto in Latin, "Liberty prevails over gold!" This was construed as an affront by William. A. D. 935.

- e He led his army twice into the province, and was slain in the second expedition z.

- f MARTENA was one of the most warlike of the podestads. He drove away the foreigners, who came in shoals to invade the province, defeated the Hollanders, burned the town of Enckbuse, the inhabitants of which made a descent on Friseland, and laid all the surrounding territory desolate. Many of the noble families, now flourishing in the provinces, are lineally descended from this hero. After his death, the election of a successor produced two violent factions, called Skirrangbers and Wathopers, which for a number of years filled the country with confusion and discord. Invingen, his successor, maintained his post with the utmost difficulty. Besides the domestic troubles, he had to sustain a foreign war against Albert of Bavaria, who entered the province at the head of a numerous army, upon some provocation. Invingen endeavoured, on account of the superiority of the enemy, to keep the Friselanders within their camp; but their impetuosity would submit to no restraint. They marched into the open field, fought with the utmost obstinacy, nor yielded victory, before almost their whole army was cut in pieces. Albert, leaving garrisons in the other towns, retired; and so low were the Friselanders reduced, that several persons refused to accept the dignity of podestad. It is probable, that the violence of the two factions rendered the office equally fatiguing, unprofitable, and dangerous. To please both parties, and in some measure close those wounds that brought the state to the last gasp, two podestads were elected, one out of each faction. This expedient did not answer expectation; the people ranged themselves under the banners of the different podestads, and fought with all the acrimony of inveterate enemies. Ambition had begun the quarrel, and now habitual animosity continued it; for all real cause of dissension was removed by the division and partition of the supreme power. The parties were gratified with all they could require; but they could not be satiated with blood until they had extirpated each other, and ruined their country. In what manner this province became subject to the empire we know not; but a declaration of Sigismund's, declaring it unalienable, and imposing a tribute, renders the fact undoubted. Probable it is, that the weaker faction besought the emperor's protection, and, as an equivalent, surrendered their privileges<sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 1417.

A LONG war between Joan of Bavaria, and Philip the Good, of Burgundy, ended in the reduction of Friseland, which passed into the house of Bourbon. Afterwards the province became subject to the house of Austria, but never recovered its liberty until the revolt in the Netherlands gave birth to the republic of the United Provinces.

Ancient history of Overijssel.

WITH respect to the ancient inhabitants of Overijssel, there are various opinions among the learned. To avoid critical disquisitions, we shall exhibit that which to us seems founded upon the best authority. All agree that the province was first peopled by a nation called Salians; but as several different nations bore this name, the difficulty is, to ascertain which of them first migrated into Overijssel. Writers distinguish the river Iffel into old and new; the former was called Sala, and the latter was the Fossa Drusiana, or communication opened by Drusus, between the Rhine and the Iffel, lower down than their first confluence. On the banks of the Old Iffel, or Sala, lived a people called, from the name of the river, Salians. In their neighbourhood were the Sicambri, and both were separated from the Romans by the river. Ammianus Marcellinus mentions their frequent irruptions, their warlike humour, the battles they fought with Julian, the services they afterwards afforded him, and the regard he expressed for this nation<sup>b</sup>. Tacitus describes their situation and manners so justly and expressively, that we can entertain no doubt of their having been the inhabitants of that country we now call Overijssel, which extends along the banks of the Iffel. To strengthen our conjecture, that part of the province bordering upon the river is still called Salandt, or the land of the Salians (B). And the river itself, which waters the province, was for many ages called the Sala<sup>c</sup>.

THE manners and government of the ancient inhabitants of Overijssel are admirably painted by Tacitus. They had a general, to whom they committed the conduct of the army. He held the title of king, but he was chosen by the people, and his authority circumscribed to narrow limits. The whole legislative power was in the people, and a part of the executive, particularly what regarded punishments. All public affairs were canvassed in general assemblies of the cities, or rather of the clans. Here a priest assisted, whose province it was to preserve solemn order and decorum. Each of the chiefs delivered his sentiments, and was favourably heard, in proportion to his reputation for eloquence, military valour, or patriot virtue. Shouts, cries, and the rattling of arms, notified the approbation of the assembly. Among the Salians were three kinds of punishments. Petty criminals were mulcted a horse, cow, or some other animal, which makes their code widely different from the Salique law, where fines were always paid in specie. Traitors were hanged on the nearest tree, and infamous persons thrown into the sea, or stifled in mud; and as to quarrels and differences, they were usually decided by single combat. It is absurd to derive the Salique law, so celebrated in Europe, from the customs of the inhabitants of Overijssel. Probability is strongly against this etymon, which cannot indeed be supported by a single argument besides the affinity of names. Several excellent writers have made it appear, that the Salique law is nothing more than an abridgment of the code of law in use among the Franks<sup>d</sup>.

CHARLEMAGNE introduced great changes into the government of Overijssel, which he conquered, while the king and army were engaged in France. Counts were created governors, to administer justice in the king's name. They were to be assisted by an officer,

(B) Writers mention a people called Salians, towards Lorraine, between the Rhine, the Meuse, and Moselle. Livy speaks of a nation of this name in Provence. Modern authors alledge, that some officers of the imperial court had the name of Salians. "Majores domus aut Sala." From one or other of these, they pretend to deduce the origin of the Salique law, or that regulation by which the female line is excluded from succeeding to the crown in France. It would be entering upon dry and tedious criticism, to follow authors thro' this subject; what we have said is all that can be asserted with probability.

- a termed Sculiet, without whom no act of the governor's was valid or legal. In the division of the empire, between Charles the Bald, and Lewis of Bavaria, Overyffel and the other provinces were adjudged to Lewis; but he was forced to support his right by continual wars with the emperor Lotharius, which desolated the country. Next Overyffel became subject to the bishops of Utrecht, more oppressive and arbitrary sovereigns than either the emperor, or house of Bavaria. This indeed was a power they assumed, but what the people never acknowledged, and which they only exercised when their fortune in war happened to prevail. Barnulph was the first bishop who rendered his dominion universal over that province; and he indeed governed it with all the rigour of an ecclesiastic, ambitious of power, and insolent in the possession. He, however, admitted the imperial sovereignty, as appears by his making application to Henry III. to confirm him in his jurisdiction. In a word, the intrigue, the capacity, and policy of this prelate, raised him to the sovereignty of Overyffel; for as to the emperor's confirmation, it was a mere empty compliment, made with intention to quiet alarms, and lull the jealousy Henry might entertain of the growing power of the see of Utrecht. At length, however, the inhabitants perceiving the aspiring views of the bishops, determined to set bounds to their authority. The most natural barrier of liberty that occurred, was, restoring the power of the states, an ancient form of government in all the provinces, and long neglected in Overyffel, under the kings, counts, and bishops. Whether this resolution met with opposition we know not. Probably the bishops dreaded discovering their real designs, by obstructing a measure so wholesome, so equitable and constitutional. The executive power still remained with them, but the legislative was lodged in the states, and the sovereigns, united in council. The bishops abused even this remnant of their authority. By the permission given them of wielding the sword, they engaged the province in perpetual wars; and though they were generally victorious, yet their conquests served only to depopulate and impoverish the country. Holland, Guelderland, and Friseland, experienced the weight of their arms, but the province almost sunk under the burthen of taxes, and the ravages consequent on a perpetual course of war. Frequently the people, who deduced no benefit from the most brilliant victories, opposed the march of the army, and when they found the bishops engaged in bloody wars, stood spectators of the event, and regulated their conduct accordingly. This cautious conduct of the states proves their inclination to throw off their subjection to the bishops, and likewise their inability, until those prelates were weakened by the violence of their conflicts, the number of their battles, and the extent of their conquests, which it required a constant standing force to maintain.

- But, besides the states, there was another check on the ambition of those warlike ecclesiastics. The lords or barons of the province, many of whom were powerful, and all absolute within their own jurisdictions, frequently armed their vassals, entered into a confederacy, and violently opposed the bishops. Bloody battles were fought, but the fortune of the barons prevailing, animosity and the desire of revenge stimulated them to solicit the protection of the empire, to admit the imperial troops into their strong towns, and to reduce the power of the bishops, by acknowledging a sovereignty more absolute and despotic, because it was more potent and able to enforce subjection. Even the first effects of this resolution proved fatal. The imperial troops, at first introduced, not being sufficient wholly to expel the ecclesiastical army, plundered and destroyed the country, under pretence of defending the privileges of the people. The neighbouring states took advantage of the ruinous condition of Overyffel. They made terrible irruptions, and fully revenged the defeats and disgraces sustained from the spirited conduct of the bishops. At last the province experienced a sudden and extraordinary revolution, owing to the prodigality of John III. bishop of Utrecht, raised to the episcopal throne by one of those bold strokes which the popes sometimes hazarded, to display their power, and procure a confession of their sovereignty. The situation of the empire had obliged the emperor to neglect the affairs of Overyffel, the episcopal see was vacant, and the chapter, in which always resided the right of election, raised the lord of Bronckhorst to this dignity. However, the pope thought proper to declare this election void, appointing a creature of his own, the secretary of the French king, afterwards known by the name of John III. The profusion and dissipation of the new prelate soon encumbered him with such an enormous load of debt, as rendered it necessary to mortgage a great part of his territories. He found means to involve the province in his distress; and, to extricate themselves, the states were forced to dispose of several fiefs, which greatly retrenched their extent of dominion. Zealand, Twente, and Vollenbove, were sold to the duke of Guelderland, and earl of Holland. John, however, paying the last tribute to nature, Frederic Blankenheyden was elevated to the episcopal throne, and soon redeemed by his penury and avarice what John had sold to answer the purposes of profligacy. In particular, he recovered the castle and appennage of Vollenbove, in which he spent the last days of

- A.D. 1412. his life. The parsimony of Blankenbeymen would seem to have restored in some measure the power of the bishops. The wealth of the episcopal see gave it influence, enabled the prelates to extend their views, and to build and garrison forts and castles, to restrain the insults of neighbouring states, and to over-awe the attempts of the people to recover their liberty. In this manner Florence fortified Hardenberg, which he made the place of his residence in Overyssel. But all these precautions could not hinder the people from revolting against David of Burgundy, natural son of Philip the Good, who was elected bishop of Utrecht. The inhabitants of Overyssel threw off the yoke, refused to acknowledge him, disregarded all his spiritual denunciations, and prepared to resist his temporal power. They even had the boldness to accuse the pope of corruption, and affirm that he had been influenced by the duke of Burgundy's money to confirm the election. Philip, incensed at the affront offered to his son, poured his troops into Overyssel, over-run the country with three great armies, and laid siege to Deventer. After a siege of nine weeks, the duke of Cleves offered his mediation, obliged Philip to relinquish the siege, and the province to acknowledge the bishop. David held the dignity for forty years, and died in the year 1497. Nothing extraordinary happened from this time, until the province passed into the house of Austria, Charles V. taking possession, in consequence of the cession made to him of the diocese of Utrecht. His son Philip II. was acknowledged in 1584; the inhabitants swore fidelity to him, but he did not long keep possession. The rebellion broke out in the Netherlands, the tide of faction became strong, and Overyssel followed the current of popular humour, entered into the designs of Utrecht, and formed a part of the republic of the United Provinces.

Ancient history of Groningen, and the Ommelands, or surrounding territory.

SOME writers ascribe great antiquity to the province of Groningen, deducing the name from some of the most renowned Trojan warriors. Such assertions are founded in imagination, and merit no consideration. But a learned antiquarian of that country proves irrefragably, that Groningen is the citadel built by the Roman general Corbulo, to secure the obedience of the Friselanders, or at least restrain their irruptions into the Roman territories<sup>a</sup>. This allegation is confirmed by a great number of ingenious remarks on the route of Germanicus, when he marched against the Cherusci, and particularly by the conformity between the governments of Groningen and of ancient Rome. In the former we find a senate, invested with sovereign authority, consuls, prætors, censors, and ædiles, and, occasionally, a dictator. Several of the laws appear to be founded directly on the Twelve Tables; and yet, after all, there are scarce any monuments of the Roman power remaining. From these circumstances we must infer, that Groningen was originally a Roman colony, which, towards the decline of the empire, raised itself to independency. It became afterwards subject to the bishops of Utrecht, though we are not particularly informed of the steps by which those prelates acquired the sovereignty. In the eleventh century, Groningen was a flourishing city, had a very extensive territory, but was nevertheless dependent on the see of Utrecht. The inhabitants revolted against Godfrey the bishop; he laid siege to the city; it was valiantly defended against Godfrey and the earl of Holland, and at length relieved by the emperor's interposition, who reconciled the bishop and the citizens. In this war Groningen lost a great part of its territory. The city afterwards became the subject of contention between the see of Utrecht and the earls of Holland. Each pretended a right, and the emperor claimed to himself the power of acting in quality of umpire, as feudal lord. Some time after Groningen flourished exceedingly, grew so wealthy and powerful, that, like Rome, the city aspired at the conquest of the neighbouring provinces, especially of Friseland. Albert of Saxony was sent by the emperor Maximilian to check the designs formed by the Gruns, for so the inhabitants of Groningen were called. The emperor proposed reducing Friseland under his own obedience, and thought it could not be more commodiously effected than by protecting the provinces against the ambitious views of the Gruns. A war ensued; Albert laid siege to Groningen, and the citizens repelled all his attacks with the utmost valour and magnanimity. After suffering extreme hardships, they entered into a treaty with the bishop of Utrecht, whereby they consented that a judge should be nominated by the prelate, to preside in the city, but under the direction of the magistrates, and with this proviso, that the city should be left in the full possession of liberty. Under the protection of the bishop they hoped to escape the imperial yoke; however, when it was proposed that they should restore to the emperor their conquests in Friseland, the Gruns boldly declared, they would rather hazard all than evacuate what had been purchased with their blood. The congress broke up, and the war was renewed with Albert of Saxony, whom they defeated. Albert died of chagrin, and left his disgrace to be renewed by his sons, Henry and George, who attacked the Gruns with great violence and impetuosity. Groningen applied for aid to the duke of Guelderland<sup>b</sup>; but the consequence was, that, after a tedious and ruinous war, the city was surrendered to the emperor Charles V.

- a As to the Ommelands, or country surrounding Groningen, it formerly composed a sovereignty independent of the city. That quarter called the Fivelingo was governed by consuls, generally chosen out of the principal inhabitants. On the decline of the state, the consular dignity dwindled into the office of Eschevin, or magistrate of justice. Several civil wars were lighted up by the ambition of certain families to obtain the consulship; and this might possibly be the reason why the dignity declined. The people found it necessary to retrench the authority of that supreme magistrate, in order to restrain the ambition of competitors, induced by the elevation in which it placed them, to aspire at the office. In the year 1280, a war broke out among the candidates for the consulship, that almost terminated in the destruction of the country. Houses were burned, fields destroyed, old men, b women, and children massacred with the most savage barbarity, and unrelenting animosity.

- ONE circumstance shews, that part of the Ommelands was subject to the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop of Utrecht. Ludolphus, one of the bishops, laid the whole territory of Fivelingo under a severe interdiction, for having espoused certain persons prosecuted for the violent death of a clergyman. But the Ommelanders long refused to acknowledge the sovereignty of the bishops of Utrecht, after they were possessed of the supreme authority of Groningen <sup>k</sup>. Nothing shews more clearly that they were an independent, free people at a late period. This farther appears from the frequent wars carried on between them and the city. In the year 1232, the cantons, if we may so express it, of Fivelingo and Drenth, c united against the city of Groningen, and formed an alliance offensive and defensive. They were indeed defeated in every engagement, owing to a new kind of arms used by the Grunts, but still they maintained the war with great obstinacy. It ended, however, greatly to the disadvantage of the Ommelanders, most of their chiefs being carried prisoners to Groningen, or slain in the field of battle. Another war broke out in 1252, in which they fully revenged the disgraces of the succeeding rupture. A mortality appeared among the cattle of Friseland, which made the Grunts raise the duties upon all merchandise, and particularly cattle, sent to their markets by the Ommelanders <sup>l</sup>. The inhabitants of Fivelingo, shocked at their oppression, and the barbarous disposition of profiting by the misfortunes of their neighbours, formed an alliance with the other cantons, raised an army, and laid siege to d Groningen. So spirited were the endeavours of the allies, that Groningen was forced to capitulate, consent to have her walls demolished, and all the forts and outworks raised. We shall close this account with observing, that the cantons were independent of each other, and only united by interest. Each had its own army, laws, and political maxims. They made war upon each other, and shewed every other prerogative of sovereignty. The differences of individuals became frequently the occasion of a war between the cantons, and nothing was more common than to see the whole country laid desolate for the most trifling circumstance. It was this want of union that at last brought the Ommelands under the dominion of Groningen, a more firm and compact body. This much, we apprehend, will be sufficient to convey an idea of the ancient history of the United Provinces. The detail was too e minute for an ancient history; yet is it a necessary introduction to the account we propose giving of the origin, rise, and progress of the republic of Holland.

S E C T. III.

Of the origin of the dissenters in the Netherlands, and the first seeds of the rebellion that began to appear in the year 1566 and 1567.

- f T H E Netherlands came into the possession of the house of Austria, by the marriage of Mary of Burgundy to Maximilian. Upon the emperor's resignation, with the whimsical design of ascending the papal throne, the Seventeen Provinces devolved, by right, on don John, prince of Spain. This prince died young, and left a son who did not long survive his father. Philip le Beau was the next heir by the death of these two princes, the one the brother, and the other the nephew of Joan of Arragon, his spouse. He mounted the Castilian throne in the year 1505, and died the year following, leaving his son Charles V. a minor, under the tutelage of Lewis XII. of France. Charles ascended the imperial throne by election, he succeeded to the kingdoms of Spain and Naples by inheritance in right of his mother, and to the Netherlands, as nearest heir to his grandfather. At his accession several of the provinces, now composing the republic of Holland, claimed a kind of independency; but the policy, power, and warlike disposition of Charles soon g reduced them under his obedience. When he resigned the imperial diadem into the hands of his son, the Low Countries were in a most flourishing condition; at least that part now termed the Spanish Netherlands. Philip could reckon in this small portion of his vast dominions above three hundred and fifty cities enclosed by walls, and six-thousand-three-hundred towns, all considerable, wealthy, and commercial. The number of the inhabitants was prodigious for the extent of the country. The Flemings were remarkable for their skill in navigation, their assiduity in commerce, and valour in war. Under the mild government of the house of Burgundy they became excellent artizans and rich merchants; during the warlike reign of Charles they were made soldiers, or rather they improved those military talents already arrived at considerable perfection by the perpetual ruptures among themselves, and disputes with their neighbours. This was the situation of the Netherlands when Philip came into possession. That prince was supposed perfectly to understand the art of reigning. He was master of vast talents, and could give peace or war to Europe without stirring from his cabinet. The Flemings had approved their loyalty to his predecessors; and yet, by a strange fatality, by the influence of superstition, and from a certain haughtiness of conduct, and arbitrary maxims which he adopted, Philip lost the affections of the Flemings, and a great part of his dominions. No period of history is more striking than this, and no war more important than the revolution which placed seven small provinces in a state of independency, in despite of the utmost efforts of the most powerful monarch in Europe. It is remarkable, that only the poorer and less populous provinces recovered their freedom; and that, in consequence of their liberty, they rose to an unparalleled height of grandeur and affluence, amidst all the horrors of a war, the most tedious, ruinous and oppressive that can be imagined. Roused more by despair, than well grounded hopes, and feebly assisted by the neighbouring powers, they encountered the most celebrated generals of Christianity, backed by the veterans of the Spanish monarchy, supplied with the money, and directed by the counsels of the richest, the most politic, and ambitious monarch of the age. The princes of the house of Nassau, who were the soul of the provinces, and the genuine assertors of liberty, were too inconsiderable to maintain armies above a single campaign; yet did their detestation of the Spanish nation, their love of liberty, their perseverance and courage, enable them to surmount every difficulty, excite a spirit of freedom throughout all the Netherlands, and form leagues, which, though of short duration, contributed however to the great design of effecting a revolution, and throwing off the galling yoke of servitude and subjection. In a word, the great grandson of William I. prince of Orange, became, in a little more than a century, the arbitrator of Europe, and the chief bulwark against the aspiring views of the house of Bourbon, of that very monarchy by which his predecessor was proscribed<sup>1</sup>.

The first causes of discontent in the Netherlands.

THE different characters of Charles V. and Philip were soon perceived by the nobility of the Netherlands, and this circumstance offered the first cause of chagrin. Charles was a warrior, he always appeared at the head of his own armies; whereas Philip embroiled Europe, governed states, and commanded armies by orders issued from his cabinet. The father was courteous, affable, and free of access; the son, grave, austere, and harsh in his manners. The one accommodated himself to the disposition and humours of the different nations under his government; the other was altogether a Spaniard, and discovered a partiality for that nation, which could not but prove disgusting to his other subjects. Spaniards engrossed the royal favour, they alone enjoyed Philip's confidence; to them all places of trust and profit were given; and the nobility of the Netherlands were excluded from a share in the government of their own country; at least, the places they enjoyed were of an inferior nature, and themselves subjected to the contempt and caprice of foreigners.

To these causes of discontent were superadded others on the score of religion; than which nothing more universally influences the human mind. The doctrines of Luther were already established in Germany; those of Calvin had taken deep root in France. The persecutions carried on against the reformists of both were of the utmost benefit to England and the Netherlands. The vast commerce of the latter required an accession of inhabitants, and the fugitives were joyfully received, without inquiry made into their religious opinions. The natural inconstancy of the human mind renders it fond of novelty; new doctrines, the most absurd, spread sometimes with inconceivable rapidity; but those of Luther and Calvin were adopted in the provinces with unusual credit, because they were congenial to liberty. Charles V. had published rigorous edicts against the Lutherans; and it is confidently reported, that in the Austrian dominions no less than a hundred thousand persons perished under the rod of persecution; but, instead of diminishing the reformists, their number was every day increased. Mary queen of Hungary, sister to the emperor, and governante of the Low Countries, observed the progress of the contagion; she endeavoured

- a to soften the emperor, and invited him into the Low Countries, to behold with his own eyes how persecution began hereby.<sup>m</sup> Charles prudently dropt his severity; but Philip proved inflexible. The more narrowly to watch over the reformists, an inquisition, similar to those of Spain and Italy, was established: nothing could be more odious to the Flemings than this detestable tribunal, which they loaded with just execrations, not doubting but their lives and liberties would soon become the victims of its tyranny and cruelty. The people in general were not more incensed at the establishment of the inquisition, than the clergy were at his erecting a number of new bishoprics, under pretence that the present dioceses were too large for the bishops to have an eye over their whole flocks. To maintain these new dignities, it was necessary to suppress several abbeys, and assign their revenues to the bishops.
- b Thus the abbots, instead of possessing the first place in the assembly of the states, were forced to yield the precedence to the bishops, and content themselves with an inferior station. Instead of three dioceses, the provinces now saw themselves encumbered with no less than seventeen; of which three were arch-bishoprics, that of Mechlin being given to cardinal Granvele with the dignity and authority of primate. The inferior clergy exclaimed against this proceeding, as an usurpation of the rights of the church; the nobility called it an innovation dangerous to their liberty, by introducing so many new members into the great council; and the people murmured at this additional restraint on liberty and conscience, by making such a number of spiritual tribunals dependent on the king and the apostolic see. In short, persons of all ranks and degrees
- c cried out against the inquisition and the new bishoprics, as a direct breach of the king's oath. But of all the discontented party, only two particularly distinguished themselves by their birth, their capacity, their alliances, services, friends, and employments: these were William of Nassau prince of Orange, governor of Utrecht, Holland, and Zealand; and count of Egmond, governor of Flanders and Artois, who drew upon them the eyes of all Europe. The former was born in Germany, of protestant parents; but having entered young into the service of Mary queen of Hungary, and afterwards into that of Charles V. he conformed to the religion of the court, became a great favourite of the emperor's, and received the most substantial marks of his confidence and friendship. Count Egmond was a native of the Netherlands, and enjoyed the most considerable posts, honours, and distinctions civil and military.
- d He gained great reputation at the famous battle of St. Quintin, and commanded in chief when the victory at Gravelin was obtained. Those two persons, very opposite in their characters, were equally esteemed and beloved. William of Nassau's genius was better adapted to the cabinet than the field; he was prudent, penetrating, popular, and plausible; his eloquence was specious, and his discernment happy in unravelling the most mysterious intrigues and negotiations. On the contrary, Egmond was a warrior, free in his speech, open in his conduct, familiar in his behaviour to the soldiers; but too sincere and honest for a courtier. He publicly expressed his resentment against the late severe edicts, the establishment of the inquisition, and the regulations made in the church; while the prince of Orange, then a hostage in France for the execution of the peace of Cambray, discovered the design formed by Henry II. and king
- e Philip, of exterminating the protestants, and gave notice of it to his friends in the Netherlands.

- f We have already seen cause sufficient for discontent, but the public murmuring grew louder, when Philip's intention of fixing his residence in Spain was known, when it was seen that he put the government of the Netherlands into the hands of the dutchess of Parma his natural sister, assisted by the counsels of Granvele, a detested ecclesiastic; that a demand of money was made for the support of the foreign troops, with which the provinces were oppressed; and that Granvele, in the king's name, had, at the general assembly of the states, in a particular manner recommended the persecution of the protestants, and made work for the inquisition. Before the king's departure the states respectfully petitioned that the foreign troops might be withdrawn; Philip thence perceived that his designs were suspected: he pretended to approve of the request; but, instead of complying, he resolved to prevaricate, by appointing the prince of Orange and count Egmond to the command of three thousand Spanish troops left in the country: both however refused the employment, as unconstitutional; but the truth is, they aspired at the government of the Netherlands, and were chagrined at the disappointment. What above all gave umbrage to the nobility, was the elevation of cardinal Granvele, in whose hands the chief direction of affairs were placed; they could not with temper behold the superiority of a person of obscure birth, an ambitious crafty churchman, and furious zealot. Three councils were
- g established at Brussels, one to preside over the laws and courts of justice; a second to direct every thing respecting peace or war; and the third to manage the revenues: but the duchess of Parma was particularly ordered to consult Granvele in every matter, and place her chief confidence in that prelate<sup>a</sup>.

Remonstrances made to the duchess of Parma, and to the king.

THE duchess no sooner arrived at Brussels to enter upon the government, than complaints poured in upon her from the ecclesiastics, against the proposed establishment of new bishoprics. She endeavoured to appease them with soothing expressions, refused introducing the new bishop at Antwerp; but said, that the king's orders must be executed in all the other provinces. The people exclaimed against the inquisition already beginning to exercise its tyranny. The prince of Orange and count Egmond blamed the cardinal, by whose advice it was erected. This prelate had likewise incurred the displeasure of Philip de Montmorency, count Horn, for having obstructed his promotion to the government of Guelderland. They carried their grievances to the governante, and the prince of Orange strenuously insisted upon assembling the states general, to apply proper remedies to those disorders, which must infallibly destroy the constitution, and overturn the government. Granvele opposed this proposition with violence; which determined the prince of Orange, count Egmond, and count Horn, to write to the king, that the only possible means of restoring the tranquillity of the provinces, was by removing the cardinal, whose insolence rendered him odious to the people. They promised, if their request was granted, to support the crown, the governante, and the established religion, with all their power and influence. Philip long deferred returning an answer to this letter; at last he replied, that it was not usual with him to remove his ministers, without suffering them to give an account of their conduct. He added, that he should be glad to have a more explicit account of the transactions in the Low Countries; he invited either of the noblemen to Spain for that purpose, and assured them of a favourable reception. An answer so general and unsatisfactory, obliged the prince, Egmond, and Horn, to write again in a more pressing strain, and acquaint the king, that they could not with honour assist at the council, while they were exposed to the insults of the cardinal. Philip's answer was so gracious, that they were encouraged to pass such affronts and mortifications on Granvele, as obliged him to retire to Spain; a conduct which the king never forgave.

Cardinal Granvele resigns.

A. D. 1564.

The decrees of the council of Trent published.

CARDINAL Granvele's resignation did not produce the expected effect. Viglius and count Barlaimont, two of his creatures, were admitted into the council of state. They possessed the governante's confidence; and trod exactly in the cardinal's footsteps. They pushed on the inquisition to persecutions, stigmatized the principal nobility as disaffected heretics, and broke out in the most ungovernable zeal for the catholic religion. Their violence appeared so unseasonable, that one of Philip's ministers represented to him the danger of a general revolt of the provinces, unless the rigour and severity of the inquisition were mitigated; to which that prince replied, "He had rather be without subjects, than be a king of heretics." Agreeable to these sentiments, he published the decrees of the council of Trent in all his dominions, ordering they should especially be enforced in the Low Countries, notwithstanding they were diametrically opposite to the rights and liberties of the provinces. It is said, the prince of Orange gave offence by the remonstrances he made on this head; it is certain, that the proposal for investing the council of state with the whole power, and abolishing the two other councils, in which Viglius and Barlaimont had great influence, met with violent opposition. The divisions produced in the council by this motion, the difficulty of establishing the decrees of the council of Trent, and the bold spirit of the people, who had wrested out of the hands of the inquisition certain persons condemned to be burnt for heresy, greatly disturbed and embarrassed the duchess of Parma. She approved of the scheme suggested in council of sending count Egmond into Spain, to inform Philip of the state of affairs; but the prince of Orange remarked, that it was of the utmost consequence the count should have clear and explicit instructions; by which he was thought to point at Viglius, nominated to attend the ambassador. Egmond was well received, the king remitted the rigour of the edicts and of the inquisition; all tumults and discontents were appeased, the prince of Orange and his friends were consulted by the governante in the conduct of affairs; and she, in return, was obeyed and honoured. The prince of Orange, however, entertained suspicions about the sincerity of this change in the king's disposition; and even declared publicly, that Egmond was either over-reached by the policy, or bribed by the money of the court of Spain.

A project for extirpating the protestants.

THE prince's conjectures, with respect to the latter, were too well founded; in the beginning of the following year, the queen-mother of France, and her son Charles IX. had a conference with Isabella queen of Spain, at Bayonne; the duke of Alva assisted, and it was pretended that this interview had no other object than a tender expression of love between the mother and her children; though it was shrewdly suspected, that the extir-

- a pation of the protestants of France and the Netherlands was here concerted. The prince of Orange made the first discovery, which was afterwards confirmed by an acknowledgment, that religion formed a part of the subject of the conference; and by the king's letters to the dukes of Parma, disclaiming the interpretations put on his instructions to count Egmond; ordering that the decrees of the council of Trent, and the imperial edicts, should be strictly observed; that the utmost assistance of the civil power should be given to the inquisition; and that all heretics should be put to death without remission. Astonishment and dread first appeared in every face, upon the publication of the edicts; rage succeeded, written libels were published, bold speeches uttered, and dangerous cabals formed against the government. The public indignation was increased by the terrible spectacles every day presented by the inquisition, of men perishing in the flames on account of religion. The constancy of the sufferers strongly moved the passions of the beholders, weakened the opinion of their guilt, heightened the detestation of the punishers, and inspired them with sentiments of revenge. Open mutinies of the citizens in several towns appeared, the prisons were forced, and the unhappy convicts rescued out of the hands of the executioner. A confederacy of the nobility was formed, never to suffer the inquisition in the Netherlands, under the force of edicts, visits, commissions, or any other shape or denomination this terrible tribunal should assume, as being contrary to all laws sacred and prophane, and the most arbitrary, execrable, and iniquitous species of tyranny ever devised or invented by human genius, fruitful in wicked expedients. The confederacy became general, and was subscribed by a multitude of catholics as well as protestants; by nobles and burghers, merchants, tradesmen, and peasants.*
- b So unexpected and formidable a shew of resistance disconcerted the dukes of Parma; she found that all resolutions of force and rigour would be unsafe for the government, now too weak to enforce them by the weight of authority. The confederates, headed by Henry de Bredenrode, descended from the old earls of Holland, and much respected in the country, went in a body to Brussels, and in bold terms petitioned the governante to abolish the inquisition, and recal the edicts against liberty of conscience. It was disputed in the council of state whether they should be admitted to an audience; but their numbers were so formidable, as to render a denial hazardous. The dukes used every possible means to appease the confederates; but they insisted so peremptorily on the terms of the petition, that she was forced to dismiss them with an absolute promise they should be granted; for which purpose she immediately employed all her interest with the king. In the mean time, strict injunctions were laid on the inquisition, not to persist in their persecution of heresy. Sir William Temple alledges, that Philip, in consequence of the governante's remonstrances, granted all that was required, but too late; all other historians affirm, that he was inflexible, and the dukes could procure no better conditions than that the heretics should henceforth be hanged instead of being burned. Even this appeared a concession unworthy of the king; the royal name was therefore forbid to be used.†
- c BEFORE the confederates proceeded to extremities, they sent deputies to Madrid; but, according to Bentivoglio, they were refused admittance into the king's presence. It appears however, from circumstances, that they found means of representing to the king and council, that the disturbances in the Low Countries arose from the detestation in which people of all degrees held the inquisition. Their remonstrances produced no other effect than a kind of promise couched in equivocal terms; and it was soon perceived that the governante had express orders to resume her severity, and punish with the utmost rigour every deviation from the established religion. Irritated with this conduct, the people broke out into open acts of rebellion; in several towns of Flanders, Holland, and Utrecht, the mob assembled, destroyed the churches, pulled down images, beat the officers of the inquisition, and committed a thousand irregularities, the effects of barbarous rage and brutish resentment: still however the nobility and more wealthy inhabitants kept themselves within bounds. They were unsatisfied with the government, but they dreaded the consequences of popular tumults as the greatest of misfortunes. Many of them united their councils and forces with those of the governess, to suppress the seditious and turbulent humour of the people. The prince of Orange and count Egmond were the chief instruments of the repose that ensued. Their moderation, authority, and the veneration in which they were held, operated so powerfully, that had the government made but reasonable concessions, the public tranquillity might have again been restored, and the affections of the Flemings regained.‡
- d THE submission of the people served only to augment the security of the government. A new oath of allegiance was now administered by the governante, and all persons obliged to swear they would regard as traitors and enemies to their country, all whom the king should think proper to proscribe. Egmond, and great numbers of the nobility, took the oath; but the prince of Orange refused to alter the usual form required by the laws of his country. He said it would be unnatural in him to swear the destruction of his wife and family who were protestants, and of consequence in the number of the proscribed. In the mean time, the promise made by the governante was wholly neglected. The persecution went on with redoubled violence; the fury of the inquisition seemed enraged by the short suspension of their authority. Thousands of wretches groaned under the extremity of torture, and breathed their last in bitter execrations poured out on the authors of their misfortunes. Troops were levied to support their diabolical tyranny, and the resolution was taken at court to send the duke of Alva with ten thousand veterans to put the last hand to the miseries of the people, and the despotism of the court. Upon advice of this final resolution, the prince of Orange, count Broderode, count Hoogstrade, followed by great numbers of the nobility and people, retired into Germany, apprehending they could not remain in safety under a government supported by violence and the sword *.

HAD Philip now granted a general amnesty, it is more than probable he might have still commanded the respect of the people; but it appears that he was not satisfied with enjoying his possessions in tranquillity; he must punish his headstrong subjects with the loss of their privileges. The duke of Alva, with the troops destined for the Netherlands, embarked at Barcelona on the 20th of May. The army was composed of the best Spanish and Italian soldiers, commanded by the most experienced officers which the wars of Charles V. and Philip II. had bred up in Europe. These on their arrival were joined by two thousand Germans raised by the dukes of Parma during the late commotions. Such a force, under so renowned a general as the duke of Alva, a man haughty, morose, severe and cruel in his disposition, could not but terrify the inhabitants, who beheld these vast preparations with astonishment, submission, and despair. From the character of Alva, the princess of Parma foresaw that he would assume the chief authority, though his commission extended no further than the supreme command of the army. She endeavoured but too late to divert the king's intention of sending an army into the Netherlands, assuring him that all was now in perfect tranquillity, the heretics either in custody or banishment, and sufficient garrisons in all the towns. She represented the outrage offered by the presence of such a military force to the privileges of the provinces; but Philip, who regarded these privileges as chimeras, pursued his resolution †.

ON the duke's arrival at Brussels, the governante received him civilly, and told him that if the prince of Orange and the lords of his party were treated with lenity, she was persuaded they would continue firm in their loyalty; but such measures were not agreeable to the proud Spaniard. He immediately made public the powers vested in him by the king, whence it appeared that the authority of the governante was greatly retrenched. Alva had not only the command of the troops, but the presidency of the councils of state, justice, and the finances. He had the right of punishing or pardoning crimes, and of rewarding all who had faithfully served the king. In a word, he was chief in every thing, civil and military, and the dukes of Parma was reduced to a mere cypher. He begun his government with removing the edicts against the reformists, and exerting the full power of the inquisition. Instead of the ordinary judges, Alva established a council of twelve, to take cognizance of the late tumults, and punish with the utmost rigour all who were suspected on account of their religion. The cruelty of this tribunal soon gained it the appellation of the bloody council. One Vergas a Spanish lawyer, was set up at the head of this iniquitous council, and it became a proverbial expression in Spain, That the gangrene in the Low Countries required the keen knife of Vergas. To this extraordinary board was committed the care of mortifying at pleasure the rights and privileges of the province. It annihilated the authority of the council of state, which never afterwards met but in the duke's chamber. All who had presented petitions, requesting that the severity of the religious edicts might be mitigated, were treated as traitors. Those who, from the necessity of the times, had connived at the protestant assemblies, were regarded and punished as heretics. But blood alone was not the object of this tribunal; it confiscated the estates of every one, convicted of any tendency to schism, or of shewing the least favour to the reformists. Part was appropriated to the crown, the greater portion went into the pocket of the duke of Alva, and was assigned as a reward for the barbarity of the judges. The towns in vain lamented the breach of their charters, the people of their liberties, and the Knights of the Golden Fleece of the privileges of their order. Their murmurs were muttered only in whispers; the terror of the new council seemed for a time to have deprived them of the spirit of resentment. Multitudes of people retired out of the province a into places of security ; and the duchess of Parma was at length forced to acquaint the king, that above an hundred thousand persons had, in a few days, withdrawn with their effects and money ; that the country would be quite depopulated, and that as a governante The duchess of Parma resigns. would then be unnecessary, she begged leave to resign before she should have the mortification and disgrace of being left alone in the Netherlands. Her request was readily granted, and the whole power given to the duke of Alva, with the same titles and badges of authority the princeps enjoyed <sup>2</sup>.

ONE of the duke's first exertions of the supreme authority was the imprisonment of the counts of Egmond and Horn. The prince of Orange, his brother count Lewis of Nassau, the counts of Hoogstrate, Bregue, Guylemberg, Broderode, and others, were cited to appear b in six weeks ; but they refused to acknowledge the authority of the citation, which determined the duke of Alva to condemn them as guilty of treason. Not contented with these processes against the nobility, he heightened, if possible, his cruelty to the people. Several protestants condemned of attending their religious meetings, were dragged by horses, with their hands tied behind, to the place of execution, where they ended their lives in the most excruciating tortures. The declarations of the inquisitor-general of Spain, and the king's edicts, confirmed and approved all that had been done by the duke of Alva ; whence it appears, that his barbarity was not entirely the result of his own inhumanity, but of the instructions of a merciless and proud prince, set at too great a distance from his subjects to feel their misfortunes. In a word, the king was inflexible in his determinations to c root out heresy, and deprive the provinces of their privileges ; Alva was the cruel minister of his purposes. The new army was fierce, brave, and insolent, desiring nothing so much as a civil war, in which they might enrich and distinguish themselves ; the people were enraged, but overawed and unheaded ; all was seizure, confiscation, imprisonment, torture, blood, horror, and despair ; punishments executed, and meditated revenge. Egmond and Horn, without regard to their quality, to their merit in the services performed to the king and his father, were publicly beheaded at Brussels, with marks of ignominy more cruel than death. The execution of Egmond, and the confiscation of the prince of Orange's estate, the two great favourites of the people, broke all patience. They now called aloud for revenge, invited the prince of Orange into their country, and seemed to lose all dread of the d veteran troops of Spain in the desire of recovering their liberty <sup>3</sup>.

IN the mean time the prince of Orange, and his brother Lewis of Nassau, were labouring to form alliances among the protestant princes in Germany. He made use of every argument that could influence the understanding or move the passions ; he obtained promises, but could raise only a handful of soldiers. He published several manifestos, which appeared so strong and unanswerable to the emperor Maximilian, that he voluntarily sent an ambassador to Spain, exhorting the king to treat his subjects in the Netherlands with less rigour. The embassy was haughtily received, Philip continued his prosecutions, and the prince of Orange his preparations to enter into the Low-Countries. It was thought adviseable to divide the Spanish forces, by making excursions on every side. A detachment of Germans, in e the service of the prince, attempted to penetrate into Brabant, and surprised Ruremond, but they were defeated by a corps detached against them by the duke of Alva. Another party, chiefly French, were preparing to push into Artois, on the side of Picardy, when their officers were arrested by order of Charles IX. Lewis of Nassau was at first more successful in Frise-land, of which count d'AreMBERG was governor. His design was to gain possession of Groningen, but he was opposed by the count at the head of a body of Spanish forces. Lewis encamped in an advantageous post ; but the Spanish soldiers, who despised his raw and undisciplined army, attacked him contrary to the opinion of the count. They were defeated, and d'AreMBERG, with above six hundred soldiers, was killed. In this action fell Adolphus of Nassau, the greatest loss which the reformists sustained. Count Megen was immediately dispatched to Groningen, to collect the scattered remains of the Spanish army ; and his vigilance prevented Lewis of Nassau from drawing any important consequences from his victory <sup>4</sup>.

THE duke of Alva was greatly chagrined at this first check to his power, and resolved to march in person to revenge the insult. A general muster of his army was made in every part, and he appeared so formidable, that the counts of Nassau and Hoogstrate were forced to retire to the banks of the river Ens, where they posted themselves in a situation which would have proved impregnable, had not the duke of Alva's expedition prevented their cutting down the dykes, and the scarcity of money excited a mutiny in their army. Thus labouring under insurmountable difficulties, they were attacked and easily g defeated by the duke, who put to the sword all who fell into his hands. The whole infantry were cut in pieces, the cavalry were saved by the conduct of count Schauwenberg,<sup>a</sup> count Lewis escaped in a small fishing-boat, and the baggage and artillery were taken by the enemy, whose loss was very inconsiderable<sup>c</sup>.

ALL this while the prince of Orange was moving towards the frontiers of the Netherlands with an army of 28,000 men, which he had levied upon his credit. After passing the Rhine and Moselle, and raising contributions in Aix-la-Chapelle, he defeated a party of the Spaniards at Noiteim. From thence he sent a defiance to the duke of Alva at Mastricht; but the duke ordered the trumpeter to be hanged, and returned no answer. The prince's superiority obliged him to act defensively; the loss of a battle he was sensible would be attended with the loss of the Netherlands, and the scarcity of money he knew must soon disperse the prince's army. He contented himself with defending the passages of the Meuse;<sup>b</sup> but the prince found means to elude all his endeavours. Had he, upon crossing the river, suddenly attacked the duke, it is probable he might have succeeded; but the soldiers being wet and fatigued, he halted a night to refresh them, gave the enemy time to recollect themselves, and even so to fortify their camp, as rendered an attempt extremely hazardous. It was obvious that the prince intended to penetrate into Brabant. The reduction of any towns in this province would have greatly forwarded his affairs, and the duke of Alva took all due precautions to obstruct his progress. He fortified Tillemont, Louvain, and Brussels, and considerably augmented their garrisons, at the same time that he cut off all provisions, and extremely harassed the prince's army. He baffled the prince's design of seizing upon Tongres, but could not prevent his receiving succours and refreshment at St. c Trois, and gaining the frontiers of Brabant. Here several skirmishes, but nothing decisive, passed between the armies. While they lay encamped at no great distance, the prince, on receiving advice that the prince of Conde had sent him a body of 4000 auxiliary foot and 500 horse, advanced towards Judoigne to effect a junction. In crossing the Geate, his rear was attacked by Alva, and after an obstinate conflict totally defeated and dispersed. This check, and the death of count Hoogstrate, mortally wounded in the action, damped the ardour of his soldiers; they deserted in crowds, and he was prevented by this and a variety of other cross accidents, from establishing winter-quarters in the Low-Countries. In the end, he was forced to disband his army, and return into France, whence he afterwards returned to Germany<sup>d</sup>.

He disbands his army

A. D. 1569.

Now was the duke of Alva at full liberty to act at pleasure. After entering Brussels<sup>d</sup> in triumph, he caused diligent search to be made after all who had been assisting to the prince of Orange. He destroyed the prisoners taken in the last campaign by the sword, the halter, by fire, and by water; his success only increased his insolence and cruelty. He now projected nothing less than the whole extirpation of the reformed religion, by means the most barbarous and inhuman; of enslaving the provinces, by erecting citadels in all the towns and cities, and of rendering himself despotic and arbitrary. He began with building a strong citadel in Amsterdam. The city in vain represented its privileges, and the prejudice which commerce must sustain from a military government. But the duke was deaf to all except pecuniary arguments; a large sum of money was given him, and the project laid aside. The duke's insolent vanity irritated the people more than his cruelty or avarice.<sup>e</sup> He ordered his statue to be erected in the citadel, built at Antwerp, to enslave this populous, rich, and commercial city. Here he was figured treading upon the necks of two smaller statues that represented the two estates of the Low Countries. So public an insult created universal discontent, and roused a spirit of revenge in the people, which soon received additional fuel. The duke demanded larger supplies for the support and reward of his victorious troops than ever had been granted. Assembling the states at Brussels, he required the hundredth part of every man's estate should be immediately secured to the government, to answer the present occasions; and that for the future, a tenth of all the merchandize, and a twentieth part of all immoveables, should be annually levied as a standing revenue. Fear obliged the states, after a feint resistance, to grant the first. Whatever inconveniencies might attend the payment of so large a sum, as the hundredth part of the whole wealth of the Netherlands, yet it was but temporary; whereas the annual tax on trade and estates would be a perpetual intolerable burthen, to which they resolved never to assent. Upon the duke's persisting, they petitioned the king by deputies, but obtained no redress. The duke employed promises and threats to enforce his demands, but the states remained fixed and unalterable. Incensed at their resistance, he sent the regiment of Lombardy, and several companies of Spanish foot, to live at free quarters in the province of Utrecht. He altered the names of tythes and twentieths, for other terms less odious; but the people were not to be gulled out of their property by so thin a varnish. The year was drawn out in disputes, altercations, menaces, promises, and supplications; but nothing was concluded, the duke was inflexible, and the provinces were determined<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> In this situation of affairs, admiral Coligni advised the prince of Orange to fit out a squadron of privateers to cruise on the Spanish and Flemish merchants, seize upon the supplies of money sent to the Netherlands, and thereby raise a fund for the support and maintenance of an army. The poverty of the reformists, who had but few resources from private contributions, was the greatest difficulty they had to encounter. In hopes of remedying this evil, the prince approved of the project, and a squadron was equipped under Adrian de Bergues, Lancelot de Broderode, Albert d' Egmond, and several more of the prince's adherents. In a short time they took an infinity of merchant-men, and even defeated some of the king's squadrons; but as no regular plan for saving the profits was concerted, they greatly annoyed the Spanish commerce, but contributed little to forward the designs formed by the prince of Orange. This shoal of privateers went by the name of Gueux, or sea-beggars; their number daily increased, and they became the terror of Spain and the Netherlands. However excusable the first design of the prince of Orange might have been, certain it is, that an improper use was made of the commissions he granted. The captains of ships paid no regard to flags; their sole aim was the acquisition of wealth, in which pursuit friends and enemies were plundered without distinction. Commerce was entirely ruined, and their depredations were no less pernicious to their country, than the despotism and cruelty of the duke of Alva <sup>(A)</sup>.

To the calamities consequent on the licentiousness of the Gueux, was added another; to which the maritime provinces of the Netherlands are perpetually exposed. Terrible floods broke in, overturned the dykes, and overflowed the lands, sweeping before them their houses and cattle. The catholics attributed the misfortune to the vengeance of the saints, for the indignity lately put on their images by heretics; and the protestants, with just as much reason, called it a judgment from heaven, on the oppression, the tyranny, and the barbarity of the court of Spain, and her infernal ministers.

<sup>c</sup> ALL the last year the prince of Orange was making preparations for levying an army, to oppose the violent measures of the duke of Alva, and rescue his country from impending destruction. His agents were employed in all the provinces to raise subscriptions of money. The same methods were still continued in Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht. The latter province was considerably over-awed by the strong citadel, and numerous forces; but an infinity of evils, to which the tyranny of the government exposed it, attached the inclinations of the inhabitants more strongly to the prince of Orange <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> WHILE the country was impoverished and ruined by the late exorbitant tax of a hundredth penny, by the dreadful inundation, by the licentiousness of the privateers, and other misfortunes, the duke of Alva, impatient of farther delay, ordered the edict concerning the tythe on merchandize, and twentieth penny on immoveables, to be published at Brussels. The people refuse to pay, the soldiers levy by force, tradesmen shut up their shops, the peasants forbear the markets, and the utmost scarcity prevails in the cities. Terrified with these appearances, the states offer to pay a subsidy of two millions of florins; but nothing would satisfy the enraged duke but the tax, in the manner he proposed. In Brussels the drum beat to arms, and orders were issued immediately to hang up all who refused compliance. The officers and guards were preparing to execute the inhuman mandate, when advice arrived of the surrender of the Briel, in the island of Voorn, at the entrance of the Meuse, to the Gueux. Lumey, who commanded the Orange squadron, made a descent on the body of the seamen, and were the most implacable enemies of the duke of Alva and the whole Spanish nation. First they were commanded by the count St. Mark, and maintained tolerable order. They sheltered, watered, and sold their prizes in creeks and small harbours of England, tho' prohibited by queen Elizabeth, then at peace with king Philip; sometimes in the rivers, creeks, and ports of Friseland. In time they confined themselves not to Spanish captures only, but seized upon the shipping of all nations, giving for a reason, that they were excluded as enemies from their ports. In their descent on the Briel, they carried the town by assault, openly professed the reformed religion, declared against the taxes and tyranny of the Spanish government, and laid the foundation of the revolt that immediately ensued in several towns of Holland, Zealand, and West-Friseland, where the Spanish garrisons were expelled, the oaths of fidelity to Philip revoked, and allegiance was sworn to the prince of Orange (1).

(A) As the reader may be curious to know the origin of the term Gueux, and farther particulars relating to the people called by that name, the following short account may prove entertaining. When Broderode delivered his petition against the inquisition to the duchess of Parma, his attendants, appearing mean in their clothes and apparel, were called in derision by the courtiers Gueux, or beggars. The name was soon after applied to the whole party, and comprehended all who differed from the doctrines of the church of Rome. The cruelty of Alva and the inquisition had forced them to retire, in multitudes, out of the provinces. Many of the poorer, and more desperate, had fled into the woods, lived by rapine and plunder, and upon the prince of Orange's first descent sallied from their holds and fastnings, doing incredible mischief to the Spaniards and the duke's forces. When the scheme was suggested by admiral Coligni, of raising money by cruizes upon the Spaniards, the Gueux embarked in the enterprize, composed the

island with forty ships, destroyed the churches, broke the images, and executed the priests, <sup>a</sup> but offered no violence to the other inhabitants <sup>i</sup>.

A. D. 1572.
The duke of Alva is opposed.

HOWEVER unimportant the conquest of so inconsiderable a place might appear, it alarmed the duke of Alva, and produced the most extravagant rejoicings in Brussels. The duke regarded it as the harbinger of further opposition, he dropped his taxes and executions for the present, and diligently applied himself to suppress the growing spirit of rebellion. He withdrew the garrison from Brussels, and detached it under the command of Maximilian Hermin Bossu, against the Gueux. This officer, endeavouring to force Briel, was defeated by the Orange faction, and forced to retire with loss to the island of Beyerland. Trifling as this victory might seem, it served to animate the depressed spirits of the enemies to the government. The prince of Orange, sensible of the advantage of possessing this island, <sup>b</sup> exhorted the nobility of his party to fortify and garrison it; his orders were obeyed, by which means he soon became master of Delfshaven, a town situated on the opposite banks of the Meuse. It appeared in Bossu's retreat, how unpopular the duke of Alva was in every part of the country. Dordrecht shut its gates against him. Rotterdam refused to admit his troops; but Bossu obtaining permission that they should pass through in separate small divisions, seized the gates, and began a general massacre of the inhabitants. Four hundred souls perished by the sword, the town was pillaged, the women ravished, and every possible act of barbarity and inhumanity committed. Retribution was soon made by the enemy. Alva had detached Ossorio d'Angulo with a body of forces to secure Flushing, a considerable port in Zealand, and to erect a citadel. The inhabitants denied Ossorio ad- <sup>c</sup>mittance, shut their gates, and seized Pacaneo, a famous engineer, who had come to measure the ground where the citadel was to be erected. Apprehending that attempts would be made to force them to submission, they petitioned Lumey, admiral of the Gueux, for assistance; and he furnished them with two hundred men, under the command of captain Treflong. On the arrival of this reinforcement, the Spanish engineer was hanged, and an unsuccessful attempt made to surprise Middleburg, the capital of the island of Walcheren. Not dispirited by this disappointment, the Zealanders assiduously prosecuted their cruizes upon the Spaniards, and obtained so much wealth as purchased large store of arms and ammunition at Antwerp. Joined by great numbers of English and Scotch adventurers, they ventured to attack the duke of Medina Cali, sent with a strong squadron to succeed the <sup>d</sup> duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands. Such was the fury and impetuosity of their onset, that the duke was completely defeated, a great number of his ships were taken, and a booty, amounting to near a million of livres, was carried off by the Zealanders.

NorthHolland
and Mons resented by the Orange faction.

NEGLECTING the marine was not the least of the errors committed during the duke of Alva's administration. This he now endeavoured to repair, ordering a squadron of ships to be equipped at Amsterdam, to bridle the insolence of Lumey and the Zealanders, while he busied himself in raising an army to oppose the prince of Orange and Lewis de Nassau, who were making great preparations in Germany and France. To augment the army in the field, he had draughted most of the garrisons. By this means the prince's friends gained possession of North Holland; and Lewis de Nassau was projecting a scheme to surprise Mons, <sup>e</sup> with the inhabitants of which he held a secret correspondence. The design succeeded, which emboldened most of the cities and towns in Holland to declare against the government. The count de Bergues gained over several cities in Overyssel, Guelderland, and Friseland. In a word, the revolt became so general, that the duke of Alva soon found he could not long resist the torrent. He now, when too late, published an edict to appease the people, setting forth, that he would consent to remit the most oppressive taxes, if the states could suggest any other means of raising the necessary supplies. He convoked the states-general to meet at the Hague, but his orders were now disregarded; and the states, in contempt of his authority, assembled at Dordrecht, and invited deputies from the prince of Orange, the nobility, and the towns that had declared against the governor. Here money was raised <sup>f</sup> to enable the prince of Orange to begin his march. His forces amounted to fifteen thousand foot and seven thousand horse. He had promised to advance three months pay, and was enabled to perform his engagements, by the liberality and public spirit of the states-general and the cities. Several regulations respecting the future support and government of the army, were made on this occasion, and their proportions of the public expence assigned to the several provinces and cities. It was farther resolved, that nothing of importance should be transacted without the privity and consent of the prince of Orange; and that the prince on his part, should not negotiate a peace with the king or his lieutenants, contrary to the sentiments of the states. In a word, the prince shewed the address with which he could manage and direct the people. Without the name of sovereign of the pro- <sup>g</sup>vinces under his government, he possessed the authority. He presided at all military opera-

a tions by sea and land ; made and disposed of offices at pleasure ; assembled the states ; and published all ordonnances and regulations, relative to the present state of affairs, without controul. However, he conducted matters with the utmost delicacy, and used his power with great moderation, to avoid giving offence to the free spirit of the Hollanders. The popish religion was banished the churches, and persons of that persuasion were, with great caution, admitted into public employments. Not only the king's revenue and church-tythes were appropriated to the public service, but the estates of those who remained firm in their loyalty. In short, the most vigorous measures were taken for resisting the tyranny of Spain, and those persons who had refused the tythes to the government, voluntarily subscribed their all to support a party formed in defence of liberty <sup>1</sup>.

b WHILE the states-general were employed in ways and means to maintain an army, the prince of Orange advanced to Ruremonde, which he took by assault, on the refusal of the city to supply him with necessaries. From thence he marched to Brabant, and raised heavy contributions. He took Mechlin, Oudenarde, and Dendermonde, and could not restrain the excesses of the soldiers, who pillaged the churches, massacred the priests, and committed other shocking barbarities. Next he approached to Mons, besieged the duke of Alva, with design, if possible, to engage him to give battle. The duke baffled all his endeavours to force him, and carried Mons by capitulation ; but such was the popularity of the cause, and the prince of Orange, that the whole Spanish dominion, lately so insolent and exulting, was ready to expire in the Netherlands, had it not been revived by the massacre of the protestants in Paris <sup>m</sup>.

The prince of Orange's successes.

WHILE the fate of Mons was depending, the states of Holland met at Haarlem, to deliberate on the defence of the province and the prosecution of the war. Amsterdam was in the enemy's hands, which greatly obstructed all their measures. It was therefore determined to besiege it, and the enterprize was committed to Lumey, chief of the Gueux. After putting the states to considerable expence, the project miscarried through Lumey's misconduct. Water was his element, but his vanity led him to display his abilities as a land-officer. He made regular approaches, and was foiled in every attempt <sup>n</sup>.

d THE reduction of Mons, and the depression of spirits consequent on the massacre at Paris, obliged the prince of Orange to retire to Holland, and encouraged Alva to invest Dendermonde, Oudenarde, and Mechlin. The latter, being in no condition to resist, opened its gates ; but the Spanish soldiers chose to scale the walls, to give an air of assault to the enterprize, and countenance to the horrid barbarities intended. Protestants and catholics were massacred without distinction, the priests were not sacred, virginity was deflowered, and infants violated before the eyes of their bleeding parents. The town was pillaged, and the booty estimated at four hundred thousand florins. All the other towns were evacuated by the garrisons, and loaded with heavy impositions by Alva. As to the prince, he had now removed the seat of war into the province of Holland ; only this province and Zealand remained firm to their engagements ; the rest, overwhelmed with consternation, capitulated on the best terms they could procure from the government. However, the country being strong by its nature and situation among the waters, and more so by a fierce, rough, and sturdy people, proud of their ancient fame, recorded in the Roman story of being the obstinate defenders of liberty, unemasculated by trade and luxury, and the most implacable enemies of Spanish tyranny, it was determined to make the most vigorous resistance. Frederic de Toledo was dispatched by Alva to begin the operations in Holland. He had already reduced Zutphen and Guelderland, and, flushed with success, appeared before Waerden, which he summoned to admit a garrison. The burghers replied, that they were intrusted by the king with the defence of the place, and could not receive a military force without violence to their privileges and engagements. They soon had reason to repent their firmness ; the town was taken by surprise, and all the burghers, assembled in the great church to take the oaths of fidelity to the king, wantonly butchered. Infants, old men, women, and the sick, were all put to the sword without pity or remorse ; and of all the barbarities hitherto committed, this was the most horrible. It was imagined that the terror inspired by such instances of severity, would reduce the people to obedience, and shake the obstinacy of the other towns. The contrary effects were produced ; rage and despair took possession of every breast, and all determined to suffer the last extremities, rather than submit to so cruel a tyranny.

A change in his affairs obliges him to retire to Holland.

Waerden taken.

f HAVING finished this tragedy, Frederic went to Amsterdam, to deliberate with the officers of the army about the siege of Haarlem. Here it was determined, before they proceeded to extremities, that the city of Amsterdam should write to the magistrates, exhorting them, in the most pathetic terms, to submit, rather than incur the punishment inflicted on Waerden. The council of Haarlem met to take this letter into consideration. Some were for soliciting an immediate reinforcement from the prince of Orange ; and others, who apprehended the prince was too weak to afford the necessary relief, were for making the best terms possible with the king. Those of the latter opinion were the magistrates. Accordingly, without consulting the burghers, deputies were dispatched to Frederic to stipulate conditions. In their absence, Ripperda, a gentleman of Friseland, strongly attached to the prince of Orange and the cause of liberty, assembled the chief burghers, and so animated them against the Spaniards, that they resolved to stand a siege, and suffer all the horrors of war, rather than submit. They sent to the prince of Orange to acquaint him with their determination, and to implore assistance. Four companies of Germans were detached to reinforce the garrison of Haarlem; and the deputies, on their return, were seized as traitors to their country, sent to the prince of Orange, and by his order beheaded. Frederic was prepared to compel the burghers to submission. On the 9th of December, he invested the town, after carrying Sparendam fort by assault, with great loss and slaughter of his soldiers. A variety of errors were committed in the attack, in the defence, and manner of succouring Haarlem. The assailants and defendants had equally shewn themselves ignorant of the art of war, and implacable in their resentment. Obstinacy supplied the place of military knowledge; every difficulty was surmounted by dint of perseverance; and both sides sustained, with unparalleled constancy, the most extreme hardships. Hunger and fatigue harassed the besieged; cold and sickness pinched and destroyed the besiegers. Not the rigours of the severest winter could oblige them to relinquish the enterprize; Alva determined to punish the burghers of Haarlem at the expence of half his army. The prince of Orange used every expedient to relieve the town, but all his attempts were frustrated by untoward accidents, and the vigilance of the Spaniards. At last, quite spent with fatigue, despairing of relief, weakened with losses, and totally exhausted of provisions and ammunition, the burghers of Haarlem surrendered upon more favourable terms than they could well expect. A few only of the most obstinate were executed, the rest were pardoned on taking an oath of fidelity, and paying an acknowledgment of fifteen thousand florins (B).

Several victories gained by the Zeeland fleet.

DURING the siege of Haarlem, the Zealanders were performing glorious achievements by sea, and gaining victories over the Spanish naval armaments. All the efforts of the governor of Antwerp could not prevent their carrying off a great number of ships out of the river; but to revenge the insult, and relieve Middleburg and Rammekins, blocked up by the Zealanders, he equipped a squadron, gave battle to Wertz, the Zealand admiral, and was defeated. After repairing and augmenting his fleet, he again set sail with sixty large vessels, encountered a squadron of Zealanders much inferior in strength, and met with his former fortune. Most of his ships were sunk or taken; but he found means to push into Middleburg, with the broken remains of his squadron, to the great joy of the garrison, now reduced by the scarcity of provisions to the last extremity. D'Avila's disgrace did not end here; for, on his return to Antwerp, he was a third time attacked and defeated, with considerable loss, by Wertz, who thus repaired the disappointment of an unsuccessful attempt made on Tolen <sup>p</sup>.

Soon after the reduction of Haarlem, Alva, perceiving that his severity answered no other purpose than irritating the people more against the Spanish government, published a proclamation, couched in terms so soothing as afforded room for suspecting their sincerity; inviting the Hollanders to accept of his majesty's gracious pardon, to lay down their arms, rely on the king's generosity, and submit to his mercy. He gave the strongest assurances, that the utmost lenity would be shewn to those who did not obstinately persist in their rebellion; but the people were not disposed to confide in promises so often violated, nor to throw themselves on the clemency of a prince and governor, who had shewn themselves inflexible, implacable, perfidious, and inhuman. They now were reduced to despair, they expected the worst that could happen, and bid defiance to fortune. The Spaniards were preparing to invest Alcmar, and the Hollanders put every means in practice to resist them. Eight months pay was due to the garrison, who began to mutiny; but contributions were raised, which silenced their clamours. Frederic of Toledo, with sixteen thousand men, sat down before a town fortified by no regular works, and defended only by three hundred burghers, and eight hundred soldiers, in extreme want of provisions, and without the prospect of relief. Sancti, the governor, despairing of being able to sustain a siege, wrote to the prince of Orange, that a place destitute of troops, provisions, ammunition, money, and every necessary, ought to be evacuated, and the few soldiers in garrison, and the burghers, saved from falling into a the hands of the enemy. But the prince of Orange so animated them by a letter, penned in his persuasive and irresistible manner, that, to a man, the townsmen, governor, and soldiers, determined to sacrifice their lives, and spill the last drop of their blood in the breach. Perseverance had made the Zealanders masters of Rammekins, contrary to all hope and probability; the same virtue, the prince observed, might save Alcmar, a town of the utmost consequence to the cause of liberty. What particularly inspired the defendants with courage, was the prince's good fortune in surprising Gertrudenburg. Frederic pushed the siege with great vigour. He ordered the inhabitants of Haarlem to work in the trenches, and sustain the first fire of their friends and countrymen. On the 18th of September, a battery of twenty pieces of heavy cannon began to play with unremitting fury, a breach was soon effected, the assault given, and repelled, with vigour, though sustained by the bulk of the Spanish army. From a Spanish officer taken, the garrison were informed, that Alva had given orders to retire, in case he failed in the third assault; but if he succeeded, to put all to the sword. Their courage was whetted by this account, and preparations were cheerfully made for withstanding the utmost efforts. Frederic was foiled in every attempt; the assailants were driven from the breach with prodigious slaughter; the Spanish soldiers refused to mount the walls; the rainy season came on, and rendered the roads impracticable; in a word, the siege was raised, and the town relieved, contrary to expectation, but to the exceeding joy of the prince of Orange, and great mortification of Alva.

c THIS advantage was attended with another of less importance, but which equally served to inspirit the Hollanders. The duke of Alva's grand fleet, equipped with great labour and expence, was defeated by the Zealanders. Though the action did not prove decisive, it greatly chagrined the duke, as Bossu, one of his best officers, was taken prisoner, and his fleet afterwards afraid to look the enemy in the face. The year, and the government of Alva, concluded with a meeting of the states of those provinces subject to Spain. Here they deliberated on the means of continuing the war, read, and disregarded a remonstrance sent by the prince of Orange, complaining of the violence of the duke, demanding the free exercise of their religion for his party, restitution of the rights and privileges of the provinces, and that the foreign troops should be withdrawn. On the second of December, the duke of Alva quitted the Low Countries, with his son, Frederic of Toledo; and don Lewis de Requesnes, appointed to succeed him, began his government with pulling down the insulting statue of his predecessor, erected at Antwerp; a popular act that would have produced happy consequences, had not the court of Spain been infatuated with notions of despotism and blind superstition.

c Containing the government of Requesnes; the siege of Leyden; the other various operations of the war; the confederacy of the Provinces, and other particulars until the assassination of the prince of Orange, in 1684, under the government of the duke of Parma.

THE popularity of the new governor did not long continue. His instructions were to push the war with vigour; and the mutual animosity of the combatants could not but render it bloody and cruel. The first advantage appeared on the side of the prince of Orange. Middleburg, after a tedious siege and blockade, surrendered. An infinity of expedients were practised in vain for its relief. The obstinacy of the Zealanders was invincible; they became masters of this capital, and with it of the island of Walcheren.

A. D. 1574. Requesnes succeeds to the government.

f LEWIS of Nassau was now arrived with a considerable body of forces, to assist his brother the prince of Orange. To prevent their junction Requesnes opposed the flower of his army. He passed the Meuse, surprised Lewis near a village called Noock, defeated his army, and left the three princes, Lewis, Henry, and Christopher, dead on the field of battle, but deduced no other consequence from so signal a victory, than frustrating the proposed junction of the brothers. Writers differ widely in their relations of this transaction. Some attribute the calamity to the indolence and security of Lewis, while others impute it wholly to the mutinous spirit of his troops, who loudly demanded their arrears, at the very time they were attacked by the enemy. In this particular, the Spanish general was not much more fortunate. Scarce had the Spaniards obtained the victory, when the soldiers formed a mutiny on the most regular and well-concerted plan, deposing all their officers, appointing others, establishing a sort of community, and vesting one of their number with the chief authority. D'Avila, who then commanded the army, used every means to appease the soldiers, but they were inflexible; complaining that their officers had all the honour and emoluments of the war, while their portion was only the fatigue and danger. The mutineers passed the Meuse, proceeded to Antwerp, were received and joined by the Spanish garrison in the citadel, and at length pacified with a gratuity of four hundred thousand livres, raised by the city, to prevent being pillaged. The anxiety and dread occasioned from this tumult was augmented by another victory obtained by the Zealanders over a Spanish squadron of forty ships, under the conduct of Adolphus Hemstede, most of which were taken or destroyed.

publishes a proclamation.

It was now found that the reduction of the provinces would be a work of time, expence, and hazard; Philip therefore at last condescended to less arbitrary measures: by his orders a proclamation was issued at Brussels, granting a free pardon to those who had assisted at the protestant religious assemblies, taken up arms, and otherwise violated the laws; but with an exemption of the prince of Orange, and proviso, that all admitted into the king's favour, and partaking of his clemency, should produce an attestation of their having solemnly renounced heresy. So limited an act of grace could produce no effect: it was unanimously rejected by the Hollanders, and preparations were made for obtaining better conditions, or wholly recovering their liberty.

sieged.

In vindication of their conduct they published a counter-proclamation, shewing the intention of the former to be insidious, and declaring their own views to be no other than to obtain the common rights of mankind, defend the liberties of the provinces, and abolish tyranny and cruel oppression. They sent remonstrances to all the powers in Europe, particularly bemoaning their situation, and craving that aid and assistance due by humanity; but their chief applications were made to England, France, and the protestant states of the empire. Requesnes perceiving that nothing could be expected from the king's proclamation, resolved upon the most memorable event of the year, the siege of Leyden. The prince of Orange had given repeated orders for providing the garrison with all the necessaries of a siege; imagining the governor would bend his chief efforts against the town; but they were by a strange fatality neglected, and the inhabitants forced to live under the pressure of a thousand wants and inconveniences, during the most obstinate, bloody, and cruel siege the Netherlands had yet beheld. Valdes, who commanded the Spanish army, offered the most advantageous conditions; but the burghers and little garrison were deaf to all terms, except those of freedom and independency: they relied on their courage, the justice of their cause, and their perseverance in the paths of liberty, for their defence; and indeed their efforts were prodigious, the result of necessity and despair. The whole surrounding country was laid under water by opening the sluices, and Leyden almost overwhelmed in the inundation necessary to its defence. Cut off from all succour, except what they received by boats forcing their way through the enemy, they combated every difficulty, and resisted famine, disease, and a powerful enemy, with incredible constancy. It would indeed be impossible to describe the miseries they sustained, reduced at last to live upon the dead carcases of their fellow-citizens: all their efforts would however have been vain, had not providence visibly interposed: a violent south-west wind drove the inundation with such fury against the works of the besiegers, that fearing his army would be swallowed up in the waves, Valdes relinquished the enterprize, drew off his army, and exposed himself to a furious sally of the besieged, by which five hundred of his men perished. Thus was Leyden most unexpectedly relieved, and the Spaniards foiled after undergoing extreme fatigue and hardships, losing the flower of their army, wasting their treasure, and those precious moments, which in so critical a juncture were irredeemable.

raised.

This disappointment drew on Valdes the contempt of his troops; they superseded him, and again proclaimed their old commander: a mutiny ensued, they were clamorous for their pay, anarchy and confusion reigned through the whole; they marched to Utrecht, declaring they would serve masters who would put the just value upon their merit; they demanded entrance into the city, but met with a different reception than they had done at Maastricht. Barlaimont commanded, declared them rebels and traitors to their king, gave free liberty to the people to massacre them wherever they were found, and took the most rigorous measures to conquer that mutinous spirit which broke out on every occasion. The rebels attempted to set fire to the gates, but they were repulsed, and their leader slain; upon which they capitulated, were received into favour, and sent to winter-quarters in Brabant.

A.D. 1595.
1 congress at Breda.

NEXT year commenced with some fruitless efforts made by the emperor to heal the breach and quiet the disturbances in the Low Countries. Negotiations were for several weeks carried on, but neither side would recede enough to come to any conclusion; and the emperor, tired out with vain hopes that his mediation might accommodate the differences, at last renounced the attempt in despair. Some persons indeed imagined, that the ambition of the prince of Orange was the chief obstruction to the success of the conferences at Breda. Certain it is, that both parties were too violently inflamed to listen to reasonable a terms: Philip demanded too much, and the prince yielded too little; both were in hopes that the issue of another campaign would be so favourable as to procure better terms, and both were disappointed; as the prospect of an accommodation was then rather more distant.

Requesnes commenced hostilities with the siege of Baren, which he took by assault, the garrison retiring to the citadel. Hierques, governor of Holland, gave the town up to be plundered by the Spanish soldiers. The citadel wanted no necessity of defence; but Vogelsang the chief officer accepted of conditions, marched out with the honours of war, and was arrested by order of the states of Holland, but shortly after dismissed. Next the Spanish general appeared before Oudewater, a place untenable from the circumstances of its situation.

b The garrison, however, made an obstinate defence, were at last stormed and put to the sword. The town was set on fire, and all except a few churches and convents laid in ashes. Schoonhoven was the next object of Hierques' military ambition. It was surrounded only by a slight wall, and defended by a few companies of French and German infantry, placed there rather to retard the enemy than withstand a siege. The sieur de la Garde was sent by the prince of Orange to the relief of the garrison; and he arrived, after breaking through their works, just as the place was on the point of capitulating. So slender a reinforcement could only retard the fate of Schoonhoven; a breach of three hundred yards wide was made in the walls, and the Spanish general preparing to give the assault, when la Garde seeing that further resistance would be fruitless, capitulated upon honourable conditions. Some other trivial successes attended the arms of the Spanish general; after which he invested Woerde; but finding the siege would be attended with difficulties, he converted it into a blockade, and was at last obliged to abandon the enterprize, after spending several months before the place, and losing a great part of his army by a vigorous sally on the 24th of June 1576. In the mean time Madragon reduced the island of Finart, standing east of Zealand, and performed several actions that raised the credit of the Spanish arms.

c STILL however the prince of Orange maintained his superiority at sea, by which he frequently reduced the enemy to great difficulties. Philip was sensible that the conquest of the provinces could not be effected while the Zealanders and Hollanders sailed from port to port with impunity, relieved the towns besieged by his army, and blocked up those held by the king's forces. To overthrow this last hope of the enemy, he gave orders that the whole force of Requesnes should be applied in reducing the principal sea-ports in Zealand, foreseeing that the enemy's naval strength must of consequence be ruined. Hierques was directed to keep no greater number of forces in Holland than was absolutely necessary, and a prodigious number of vessels were equipped to be assisting in the meditated conquest. The Zealanders saw the design, and, determined to frustrate it, attacked the Spanish squadron, the greater part of which they destroyed on the stocks and in the harbours. Requesnes laboured to repair this loss, and execute the royal mandate. A great number of light vessels were again got in readiness. Three thousand men were transported to Tolen, with a view of attacking the little island of Schowen, which would greatly facilitate the attempt on Walcheren, and the command of the fleet and five hundred land-forces was given to d'Avila. It was concerted to pass by a ford at low water: the Zealanders perceived them approaching, drew up their vessels in a line, and poured out volleys of great and small shot on the enemy, embarrassed at the same time with the depth of the water, the weight of their arms and wet cloaths. A firm footing on the dry land being at length established, the Zealanders, whose element was the water, every where gave way, leaving the Spaniards the possession of the open country, and liberty to pursue the conquests of the towns. Ziriczee was blockaded, the severity of the winter preventing its being besieged in form, and Madragon took every precaution that it should not be succoured; while the prince of Orange used every expedient to throw in a reinforcement and provisions. After sustaining great hardships and extreme want, the garrison at length surrendered, and by that means gave promising hopes to the Spaniards they might succeed in the reduction of Holland.

f It was the loss of Ziriczee that first suggested the design of conferring the provinces of Zealand and Holland upon some protestant prince who should be able to protect them against the tyranny of Philip. This affair was not talked of vaguely, but debated and approved in the states of Holland. The offer was certainly made to queen Elizabeth of England; but she for political reasons declined it. Necessity even obliged the states to negotiate with the French court, and listen to terms offered by the duke of Anjou. The treaty came to nothing, but the prince of Orange gained by it the advantage of establishing a mart at Calais for the disposal of the prizes made by the Gueux.

A. D. 1576. Despair of Holland and Zealand.

g On the other hand, Philip, though greatly superior in power, was intolerably distressed for money; above 40,000,000 of crowns were due to the Spanish and Genoese merchants, and the interest still unpaid now amounted to as much as the capital. The war had besides cost a greater sum sent in specie from Spain and the Indies, which, with the immense losses occasioned by the stagnation of trade in the Netherlands, had quite exhausted the treasury. Large arrears were due to the troops, they were every day mutinying, and some broke out into actual rebellion, doing incredible mischief in the open country, and laying the weaker towns under contribution. To remedy these evils, Requesnes demanded a supply of the provinces, and they answered him, by requiring restitution of their privileges, and dismissal of the Spanish troops. Flanders in particular paid the desired subsidy, by ballancing it against half the damages the province sustained from the misconduct of the governors, and the wars wantonly and unnecessarily excited. While this affair was in agitation, Requesnes died of an ardent fever; the council of state took upon them the administration, and the prince of Orange seized the opportunity of the confusion that ensued to lay the first foundation of the Pacification of Ghent, by which his affairs were considerably retrieved, and the greatest blow given to the court of Spain she had yet sustained. All now was anarchy in the Low Countries. The garrison of Ziriczee mutinied for want of pay, and to appease them the council of state sent a hundred thousand livres, upon which the Walloon regiments under Madragon seized, after expelling the Spanish soldiers, wounding and murdering their officers. This did not unite the Spanish mutineers among themselves; they turned out the few remaining officers, made new appointments, and being joined by the garrison of Lillo, marched to the number of 2000 men towards the capital, committed horrible outrages, overwhelmed the inhabitants of Brussels with consternation; and on the 26th of July seized upon Albost, confined the principal burghers, and hanged up a king's officer. The most favourable conditions were offered by the council of state, in order to appease the tumult, and provisions were sent to the mutineers. This created suspicion in the inhabitants of Brussels, that the meeting was excited by the connivance of the council, with a view of ruining the provinces without incurring the resentment and odium consequent on any appearance of legal oppression. They arrested the council, declared the Spaniards rebels, and took measures in concert with the other cities and provinces for expelling foreigners out of the Netherlands. A confederacy to this purpose was formed between the provinces of Hainault, Artois, and Flanders, to which all the rest except Luxembourg acceded; and don John of Austria, who had entered the Low Countries in quality of governor and successor to Requesnes, was obliged to keep aloof, and live in obscurity in Luxembourg, until the storm should subside<sup>1</sup>.

THE prince of Orange was all this while profiting by these commotions. He had long laboured to have the states-general convoked, and he now saw them not only assembled, but preparing to make head against the Spaniards, by a strange vicissitude of fortune, arising from accidents which all his penetration and sagacity could not foresee. United in councils against the common enemy, every measure was taken for reducing the citadels of Ghent, Antwerp, and Maestricht, the chief places in the hands of the Spaniards, and what must chiefly contribute to their expulsion. Ghent citadel was taken on the 27th of November, by the assistance of a strong reinforcement of troops and artillery sent by the prince of Orange. At Antwerp the states of Brabant were less successful. The citadel was vigorously attacked; but the mutineers at Albost, entering the citadel to assist their countrymen, a sally was made, the besiegers were driven from their trenches, great part of the town was consumed by fire, and the rest pillaged for three days with every kind of insolence and brutality, at a time when Antwerp was the most flourishing and populous city in the Netherlands, and indeed among the most wealthy in Europe<sup>k</sup>. It is affirmed that the treasure carried off amounted to four millions, besides an infinity of rich merchandise. This terrible calamity united papists and protestants without distinction in a confederacy, and co-operated with the measures of the prince of Orange to form the pacification of Ghent, which was a confederacy of all the provinces to expel foreign soldiers, to restore the ancient form of government, to refer matters of religion to the several states of the provinces, for ever to unite the other fifteen provinces in the same common interest with Holland, Zealand, and the prince of Orange, to renew the commerce and amity between them, to assemble the states in the manner practised under the house of Burgundy and Charles V. to suspend all the rigorous edicts of the duke of Alva on the subject of religion, until the states-general should take the matter into consideration, to release mutually all the natives made prisoners without ransom, and to restore all things upon the same footing as before the war, and the tyrannical government of the duke of Alva<sup>l</sup>.

THE states-general began with soliciting aid from the queen of England. Their ambassador had a gracious reception, and Elizabeth advanced them 20,000*l.* sterling, on condition the French should not be invited into the Netherlands, that they would accept a of reasonable terms of accommodation if offered, and that the loan should be repaid the ensuing year. Bentivoglio <sup>a</sup> alledges, that the queen stipulated, that they should make no innovations in religion without the consent of Philip, and several other articles not very consistent with her future conduct, and the character of a protestant sovereign of a protestant kingdom. Next a A.D. 1557. cessation of hostilities was agreed upon with don John, upon his assurances that every reasonable request of the provinces should be granted. On the 27th of December, deputies were sent with proposals to don John to disband the foreign troops; but he desired to know what security the states would give for their allegiance after the departure of the Spanish forces, and remonstrated against the unreasonableness of disarming the king, while his rebellious subjects were in arms, and ready to seize the first opportunity of deserting their obedience. He likewise demanded security with respect to religion; and insisted so warmly on this head, that it was obvious he had no inclination to part with the Spanish army before the provinces of Zealand and Holland embraced the catholic religion. After much altercation, necessity at length obliged don John to grant all that was required, to confirm the pacification of Ghent, and dismiss the Spanish army. He had the king's authority for his proceedings, the treaty was proclaimed at Brussels and Antwerp on the 17th of February, and don John immediately acknowledged governor and the king's lieutenant of the Netherlands. Peace and concord were restored, industry renewed, and religious disputes silenced; in a word, the Low Countries would again have become the most flourishing and important of the Spanish dominions, had not the ambition of don John, the false policy and despotism of Philip, or some such cause, a third time lighted up the torch of discord, and excited a civil war, never to be appeased but by the total extinction of the Spanish sovereignty over the seven provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Groningen, Guelderland, Friesland, and Overijssel <sup>o</sup>.

AFTER the departure of the foreign troops, when liberty began to draw breath, while commerce was again lifting its head, and the arts of peace distributing their blessings, don John gave umbrage by the great number of Spaniards retained in his court, the confidence he reposed in his Spanish servants, the intimacy he chiefly contracted with those persons who appeared dissatisfied with all the measures concerted since the death of Requesnes; by demanding the same honours paid to princes of the blood vested with his authority; and the same guard and respect by assuming a power over the officers of the army, and claiming the title and power of captain-general; by interfering in the civil promotions dependent on the states; and by insisting, that if the provinces of Holland and Zealand, did not immediately agree to every particular of the late treaty, called the perpetual edict, all communication with them should be broken off, and they forced into reason by dint of arms. It must be observed, that when the edict was communicated to the states of Holland and Zealand, they made the following objections by the advice of the prince of Orange. That the states general had not established the right of assembling this sovereign tribunal in the persons originally invested with that power by the constitution; that they had authorized an infraction of their privileges, by not procuring the release of count Bare, who had done nothing contrary to the laws of his country; that the pacification of Ghent was confirmed only under such limitations as subjected it to what constructions and interpretations the king thought proper; that the Spanish troops were suffered to carry off the immense wealth they acquired by the ruin and destruction of the Netherlands, and the city of Antwerp in particular; that no stipulation was made in favour of those dispossessed of their estates; that no mention was made of demolishing the forts, and that they had shewn but little complaisance to the queen of England, and the court of France, notwithstanding they had in many instances testified their regard for the Netherlands. They added, that it were to be wished they had seen all these articles performed before don John was admitted into his government, and that every man had previously been put in possession of his estate and effects, as well in the Low Countries, as in the duchy of Burgundy; an article that in particular respected the prince of Orange, dispossessed since the first disturbances of large possessions in Burgundy and Erabant. For these reasons the states and the prince refused to sign the edict, though they consented to all the articles that did not contradict those specified. Don John was strenuous in urging that violent measures might be used to force them to submission. He wrote to the king in cypher, pressing him to this method as the only expedient. The letter fell into the hands of Henry IV. who transmitted it to the prince of Orange. His secretary Escovedo was next sent to Spain, under pretence of soliciting money for the payment of the German forces; but in reality to represent the necessity of violent measures, and communicate the plan projected by don John. Impatient for the return of Escovedo, he meditated quitting the country, and actually consulted his friends Barlaimont and Manfvelt upon the subject. At last, under pretence of complimenting Margaret queen of Navarre on her journey to the Spaw, he left Brussels, and seized upon the citadel of Namur; a conduct which he endeavoured to justify by the necessity he was under of retiring to a place of security, while he saw all around him in commotion, and the flames of war and rebellion ready to break out. He sent his apology to the states, desiring they would disarm the governor and burghers of Brussels, closely attached to the prince of Orange. The states invited him to return, promising they would punish with the utmost severity all convicted of any designs against his person; but he not only refused, but endeavoured to corrupt the German forces, and by their means to gain possession of Antwerp. In a word, from intercepted letters, from the seizing of Namur, the attempts on Antwerp, the tampering with the German soldiers, the subsequent altercation with the states general, and the march of the Spanish army towards the Netherlands, it incontestibly appears that don John was the aggressor; that he was encouraged by Philip; and that though the states of Holland and Zealand refused to sign the perpetual edict, yet they and the prince of Orange were desirous of preserving the public tranquillity even upon the terms of the edict<sup>p</sup>.

The prince of Orange in high estimation

WHEN it was known that the Spanish forces were assembling in Namur and Luxembourg, the states invited the prince of Orange to Breda, where he was joyfully received, and accompanied to Antwerp and Brussels by strong guards, who voluntarily offered themselves for his protection. Here he was chosen governor of Brabant, which had no particular governor of the province, being under the immediate direction of don John, in quality of the king's lieutenant. At the same time a council of state was formed, which should have the general government of the provinces, and to this the prince was appointed president. He was indeed esteemed not only the principal personage in the confederacy, but the defender of liberty, and the parent of the Netherlands. His high reputation incurred the jealousy of the other nobility, particularly of the duke d' Archot, the head of an ancient family, the governor of Flanders, and a nobleman of great property and influence. He became the leader of a faction opposed to the prince of Orange, agreed however with him in the detestation of tyranny and defence of freedom, but differed not only in point of religion and sentiments with respect to the court of Spain, but of personal interest. In short, he was the prince's rival, and finding his weight inferior, he was determined to invite the archduke Matthias, brother to the emperor, to the government of the Low Countries. A message was privately sent to that prince, who, dissatisfied with the little consequence he had at the imperial court, accepted the proposal, quitted Prague in the night, and suddenly arrived in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, to the great astonishment of the states. Contrary to expectation, the prince of Orange espoused the archduke's interest in opposition to the duke of Anjou, and persuaded several cities to bestow upon him the government, but on condition that he himself should be appointed his lieutenant. Bentivoglio, with the true casuistry of an Italian prelate, assigns a variety of subtle causes for the prince's conduct, which probably never had existence but in that writer's own imagination. It must, however, be acknowledged, that they are specious and refined, perfectly consistent with the character of the prince; but perhaps too speculative for practice, and too far-fetched for so pressing a conjuncture<sup>q</sup>.

Factions formed against him.

The duke d' Archot now changed his battery; he laboured to dissuade the provinces from coming into the measures of the prince of Orange; affirming, that ambition, and not the love of liberty, made him oppose the Spanish government; he made his public entry into Ghent, escorted by a great number of horse and foot; he gained great numbers of the nobility, obtained from the council of state very extensive powers, with respect to the government of Flanders; and after taking upon him the authority of governor, gained the affections of the people, by declaring that he was come to restore their privileges, and demolish the citadel of Ghent, which had long given umbrage. However, in the midst of all this popularity, he was arrested in Ghent by one Ribove, who raised a sedition among the populace, but released six days after at the intercession of the prince of Orange: a conduct that refuted all the calumnies propagated against the prince, and proved that the public good was the guiding star which directed him to so many great and glorious actions, amidst the utmost perils to his present reputation<sup>r</sup>. Archot was prevailed on by the states of Flanders to publish a declaration, promising he would entirely forget and forgive the injury his honour sustained by his imprisonment. To this declaration, his pride made him give the air of a pardon. His expression gave offence, and that air of authority he assumed was a proof of his ambition. All his influence however could not procure the release of the other prisoners made in Ghent, particularly of Champigni, who was accused of having drawn up an incendiary paper, tending to disturb the tranquillity of the provinces, and levelled in particular at the prince of Orange, whom they wanted to supersede, by substituting Archot in his employments. It would be impossible to recite the a views, designs, and opinions of parties and individuals, who contributed to the public confusion; they were infinitely contradictory, and frequently absurd. Sufficient it is, that the prince of Orange and duke d'Archot were rivals, who should raise the archduke Matthias to the dignity of governor-general, in order to hold the power in their own hands: both were enemies to tyranny, but the latter better disposed to the Spanish government, and strenuous supporter of the popish religion.

It was judged necessary by the states and the prince of Orange, that the archduke should be maintained agreeable to his quality, until he could be installed in his authority; accordingly the prince, attended by the burghers in arms, went to meet him at Antwerp. Immediately after the states general published a proclamation, declaring don John an enemy to the country he was bound to protect; and all his adherents were ordered to quit him, under pain of being declared rebels. A closer union was formed between the catholic and protestant provinces, by which the pacification of Ghent was confirmed, and the parties engaged mutually to support their privileges. Next an ambassy was sent to queen Elizabeth, to solicit the assistance of the English nation, and engage the queen in an alliance. On the 13th of December the states resolved to install the archduke in the dignity of governor-general of the provinces, and a deputation was sent to him with the articles that were to regulate his authority and administration. As the governor was a stranger, supposed uninformed of the laws and privileges of the country, the prince of Orange was appointed his lieutenant, whose integrity and ability were acknowledged.

Don John deposed.

c THOUGH the archduke was fettered and confined by tighter bonds than any preceding governor, he accepted the charge, and signed the conditions, set out for Brussels on the 18th of January, and was every where received in the quality he assumed. Don John sent bitter reproaches to the states, but his letters were neglected, and laid aside without a reply; they wrote however to the king, apologizing for their conduct, and attributing it to the necessity of the times, and the maladministration of don John: the same excuses were made to the emperor, without whose permission the archduke had accepted the government, but in vain; for neither of the princes could be persuaded that the states ought to confer on the duke to accept without leave or direct appointment of Philip and the emperor. In Spain councils were daily held upon the affairs of the Low Countries; it

d was at length determined to act vigorously, as the only means of saving those provinces either from claiming their independency, or throwing themselves into the arms of some foreign prince. The troops were ordered to be assembled in Naples and Milan, levies were made in Burgundy and Luxembourg, and a resolution was taken of supporting don John with the whole power of the Spanish monarchy. To oppose the vast preparations, the states concluded a treaty with the queen of England, whereby that princess stipulated to advance them 100,000*l.* sterling, to assist the provinces with 5000 foot, and 1000 horse; on condition that the loan was repaid with interest in eight months, that certain towns were ceded to her in security, that the states should defray the expence of transporting the troops, and take them into their pay while they acted in their service. It is said, that the ambassadors would have preferred an equivalent in money to the English troops; that they hinted the matter to the queen, and found she was offended. The treaty however was afterwards broke by the queen, under pretence that the French would harbour suspicions of her having designs upon the Netherlands, and would for that reason unite their forces with Spain to oppose her attempts. Instead of the English troops, the queen proposed sending John Casimir count palatine with 3000 foot and 3000 horse, refusing to pay the money stipulated until the states consented. This scheme had before been suggested in the states general, but opposed, as it would render the reformists too powerful; which indeed was the great objection to the English forces.

Treaty with queen Elizabeth.

f BEFORE this treaty was concluded, don John was joined by the expected army under the conduct of Alexander Farnese, duke of Parma, the most intrepid, vigorous, expert, and renowned officer in the service of Philip. The troops consisted of 16000 foot, and 2000 horse, all chosen veterans; many of whom had often triumphed under the duke of Alva. Don John declared war on the 25th of January; and though the winter was severe, determined to commence hostilities, and push the advantages he obtained from a greatly superior army. The states were irresolute, and slow in their preparations; William of Orange had made the most spirited remonstrances, and insisted on the necessity of an offensive war; but so tedious were the deliberations of so unwieldy a body, clogged with numberless constitutional embarrassments, that nothing was executed. A body indeed of 10,000 foot and 5000 horse was cantoned in the neighbourhood of Namur; but all the chief officers were at Brussels, and only the sieur de Coigny marechal de Camp, and colonel Balfour, a Scotchman, with the troops. These don John proposed attacking; Coigny and Success of Don John.

Balfour suspected his design, and prepared for a retreat; the cavalry were placed in the rear to cover the infantry in their march, and don John hearing they were in motion, hastened to occupy certain advantageous posts. He fell upon the army of the states, broke their disposition, and forced them to seek shelter in a tumultuous manner under the cannon of Gemblours: the town was summoned, and it submitted at discretion; while the fugitive army was dispersed in parties round the country. Louvain surrendered to Gonzaga, and Bovines was reduced by Hierques. Sichem made an obstinate resistance, but was at length stormed and taken by the prince of Parma, all the garrison being put to the sword, except the governor, who valiantly defended himself in an untenable citadel; for which, on his submission, he was unjustly and cruelly hanged. Diest, Archot, Tillemont, and Leuwe, surrendered without exchanging a shot; but Nivelle gloriously stood a long siege, and at last obtained honourable conditions". Don John would have invested Brussels, where the archduke and prince of Orange resided; but dreading the difficulty of the enterprise, he contented himself with securing the passes to Italy and the empire, by the reduction of Limburg and Philipville.

Amsterdam
declares for the states.

WHILE don John was pursuing his conquests with rapidity, the states made an acquisition; that more than compensated all their losses; it was the city of Amsterdam, which, blocked up for several months by sea and land, at last concluded a treaty with the friends of the house of Orange, whereby it was stipulated that the protestants should hold their religious meetings without the walls, and be permitted a cemetery or burying-ground within; that the garrison should be disbanded, and 600 men, commanded by the burghers, levied for the defence of the city; that all persons banished on the score of religion should be recalled; that Amsterdam should enjoy all its ancient privileges; and that all vacancies in public employments should be filled without distinction by those who either did or did not incur the penalty of banishment on account of party connexions. This capitulation was soon broken, the catholic magistrates were driven out of the city, attended by the priests and popish clergy of every denomination; the images and idols of superstition were pulled down, and only the reformed clergy suffered to preach publicly".

Proposals made by king Philip.

THESE transactions were succeeded by the arrival of baron de Selle, with letters and instructions from king Philip. His first proposal was to reinstate don John; but finding the spirits of the people too violently enflamed to admit of such conditions, the baron artfully changed his battery, desired that the duke of Parma might be accepted in quality of governor, without troops, or any other security than the promises of the states, and the person of the prince of Orange, who was required as a hostage; but this proposition was entirely rejected. Don John or the prince of Parma would not be received upon any conditions; and the states positively insisted as a preliminary to any treaty, that the government should be left in the hands of the archduke, assisted by the prince of Orange. The emperor sent ambassadors with instructions to the same purpose; but he met with no better success<sup>x</sup>.

Revolutions in Guelderland
and Gronin-
gen.

NEGOTIATIONS proving abortive, both sides prepared to enforce their pretensions by the sword. The states, sensible that the misfortunes and losses in the winter arose from the irresolution and tedious deliberations of the provincial states, vested the archduke, the council of state, and the prince of Orange, with a power of levying what number of troops they should think necessary, and disposing them in the manner most advantageous to the public, without referring to the states in every particular: they only recommended that they would proportion the expences to the revenue, which at that time amounted only to 600,000 livres. About this time a revolution, greatly beneficial to the common cause, was effected in Guelderland; John of Nassau, brother to the prince of Orange, was appointed governor of that province; upon entering on the administration, count John perceived that the whole conduct of affairs was in the hands of persons strongly affected to king Philip and the catholic religion. Most of the cities professed popery; and the count, who had sworn to the pacification of Ghent, was restrained from attempting any change in religion. The face of affairs however took a sudden turn; John acquired great popularity, and soon discovered that foreigners were the leading persons. His artifice and policy stimulated the people against them; they were deprived of their seats in the provincial states, and turned out of their offices in the government of the cities. Thus Nassau obtained the chief direction, and was able to co-operate with the measures planned by his brother. Another revolution happened in Groningen, of which Jasper de Rollis seur de Billy was governor. Billy was by birth a Portuguese, by religion a catholic, and consequently a dependent on the court of Spain: he refused to accede to the union of the provinces, and the states general found it necessary to send to him Francis Martin Stella, with proposals for signing the pacification<sup>g</sup>.

a of Ghent. Billy suspecting that the deputy's real design was to excite a revolt in the province, put him to the torture to extort confession; after having first wounded him with his own hand. The deputy bid defiance to pain; he bore the most excruciating tortures with firmness, and having a surgeon to dress his wound to enable him to undergo a second trial, he communicated something in the Greek language, which the surgeon soon made public: in consequence the mob assembled, rescued Stella, declared for the pacification of Ghent, and obliged Billy to quit his government. The change of councils in these two provinces was of the utmost service to the confederacy, and would have enabled the protestants to have encountered the whole power of Spain, had not dissension broke their strength, divided their councils, and distracted their affairs.

b THE great number of protestants invited into the Netherlands, in consequence of the advice of the queen of England, gave umbrage to the catholics: this was a circumstance on which they had not bestowed sufficient reflection; but the prince of Orange foresaw the effects, and opposed the resolution so warmly, that Elizabeth took offence. He even became suspected by several zealous protestants, who did not avert that the desire of preserving unanimity among the provinces was the sole principle of William's conduct. The Walloon provinces, violently attached to the church of Rome, had in fact entertained suspicions, that a project was concerted between the queen of England, the prince of Orange, and prince Casimir, for establishing the protestant religion while the inhabitants of Ghent, and the protestant provinces taxed William with discovering a bias for popery.

c Thus his conduct was censured by both parties, and that moderation which breathed nothing but true patriotism, became obnoxious to those who had equally at heart the good of their country. France had long made overtures from the duke of Anjou, which the Walloons now insisted should be taken into consideration. The state, upon the assurances of Henry III. that nothing contrary to the privileges of the province was intended, gratified the request of the Walloons, after consulting whether it would be agreeable. In truth, the appearance of the duke of Anjou, who was sent to the Netherlands merely to be removed from the court, was no way formidable; on the contray, his army consisted of starved undisciplined wretches, intent only upon plunder and rapine: the duke approached Mons, and on the 13th of August a treaty was concluded

d between him and the states-general, stipulating, that he should advance with 10,000 foot and 2000 horse, to be maintained for three months at the expence of the states; that if the war should not within that time be finished, he should continue 5000 foot and 500 horse in his own pay, in consideration of which he should be declared defender of the liberties of the Netherlands; that he should enter into an alliance with the queen of England, duke Casimir, and the other friends and supporters of the provinces; that his forces should be joined to those of the states, and himself declared commander in chief, or in his absence the lieutenant of the states; that Inspruc, Bauvais, and Landreci, should be given him as cautionary towns; and that his troops should have liberty to make conquests in Burgundy and Luxemburgh, provided they did not thereby neglect or retard the common cause. Upon the whole, by this treaty the duke got nothing but the empty title of defender of the liberties of the Netherlands; all that was solid depended on the success of the war, and the pleasure of the states.<sup>2</sup>

The duke of Anjou comes into the Netherlands.

WHILE the confederates were forming alliances, healing their divisions, and making preparations, don John of Austria resolved to attack their camp, entrenched at Rimenant, a village between Mecklin and Archot. This Dutch army consisted of 8000 foot, 2000 horse, and some companies of English and Scotch auxiliaries. The duke of Parma, lieutenant-general of the Spaniards, proposed drawing this body out of the intrenchments by skirmishes, and then attacking them in the open plain. Baffled in this design, he attacked a post defended by the British auxiliaries, but was warmly received, and obliged to retreat with the loss of 800 men. Count Bossu, general of the Flemings, fled off towards Namur, determined to act on the defensive until he should be joined by prince Casimir or the duke of Anjou. A solemn ambassy was sent to the latter, requesting he would with all expedition march to the assistance of the Flemings. Anjou began his rout; but instead of pursuing it, he halted to secure a retreat, invested Bincb, took it by assault, and used the garrison with so much humanity as induced Maubege to surrender without exchanging blows. Quesnoi and Landreci however refusing to receive the French troops, proposed the duke should have Mecklin and some other towns, as an equivalent. Anjou was preparing to join the Flemish army, when he received advice, that Casimir, instead of proceeding to attack don John, had turned off to Ghent, there to receive the pay due to his army. Upon this he halted, and sent to know of the council of state, whether Casimir acted by their instructions. His army murmured, deserted, and complained grievously of the inhospitality of the Flemings; disputes in short rose so high, that it was plain the duke of Anjou was rather the rival of Casimir than the protector of the Low Countries. The states laboured to reconcile the princes, and persuade them to act with unanimity for the common cause. In the mean time don John died, some imagine of chagrin, others affirm of poison, and the whole power came into the hands of a more able soldier and statesman, the duke of Parma<sup>a</sup>.

Prince Casimir enters the Netherlands.

No advantage was deduced from the death of the Spanish governor; the vigour, the prudence, the uncommon diligence of Parma kept all quiet in his army; while the confederates, greatly superior in strength, including the forces of Casimir, the duke of Anjou, and the Flemings, were prevented from action, by disputes, contentions, and rivalry. Casimir entered the provinces with 7000 horse and 8000 foot, a force greatly superior to what had been stipulated. Suspicion seized the minds of the zealous catholics, and even the prince of Orange and the states remonstrated against this proceeding. The one was sensible it would destroy the necessary harmony, and the others thought it indicated ambition and design. Casimir made his excuses, and was proceeding to Ghent, the burghers of which had promised to pay his army if he would assist them against the Walloons, their declared enemies. The council of state and William of Orange had already denied them all aid, as having openly violated the pacification of Ghent; but Casimir, in great want of money, was ballancing whether he should not accept the proposal. From this he was prevented by the necessity of going to the court of London, to concert matters with Elizabeth. In his absence all was mutiny and disorder in his army; they disbanded in parties round the country, the cavalry were surrounded by the duke of Parma, and would have been all cut in pieces or made prisoners, had they not consented to return home, on his granting passports. Anjou's army was much in the same condition, and equally useless to the confederates. William of Orange perceiving that little confidence was to be placed in mercenary allies, and less in the unanimity of provinces rent by faction, different in religion, and divided by ambition, political maxims, and private interest, formed the scheme of more closely uniting the provinces of which he was governor, and cementing them with those more contiguous, in which the protestant interest prevailed. Such an alliance was subject to infinitely fewer difficulties than attended the more general one of uniting all the provinces; it was in fact the only measure that could be proposed with safety, and it was prosecuted with that alacrity and address for which William was deservedly celebrated.<sup>d</sup>

A. D. 1579.

The union of Utrecht.

ON the 23d of January deputies from the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Groningen, Overijssel, and Guelderland, met at Utrecht, and signed the alliance ever since known by the name of the Union of Utrecht, the basis of that commonwealth so renowned by the appellation of the United Provinces. This treaty of alliance was founded upon the infraction of the pacification of Ghent, solemnly acceded to by Philip, and the late invasion of certain towns in Guelderland. It was not hereby intended to divide the seven provinces from the other ten, or to renounce the pacification of Ghent; its object was to preserve the liberty stipulated in that pacification, by more rigorous operations, and united councils. The chief articles of this union are the following.

THE seven provinces shall unite themselves in interest as one province, never to be separated or divided by testament, donation, exchange, sale, or agreement; reserving to each particular province and city all its privileges, rights, customs, and statutes. In all disputes arising between either of the provinces, the rest shall interpose only as mediators. They shall assist each other with life and fortune against every foreign attempt upon any particular province, whether to establish sovereignty, the catholic religion, arbitrary measures, or whatever else may appear inconsistent with the liberties of the provinces, and the intention of the alliance. All frontier towns belonging to the United Provinces shall, if old, be fortified at the expence of the provinces; if new, at the joint expence of the union. The public imposts and duties shall be farmed for three months to the highest bidder, and employed with the king's taxes in the public service. No province, city, or member of the union shall contract an alliance with any foreign prince or power, without the concurrence of all the other members. Foreign powers shall be admitted into the alliance, only by consent of all the contracting parties. As to religion, the provinces of Holland and Zealand shall act in that particular as they think adviseable; the rest shall adhere to the purport of the edict published by the archduke Matthias, which prescribed that no man should be oppressed on the account of conscience. All the inhabitants, from the age of eighteen to sixty, shall be trained and disciplined to war. Peace and war shall be declared by the unanimous voice of all the provinces; other matters that concern the internal policy shall be regulated by a majority. The states shall be held in the usual constitutional manner, and coinage shall be deferred to future determination. Finally, the parties agree, that the interpretation of these articles shall remain in the states general; but in case of their failing to decide, in the stadtholder.<sup>b</sup>

<sup>a</sup> In this grand alliance, sketched out by the prince of Orange, may easily be discerned the judicious steady hand of the master and true patriot. It was so universally approved, that in a short time the cities of Ghent, Nimeguen, Arnheim, Leewarden, Venlo, Tyres, Antwerp, Breda, Bruges, with several other towns, noblemen, and persons of distinction, embraced and signed the union. Thus the foundation of a commonwealth was laid, but in fluctuating and uncertain state of affairs, when men were actuated by different passions, views, and interests; intimidated by the great strength of the Spanish monarchy, and supported chiefly by a zealous adherence to liberty, and firm resolution to perish in defence of freedom. The first coin struck after this alliance is expressive of the situation of the infant republic (A).

<sup>b</sup> It was expected, that the important object of this alliance would have attracted the attention of the Walcons, and indeed of all the catholic inhabitants of the Netherlands: it in fact did so, but in a different manner from what was imagined. The Walcons not only refused to accede to the union, but they made the strongest remonstrances to the states-general upon the danger, impropriety, and illegality of such a confederacy. It appears from Strada and Bentivoglio, that the duke of Parma was at the bottom of their intrigues. He stimulated and prompted their measures, inspiring them with a jealousy of the protestant designs on the catholic religion. In the end, he contracted an alliance with them, and thereby confirmed by his own example the legality and necessity of the union of Utrecht. Immediately they began levying an army, but still kept up appearances with the confederated provinces, though it was obvious that hostilities must soon commence. To prevent the effusion of blood, the emperor, as mediator, set on foot another negotiation; but Philip, would allow no reasonable terms of accommodation, and give no security for liberty and religion. Instead of granting equitable conditions, he laboured to detach the prince of Orange from the union, made him extraordinary proposals, offered to restore him to all his estates, indemnify his losses, raise him to the height of power, and give him the first place in his esteem and favour. But William was too wise to rely on the promises of a king, who had shewn himself perfidious; too firm to be moved by danger; and too public-spirited to relinquish the interests of his country for his own private emolument. He determined to share the fate of the United Provinces, to fulfil his engagements, and the hope conceived of his conduct.

<sup>c</sup> In the mean time great disorders arose in Ghent. The inhabitants, finding that the Walcons refused all proposals of agreement, began afresh their violences against the catholics. Their example was followed at Oudenarde and Dendermonde, and to such excess did they push their zeal, that the presence of the prince of Orange was necessary to restore the tranquillity of Ghent in particular. On the prince's arrival he found every thing in confusion, the convents and churches pillaged by the soldiers, the houses and effects of the catholic priests sold at public markets; and Imbise, who arrogated to himself a kind of despotism, laying an undue restraint on the election of magistrates, imprisoning all those who opposed his usurpation. The prince soon put a stop to those arbitrary and iniquitous proceedings; Imbise was forced to abscond, the magistrates were chosen according to the laws, and the catholics restored to the full possession of their estates; an instance of justice which, however, could not procure William the confidence of the catholic faction, who esteemed the man, while they detested the heretic. An attempt was made by the Walcons to surprise the city; but it was frustrated by the prince's vigilance and prudence.

<sup>e</sup> While the prince of Orange was busied in conciliating factions, forming alliances, and strengthening the union, the duke of Parma was taking measures to disconcert his projects, and reduce the provinces to the king's obedience. He dispatched Gonzaga and Mondragon with eight thousand men to lay siege to Marssen. The town was taken by assault, the governor hanged, and forty-five of the chief inhabitants were tortured to death, for having valiantly defended themselves, and faithfully discharged their duty. It is said the duke of Parma disavowed this bloody proceeding, so inconsistent indeed with the character of a hero. After some farther inconsiderable advantages obtained in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, the king's army insulted Antwerp, where the archduke and the prince of Orange then resided. The states infantry was intrenched near Borgerbont, a post attacked without success by the duke of Parma, after a brisk skirmishing of two hours between the armies. La Noue, however, the general of the states army, not chusing to expose himself to continual alarms from the enemy's cavalry, retired under the cannon of Antwerp.

<sup>f</sup> On La Noue's retreat, the duke of Parma invested Maastricht. The siege began on the 8th of March, and continued, without remission, to the 29th of June. This defence was deemed very extraordinary, as the fortifications were in bad order, the garrison slender, and the place but poorly provided with the necessaries of a siege. To one Sebastian Tappin the whole glory was due. He was a native of Lorrain, an engineer by profession, a protestant, a brave and alert soldier, whose indefatigable vigilance raised continual obstructions to the duke's approaches. The garrison had sustained frequent assaults, and made divers bloody sallies, by which they were so much weakened, fatigued, and exhausted, that during a parley the town was surprised, and a great many soldiers put to the sword; but Tappin was saved by favour of the duke of Parma, who gave strict orders that he should have quarter. For three days Maastricht was a scene of the utmost desolation and horror, the Spanish soldiers committing every excess and enormity, in despite of all the endeavours of the general to restrain their licentiousness, and maintain discipline: tired with pillage and slaughter, they sat down loaded with booty, but not satiated with blood. With such diligence did the duke apply himself to this siege, that, unable to support the fatigue, he was seized with a fever, which had near proved fatal. His situation inspired the enemy with fresh courage. They ventured to appear in the field; they reduced Alost, and some other places of little consequence, but could not prevent the loss of Menin, taken by assault: though it was soon after retaken by the prince of Orange. In Brabant the states likewise obtained some advantages, though of two unimportant a nature to merit attention. The truth is, all the United Provinces were in a deplorable situation, and their trifling succours were owing entirely to accident, or the duke of Parma's illness. Several provinces contributed nothing to the common cause; others furnished but a small proportion of the taxes agreed upon at the union. The army had large arrears due, and lived at discretion in a manner more oppressive to the people than taxes to the amount of their regular pay. The people clamoured against the states, they threw the blame of the officers for relaxing in point of discipline; and the officers recriminated, alledging, that the fault was in the states, who failed in performing their engagements to the army. All was in confusion; but as no person would acknowledge his error, there appeared little hopes of amendment. In a word, nothing besides the same distress in the Spanish army could have prevented the duke of Parma from reducing the revolted provinces to accept any terms he should think fit to prescribe. He was equally in want of money, and his late treaty with the Walloons required that he should dismiss all his foreign troops in the space of six weeks after the publication of the treaty. His situation indeed was so deplorable, that he requested leave to resign his command, and retire with the foreign soldiers to Italy; but the court of Spain had too much confidence in his ability to entrust so important a charge to another. In this state of affairs the animosity of the parties remained, without the power of shewing their resentment. The states were resolute, but unable to defend their liberties. Philip was determined, but too weak, to be despotic. They mutually published bitter remonstrances, but their strength would seem to have evaporated in revilings<sup>a</sup>.

At last the prince of Orange renewed the treaty with the duke of Anjou. It was hoped that a brother of the king of France would introduce an alteration in their circumstances, more favourable than could be expected from the government of the archduke, unsupported by the emperor and the empire. The queen of England was again offered the sovereignty, but she declined it for political reasons. The duke of Anjou was, however, opposed by a great number of the reformed, who could never reconcile themselves to the son of Catherine de Medicis; an ambitious, intriguing woman, doomed to indelible infamy, by the share she bore in the horrid massacre of the protestants at Paris. All arguments to remove their prejudices were vain. Anjou was a Roman catholic, and that alone was sufficient to render him detestable. The prince of Orange urged the necessity of receiving the prince. Theologians and civilians allowed that it was lawful to have recourse in extremity to a papist, but the people continued obstinate. This determined the prince of Orange to have recourse to the states-general, to whom he sent a long remonstrance, pointing out the causes why the confederacy did not produce the intended effect, and exhorting them to reconsider the affair respecting the duke of Anjou. He laid before them a scheme for the operations of the future campaign, the forces requisite to push their projects with success, and the means of supporting the troops. He proposed that the oath administered to the troops should be changed, alledging, as the cause of their licentiousness, that having only sworn fidelity to the king, they thought themselves at liberty to oppress his subjects in open war against Philip. In consequence, the states-general referred the prince's remonstrances to the provincial states and cities; and, after long deliberations, and warm debates, it was at length determined to call in the duke of Anjou, as the only resource in so great a calamity. The influence of the prince of Orange, the confidence the people reposed in his ability and integrity, and the weight of his arguments, contributed chiefly to this resolution. Accordingly the year began with a solemn treaty, whereby the United Pro-

- a vinces renounced their allegiance to Philip, and acknowledged Francis Hercules de Valois, duke of Alençon and Anjou, for their sovereign. The treaty consisted of twenty-seven articles, of which this we have mentioned was the chief. Deputies were sent to the duke of Anjou, to explain the articles, and congratulate him on his accession. As to the archduke Matthias, finding himself unsupported by the emperor, the empire, and the numerous friends whom he expected would have joined him on his elevation, he expressed no resentment at the conduct of the provinces, which with great moderation he attributed to necessity. He only demanded to know their intention with respect to his own person; and the states made their apology, by representing the situation of their affairs, assuring him of their esteem, permitting him to reside in the Netherlands as long as he thought convenient, and b highly applauding the prudence and equity of his conduct during his administration (B).

WHEN the king of Spain was informed of this open defection of the provinces, he attributed the whole to the prince of Orange, and proceeded directly to proscribe him; he confiscated his estate, upbraided him with ingratitude, and stained his character with ignominy. He even promised a reward of 25,000 crowns to whoever should bring him the prince of Orange dead or alive, the same to his heirs in case the attempter perished in the enterprize; and he declared all those proscribed, their estates confiscated, their honours and dignities abolished, who adhered to William a month after the publication of this edict.<sup>a</sup>

The prince of Orange proscribed.

- c THE prince of Orange did not silently pass over this proscription; he employed one Villiers a Frenchman, to refute the edict: his answer was well received, and is recorded by historians as a proof of the spirit, the equity, the prudence, and the moderation of the prince. However, when it was proposed to the states for their opinion, with a request they would publish it in their own name, they declined it, assigning for a reason, that it contained some facts too little known to be credited, and perhaps too much acrimony and resentment against a prince whose power they still dreaded. With these recriminations ended the transactions of the year.

- d THE following year was ushered in with great commotions at Brussels, excited by one Ruyskenvelt a monk, who was strongly attached to king Philip. This man by preaching, declaiming, and haranguing, endeavoured to enflame the minds of the people against the late measures, and to stir them up to revolt against the new administration. Mobs assembled in the streets with a view of admitting the Spanish troops, but they were dispersed by the governor and garrison. Finding that the monks in general were concerned in a conspiracy against the magistrates, the governor ordered their churches to be shut up, their most valuable images and religious ornaments to be sold, and themselves banished the city. Soon after these commotions were settled, the duke of Parma projected an enterprize against Flushing. Certain Zealanders were corrupted to betray their country; but they took the duke's money, and apprized the prince of Orange of the design, by which means it was defeated. In Brabant the states contented themselves with maintaining their ground, without aspiring at new acquisitions. The garrisons of Bergen-op-Zoom, Villevorde, and e Willebrocke, mutinied for their arrears, but they were appeased by the payment of a part of their demands. As to the duke of Parma, though he was in great want of money, and therefore unable to undertake any considerable enterprize, yet he had this advantage over the states, that he could suffer the soldiers of the garrison to live at free quarters upon the burghers; a liberty on which the others did not presume, from an apprehension of irritating those spirits to be gained only by soothing, cajoling and moderation. Count Mansvelt was detached by the duke with a body of forces to attack Nivelle, an enterprize in which he succeeded with little difficulty; while Conde was recovered with equal facility by the duke of Parma in person. On the other stand, Harspenne surprised the citadel of Breda, defended only by a very slender garrison, and soon reduced the city. This officer's next attempt f was on Gertruydenberg, but it failed<sup>b</sup>.

Designs of the duke of Parma defeated.

DURING these petty hostilities, the states, after long deliberations at the Hague, published an edict, excluding king Philip from any sovereignty, right, or authority over the Netherlands. This writing appeared on the 26th of July, under the title of "The abdication of Philip king of Spain." It was extremely well drawn up, stated in the strongest

(B) As to the provinces of Holland and Zealand, they were left wholly in the hands of the prince of Orange, whose power as stadtholder was in no respect limited by the duke's sovereignty. After all, Grotius affirms, that the duke's authority was merely nominal, that the real power devolved on the prince of Orange, whose name, however, was used in all public acts only in a subaltern capacity. It was apparent indeed to the French, that William concealed ambitious views under the cloak of patriotism, but it was not convenient to discover their sentiments (1).

manner the mutual privileges of the king and people, proved that the allegiance of the latter was void by the breach of contract on the side of the former, enumerated the oppressive and tyrannical acts of his government, set aside his authority for the most cogent reasons, forbid money to be coined in his name, and took every other step towards independency. It was in vain for Philip to remonstrate, he knew the states were to be convinced only by the sword; to this therefore he appealed. The duke of Parma blocked up Cambray so closely, that the garrison was reduced to the extremity of living upon horses, dogs, and cats, though they still refused to capitulate, in hopes of being succoured. At length the duke of Anjou assembled a body of 10,000 foot, and 4000 horse, and approached Cambray. The viscount de Turenne and count Voulondois undertook to force themselves, with a body of men, but they were surrounded and taken prisoners by the Spaniards. This disappointment did not discourage the duke of Anjou: he still pressed forward with intention to attack the Spanish lines; but the duke of Parma, not caring to hazard a battle, deserted his works, and retired to Bouchain. As soon as the duke of Anjou entered the city, he took an oath to govern it agreeable to its ancient laws, and to preserve the citizens in the full possession of all their liberties. He was now pressed by the states and the prince of Orange to march directly into Flanders; he endeavoured to comply, but his army composed chiefly of volunteers, was so weakened by desertion, that the design was laid aside <sup>1</sup>.

It was about this time that the duke of Anjou resumed the notion of addressing Elizabeth queen of England, and proposing marriage to a princess too fond of independency to be shackled with the authority of a husband. The prince, not deterred by the ill success of his former negotiation, determined upon a voyage to England; an excursion which proved equally unsuccessful to himself and unfortunate to the United Provinces. He was magnificently entertained, led into a persuasion that all would succeed according to his wish, and at length tired out with tedious expectation. In his absence, St. Guilan was reduced by the prince of Espinoi. This general directed his march towards Dunkirk, with intention to join the French forces. The duke of Parma, who had notice of his motion, repaired to seize the opportunity of investing Tournay. He began his approaches, and was vigorously received by that garrison, inspired by the courage of the princess Maria d'Espinoi, niece of count Horn, so cruelly beheaded by the duke d'Alva. The town was stormed in breach by the duke of Parma, who supported the assailants in person, received a wound, and had the mortification to see his Spaniards thrown headlong from the walls. The duke of Anjou repeatedly promised succours, but either forgot or could not perform his engagements; the latter indeed is the most probable, as he was certainly a dupe to the superior policy of Elizabeth, who had not yet declared openly in favour of the states. In the end, despairing of relief, harassed with perpetual watching, and weakened by losses, the garrison capitulated on the 29th of November. The conditions were honourable, and the princess d'Espinoi in particular was received with particular marks of distinction by the duke of Parma, who highly esteemed the heroic qualities of this amazon. This advantage was succeeded by another obtained by the Spanish general Verdugo, over the confederate army in Friseland, commanded by general Norris, and William-Lewis of Nassau, a young prince of great expectation. It appears from the Spanish account, that Norris was attacked in a defile, where he could not draw out his troops in battalia, that he was put in confusion, and defeated with great loss. On the other hand, the Dutch writers alledge, that he attacked the enemy, but being inferior in cavalry, retreated in good order, with scarce any loss <sup>m</sup>.

THE next year began with a spectacle very unusual in the Netherlands, the public entry of a sovereign elected by the people. The duke of Anjou setting sail from England on the 8th day of February, arrived on the 10th at Flushing, where he was received by the princes of Orange and d'Espinoi. Next day they set out for Antwerp with a magnificent retinue, and went up the Scheld attended by fifty barges. His reception at Antwerp was splendid, beyond any thing ever seen in the provinces; they even exceeded the preparations made for Philip himself on his being appointed to the government in the Netherlands by Charles V. his father. A theatre was erected before the walls of the citadel, in which was placed a chair of state, covered with cloth of gold. There the duke was seated, and the conditions read to him, upon which he was received as duke of Brabant. When he had sworn to observe the articles, he was clothed with the ducal robe, and his head adorned with the ducal coronet by the prince of Orange, who said, "I will pin it in such a manner that it will not be easily shaken;" an expression which at that time was taken for a happy omen, though it soon proved fallacious <sup>n</sup>.

WHILE the states of Brabant were employed in festivity and mirth, an action that would have proved fatal to the provinces was on the point of execution at Antwerp. A Biscayan merchant named Gasper Anafra had contrived a project to redeem his shattered fortune by

- a the death of the prince of Orange. He corrupted one of his domestics by the promise of half the reward, to strike the blow. The assassin entered the citadel, and as the prince was passing after dinner into another room, discharged a pistol, and dangerously wounded him behind the ear. The prince was stunned with the force of the ball, and before he recovered the assassin was killed by his attendants, which prevented for a time the absolute discovery of the plot, though it afterwards appeared from circumstances. It was traced that he had confessed the secret to a Dominican named Antonio Tunmermon, receiving from the wicked priest absolution, and a promise of eternal reward. Tunmermon was hanged, drawn, and quartered, his limbs being fixed up on the walls of the citadel at Antwerp. Nothing could more fully prove the importance of William's life, than the rejoicings of the Spaniards, in b a false report of his death, and of the confederates as soon as it was fully confirmed that his life was in no danger. It was, perhaps, not very prudent in the prince of Parma to write circulatory letters to the cities on the presumption that the prince of Orange was no more; since it afforded suspicion that he was not ignorant of the conspiracy. Finding the report groundless of the prince's death, Parma determined to begin hostilities. Oudenarde was invested and closely besieged from the 8th of April to the 23d of July. The brave defence made by the garrison, gave the duke of Anjou sufficient time to come to the relief of the town, had his army been sufficiently strong for the enterprize; but he had not yet received the expected reinforcement from France, and was under the necessity of contenting himself with the surprisal of Alost, by way of retaliation. His infantry was encamped, and under c the command of count de Rochefort, before the walls of Ghent. Here the count was attacked by the duke of Parma, who after an obstinate conflict was forced to retire, without being able to bring on a general engagement.

An attempt made on the life of the prince of Orange.

Oudenarde taken by the duke of Parma.

- On the first of July a conspiracy against the duke of Anjou, the prince of Orange, and d'Espinoi, was happily discovered at Bruges. The accomplices of the plot were seized and tortured, upon which they declared that they were expressly employed by the duke of Parma. It is probable that the duke must have received positive orders to this effect from the court of Spain; for so base and little a revenge was totally inconsistent with the generous and heroic qualities of that warrior. For the remainder of the campaign, the chief operations consisted in the surprising of inconsiderable places: both sides were unable to take d the field with dignity or advantage for want of troops and money. The duke of Parma had a great number of forces in the Netherlands; but they were necessarily employed in garrisoning those towns the inhabitants of which were suspected; and the states were prevented from augmenting their army, because no settled provision was made for their maintenance. The king's chief army in the field did not exceed 4000 men, and yet it was superior to the confederate forces. It was now the great aim of the duke of Parma to obtain the consent of the Walloons, that the Spanish forces might return into the Netherlands; he gained so much upon the affections of the people that they readily came into his sentiments; but the nobility still opposed him, from the apprehension that their own services would then be of less consequence. The nobility, however, were forced to yield to the clamours of the e people and the king's command, who gave orders that 5000 Spaniards and 4000 Italians should immediately begin their march for Flanders. Such an accession to the enemy's strength required the utmost vigilance and activity on the side of the confederates, who immediately engaged in their service 4000 Swiss infantry, and a body of French cavalry, under the conduct of prince Dausin, and Arnaud de Biron. But as the auxiliaries of neither party arrived before it was late in the season, they were put into winter-quarters, in order to commence operations with vigour in the spring.

A conspiracy against the duke of Anjou, &c.

Spanish troops again admitted into the Netherlands.

- The taking of Endove by surprise, and some other spirited actions, prepossessed the people strongly in favour of the duke of Anjou, and inspired them with hopes, that, with his brother's assistance, he would soon oblige the Spaniards to evacuate the Netherlands. But these expectations were frustrated by the apparent coldness with which Henry III. promoted the duke's interest. Both princes were indeed of too indolent and easy a disposition to employ much attention on public affairs, which they left intirely to the management of their favourites and minions. It was owing equally to jealousy and inactivity, that Henry feebly assisted his brother; if the duke succeeded in his enterprize, the king foresaw he would become independent; if he failed, he must fall back an incumbrance on the crown. This determined Henry to steer a middle course, to feed him with hopes, and supply him with succours just sufficient to prevent his sinking, but very inadequate to what was necessary to insure success. It would indeed be an unpopular measure entirely to abandon the duke of Anjou, who would probably gain a strong party in the kingdom from the cruelty of the usage, and the pusillanimity of Henry. On the other hand, the duke, who had figured to himself on his arrival in the Netherlands, all the power and pomp of despotism, finding that he was now destitute of money, forces, and councils, abandoned himself to the direction and admonitions of the young people about him, whose views in coming to Flanders was to enrich themselves at the expence of the Flemings. They were perpetually throwing out complaints of the ingratitude of the states, which served only to irritate the people and alienate their affections from the new government. In a short time, he entirely lost the confidence of the people, by means of his pernicious counsellors, who advised him to seize with the French forces on Newport, Dixmuyde, Ostend, Bruges, Dendermond, Alost, Vilvorde, Antwerp, and the several towns and cities round which the French and Flemish troops were quartered. By gaining the entire possession of these places, it was weakly imagined, he might render himself arbitrary, and fix the states in dependence upon the French interest. The project was executed with success at Dunkirk, St. Vinoc, Dixmuyde, and Vilvorde, but it failed at Antwerp and other places. The duke took it upon himself to gain possession of Antwerp; but the vigilance of the prince of Orange, and the courage of the burghers, defeated the attempt, and obliged the French to retire, with the loss of 1500 men killed and taken prisoners<sup>a</sup>. He afterwards endeavoured to apologize for his conduct, which he attributed to accident; and the states not daring to exasperate a prince in possession of so many of their towns, seemed to give credit to his excuses, while they determined narrowly to watch his conduct.

Prince of Orange's remonstrance to the States.

As soon as these transactions were known in France and England, Henry and Elizabeth offered their mediation to appease the difference, and reconcile the duke to the states. Elizabeth advised him to dismiss the counsellors of this measure, as well as the officers employed in the execution, as the only step that could possibly regain the affections and confidence of the people. The states would do nothing without consulting their great leader the prince of Orange, whose sentiments upon this subject they demanded. William's answer was such as might increase the high opinion of his foresight, prudence, and penetration, tho' some have supposed that it was dictated by ambition. In the present circumstances of affairs, only one of these methods can be chosen; either to make peace with the king of Spain, to reconcile themselves with the duke of Anjou, or to defend their liberties with the native forces, without having recourse to foreign powers. As to the first, it was impracticable without renouncing all the advantages proposed by the war, and receiving worse conditions than had been proposed by the duke d'Alva. It was, he said, no difficult matter to heal the breach between the states and the duke of Anjou; but in doing this, they were again exposed to the same danger from which they lately had been so providentially delivered. With respect to the remaining alternative, that of defending their liberties by national troops, it would, he said, be much the most desirable, were it possible; but he feared, that neither the chiefs were unanimous, the provinces rich, and the people numerous enough to rely upon their endeavours. Upon the whole, however, he recommended this last course, provided any degree of harmony of counsels could be established, and that all the provinces would resolve to act up to their engagements. But he submitted his sentiments to the judgment of the states, declaring, that he would be wholly governed by their opinion. Many persons imagined that he sought to increase the public distraction in the strong manner in which he stated the difficulties consequent on every possible measure. It is not improbable, that the states were likewise of this opinion, from the resolution they formed of being reconciled to the duke of Anjou<sup>c</sup>.

The States are reconciled to the duke of Anjou.

AFTER the prince's answer was fully examined, and the remonstrances of Bellievre the French ambassador, in favour of the duke of Anjou, heard, the states nominated deputies to confer with the duke. They had no expectation of assistance from Germany, the queen of England was sparing of her promises, money, and forces; but Henry III. not only engaged to assist them liberally if they would accommodate matters with his brother, but threatened in case of refusal to throw himself in the opposite scale. These menaces, and the desire that the duke would attempt the relief of Endove, now besieged near three months, hastened the negotiation. It was agreed that the French prisoners at Antwerp should be released, that the effects of the Flemish merchants seized in France, and the towns of Vilvorde, Dendermond, and Vinoc, should be restored; that the duke's army should take the field, and every thing be placed on the same footing as before the attempt on the liberty of the provinces; Endove in the mean time surrendered for want of provisions; and the marshal Biron, at the head of the French army, retaliated upon the Spaniards, by surprising the castles of Viersel and Woud, the latter of which was defended by a strong garrison. Viersel however was soon after retaken by the count Manfvelde. To stop the progress of Biron, the duke of Parma marched against him with all his forces, attacked him near Bergen-op-zoom, and defeated him, with the loss of 500 men. In this action Biron was wounded; but historians differ widely in particulars. After this advantage the Spanish general laid siege to Hirentals, but relinquished it on advice that the duke of Anjou, disgusted at the late defeat, a and the tedious deliberations of the states, had retired into France, leaving the sieur de Chamois with a slender garrison in Dunkirk. As this town was an object of more importance than Hirentals, he resolved to invest it with all his forces: his operations were so vigorously pushed, that Chamois, after several brisk sallies, was obliged to surrender. He was no sooner in the possession of this port, than he equipped a great number of armed vessels to cruize upon the Zealanders, restrain their enormities, and make reprisals. To the reduction of Dunkirk succeeded the submission of Furnes and Newport; then of St. Vinox, Dixmuyde, and Menin *. Dunkirk taken.

THE rapidity of the prince of Parma's conquests rendered more apparent the effects of the dissensions in the states, the want of unanimity, and of a head to direct their councils. The duke of Anjou returns to France.
b Of all men the prince of Orange, who was perfectly acquainted with the humour of the people, and the state of affairs, was the fittest to preside, but jealousy obstructed his promotion. That prince had now by a fourth marriage formed a strong interest with the protestants of France, having espoused Louisa de Coligni, daughter to the famous admiral Coligni. His life was every day in danger, upon account of the services he had done the provinces; he was firmly attached to liberty; but his ambition, which, however he restrained, and artfully concealed, was dreaded to such a degree, that though all acknowledged his superior capacity, few ever thought of raising him to the supreme government †.

c THE duke of Anjou's retreat was of the utmost service to the duke of Parma, who artfully fomented the division in the provinces, and every day strengthened his army by desertions from the enemy, not of individuals but of whole cities and garrisons. On the 5th of March he received deputies from Ghent. The seditious and tumultuous spirit of the inhabitants had forced the prince of Orange to quit the city, and abandon that rebellious people to their fate; upon which they desired to be restored to the favour of king Philip, promising him the utmost loyalty and fidelity, provided their privileges were secured. These however were only the sentiments of a party: the greater part of the citizens remained attached to the states, and being seasonably supported by a body of troops from Brussels and Antwerp, suppressed the Spanish faction, just as it was upon the point of delivering up the city to the duke of Parma. A. D. 1584. Commotions in Ghent.

d AMIDST these confusions the duke d'Anjou died in France, and soon after the prince of Orange was assassinated at Delph, by one Balthazar Gerrard or Guion, a person who had before served his highness with fidelity and zeal. He was at that very time employed by the prince to carry letters into France, and had received money to bear his expences, with which he purchased pistols to murder his benefactor. At the criminal's examination, it appeared that he had long meditated this bloody action, and was confirmed in his resolution by the jesuits and catholic priests; he even affirmed on the rack that the duke of Parma was privy to the design, who promised he should have the reward: upon the whole, Gerrard seems to have been an enthusiast, and his crime the result rather of insanity, than any concerted scheme, malicious or interested intention. His punishment however regarded only the action; it was cruel beyond measure, shocking to humanity, and a striking instance of the vehement party-spirit of the times; not of the justice of the judges, or the attachment of the people to the prince of Orange †. The prince of Orange assassinated at Delph.

S E C T. III.

Containing an account of the state of Affairs consequent of the death of the Prince of Orange, the stadtholdership of Prince Maurice, and the government of the Earl of Leicester, with other particulars.

f THE United Provinces were now deprived of their chief hope; William was the soul of the union, though he found it frequently impossible to govern the passions of the multitude; his vigilance, address, penetration, eloquence, liberality, and prudence, had hitherto preserved their liberty; but his ambition, boldness, cunning, and intrigue, had involved them in a maze of politicks, out of which it required his superior capacity to extricate the Netherlands. A general gloom and despondency appeared in every face; confusion and anarchy now reigned in the councils of the confederates. The provinces of Zealand and Holland alone endeavoured to repair the loss, and shew their gratitude to William, by electing his son Maurice their stadtholder and captain general by sea and land. Maurice was at that time eighteen years of age; but such rays of genius shone forth in his character, as approved him worthy of the honours conferred. Such was the Prince Maurice elected stadtholder of Holland.

youth opposed to the duke of Parma, the most renowned general of the age. It was imagined in Spain, that the death of William would deprive the confederates, not only of counsel, but of courage, longer to resist the power of Philip; but as soon as the first emotions of terror and grief were subsided, it produced very contrary effects. Revenge took place of despair, and the horror of the assassination, universally attributed to the intrigues of Philip, so irritated the people, that they determined to prosecute the war with such vigour and constancy, as required the exertion of all the duke of Parma's abilities. For a time indeed their efforts were feeble, because they were ill directed; but Zealand and Holland having led the way, Utrecht, Guelderland, and Overijssel followed the example; choosing governors strongly attached to the cause of liberty, and to the memory of the prince of Orange. Now they united themselves more closely; they came to a resolution, that if any article of the treaty of Utrecht had been broken or neglected, henceforward strictly to observe it, to remove difficulties, duly to furnish the several quotas, to permit only the public exercise of the evangelical religion, and to exert their utmost efforts to resist the tyranny of Philip, and revenge the assassination of their great deliverer the prince of Orange.

WHILE the provinces were taking the most vigorous measures for their mutual defence, the Spanish general was preparing to push the advantage he expected from the disorder consequent on the death of William of Orange. Antwerp, notwithstanding its losses in the beginning of the troubles, was still the most wealthy city of the Netherlands; this city had long been the object of the duke of Parma's designs, but the enterprize was attended with such difficulties as obliged him until now to defer it. He once proposed laying siege to Antwerp, immediately after the reduction of Maestricht, and he now resumed the project, in hopes that the confusion in the provinces would prevent their sending the required succours; to succeed, it was necessary to cut off the communication of the city with Holland, with Ghent, and all the places above and below Antwerp on the river Scheld. With this view he laid siege to Lifkenshouk and Tillo, places of the utmost consequence to the commerce and security of the city: both were obstinately defended, and the siege of the latter raised after it had been carried on for three months with incredible fatigue, industry, and expence; however, the duke of Parma gained possession of several other posts on the river, where he built forts, and greatly annoyed the shipping and trade of Antwerp. He next laid siege to Dendermonde, in order to cut off the communication between Ghent and Antwerp; in which he succeeded by the reduction of the town. His next attempt was on Vilvorde; this place he took by assault, and thereby put a stop to the intercourse between Antwerp and Brussels. Finding this method of hemming in the city tedious and ineffectual, while an opening to the mouth of the river remained, he proposed in council, that a fortified bridge should be built across the Scheld, and defended by strong forts and outworks at both extremities. At first this proposition was received as whimsical and idle by the members of the council, but on the duke's explaining his design, with applause: while he was procuring the proper materials for his design, the inhabitants of Ghent, terrified with the preparations, and assured that his next attempt would be directed against their city, resolved to deprecate his wrath by their submission. Deputies were accordingly sent to the duke of Parma; and it was agreed on the 17th of September, that Ghent should receive a Spanish garrison, on condition the city should be preserved in all its privileges.

Ghent submits

werp.

AFTER this acquisition the duke returned to his main object, the reduction of Antwerp; he began with collecting great quantities of wood at Callo and fort St. Philip, where he intended the bridge should be erected; but his project was for a time retarded by the Antwerpers, who broke down the dykes, overflowed the whole country, and swept off with the inundation all the duke's magazines. Not discouraged by this accident, he applied himself diligently to repair the loss, and, by way of carrying off the waters, cut a canal from Steken to Callo, a work of prodigious labour and expence. It was pursued with the utmost diligence, and executed with expedition scarce credible. Next he set to work upon the bridge, and finished, without interruption from the Zealanders or Antwerpers, in seven months, that stupendous monument of his genius, which was to determine the fate of Antwerp. Private interest, even when all was at stake, prevented the Antwerpers from executing a scheme which would have infallibly baffled all the duke's endeavours, and effectually have destroyed the fruits of his labour. Aldegonde the governor proposed building a fort on Couvensteyn dyke, to secure that important post, and breaking down the dyke, after the duke of Parma's bridge should be near finished; but his sentiments were violently opposed by certain citizens, who apprehended their lands and villas would be destroyed by the inundation: this unseasonable opposition, with the inexcusable

a' fable negligence of the magistrates, who, depending upon a free intercourse by means of the river, deferred laying in corn, because the markets happened to be high, occasioned the loss of the city, and was a flagrant proof that William of Orange no longer directed their councils. However, in despite of all the duke of Parma's precautions, the Zealanders found means to throw in a convoy of corn; but the citizens knowing they would not run the hazard of carrying it back, so cheapened the price that those bold traders refused ever again bringing their goods to so bad a market. Thus, through avarice, indolence, and insensibility, did the Antwerpers see their ruin daily approaching, without seeming to observe it. They did not apprehend the consequence of quietly permitting the duke to finish the bridge, until it was too late to repair the error, and they began to suffer by famine; then they pressed the Zealanders to attempt their relief by attacking the bridge; but the reception those mariners had last met with, was no inducement to run fresh hazards: however, by order of the states, Treslong the admiral of Zealand was preparing to make the attempt. A squadron was appointed; but he deferred the enterprize under so many pretences, that he was superseded, and the command given to Hohenlo and Justin Nassau, who immediately attacked Liffkenshouk, with so much spirit and resolution, that it surrendered on the first summons. They next fell upon St. Antonio fort, which, together with several other posts, they took; but they neglected building a fort on a post they seized near Callo. The duke of Parma perceived their oversight; he forced the post, and then had it fortified.

c But as all the endeavours of the Zealand fleet could procure no relief to Antwerp, the governor and magistrates began to deliberate by what means they could now destroy the bridge, which they might have prevented the duke from ever completing. Seasonably Ginebelli, a Mantuan engineer, offered his services, undertaking at a certain expence to blow the whole work into the air: the expence was the main objection entertained by those penurious merchants, but this obstacle was at last surmounted by necessity; Ginebelli was provided with two large vessels, a number of small boats, the powder, combustibles, and all the other materials he required; he formed the two large vessels into fire-ships, set them adrift with the stream, and deceived the enemy by means of false fires lighted up in the fleet of small boats. The train of one of the fireships was consumed d before the time expected, and she blew up with a terrible explosion, but little damage to the bridge; the other was more successful, carrying off all the outworks, setting fire to the whole bridge, and burying above 500 soldiers in the ruins it made, among whom were the marquis de Roblais, the sieur Billy, and several Spanish officers of distinction: however, the terror which this dreadful stratagem of war occasioned, exceeded the damage; the fire was soon extinguished, and the bridge again repaired by the diligence of the duke: avarice deterred the Antwerpers from repeating the experiment; they continued nevertheless in conjunction with the Zealanders to attack and harass the enemy; but finding themselves baffled in every attempt, and reduced to the greatest extremities, they seriously thought of making their peace with Spain.<sup>c</sup> Deputies were accordingly sent to the duke e of Parma, a treaty was concluded, and king Philip's sovereignty again acknowledged in Antwerp. It is affirmed that the city of Amsterdam had obstructed every measure proposed for the relief of this commercial city, hoping to profit by the fate of her flourishing rival. It was not doubted but the protestants would forsake it as soon as it fell into the hands of an arbitrary catholic prince. The conjecture was fulfilled, whole families retiring with their effects to Amsterdam.

A. D. 1585.

While Antwerp was besieged, it was universally believed, that the fate of the provinces depended on the fortune of that city; yet such was the confusion among the confederates, that only feeble attempts were made for its relief. Now the terror inspired by the duke's conquests determined the states general to send a solemn deputation to the queen f of England, offering her the sovereignty of the provinces upon certain conditions. This Elizabeth refused; but she concluded a treaty with the states, whereby she engaged powerfully to assist them with men and money, upon having the towns of Brill, Flushing, and Ramekins, put into her hands in security of future payment. All this time Elizabeth and king Philip preserved little more than the appearance of peace; the latter was fomenting the insurrection in Ireland, while the former lent a hand to the foundation of a new commonwealth forming in the Netherlands. The addition of the kingdom of Portugal to his vast monarchy, rendered Philip more haughty and uncontrollable, without much enlarging his power; he now thought himself a match for all Europe, though he had not yet subdued his rebellious subjects in the Low Countries; and accordingly he embroiled himself with the g crowns of France and England, by protecting the league, and receiving the investiture of Ireland from the apostolic see. Elizabeth engaged by treaty to succour the provinces with

5000 foot and 1300 horse, under the command of an English general; to pay those troops during the war, on condition of being reimbursed when peace should be re-established; and to accept of the three towns mentioned in security of payment. The treaty farther imported, that the English governors of the cautionary towns should have no authority over the inhabitants; that the towns should be restored to the states on the repayment of the money; that the English general and two other persons nominated by the queen of England should have seats in the states general; that neither peace nor war should be made without the mutual consent of the contracting parties; that in case of her equipping a fleet for the services of the provinces, the states should back it with an equal force, the whole to be commanded by the English admiral; finally, that the ports and harbours of both countries should be open to the subjects of each nation. The treaty was no sooner signed, than the Brille was delivered into the hands of Sir Thomas Cecil; Sir Philip Sidney took possession of Flushing and Ramekins, in quality of governor; and the earl of Leicester was appointed general of the English auxiliaries. Immediately succeeded a manifesto in vindication of the queen's conduct, shewing her reasons for assisting the oppressed inhabitants of the Low Countries; here she alledged, that the alliance between England and the Netherlands related to the mutual welfare of both countries, rather than to any personal animosity between the sovereigns; her majesty therefore thought herself at liberty to succour the injured subjects, without declaring war against the king. She complained of the conduct of the Spanish minister Mendoza, who had endeavoured to excite factions, and stir up rebellion among her popish subjects: she enumerated the many proffers she had made of mediating a peace between the king and her good allies in the Netherlands; she taxed Philip with a design of invading England, with having sent powerful supplies of money to the rebels in Ireland; and lastly, to anticipate the king's vengeance, she equipped a squadron of twenty ships, detached under the conduct of Sir Francis Drake, to infest the Spanish settlements in the West Indies <sup>a</sup>.

A.D. 1586.
Leicester made governor-general.

ON the earl of Leicester's arrival in Holland, he was received with the utmost respect and veneration; the confederates had conceived great hopes of his abilities, they constituted him governor-general of the provinces, and before he had exhibited any proof of his valour or conduct, vested him with a power almost dictatorial, which he soon abused by an administration equally weak, wanton, cruel, and oppressive. His authority was in a manner unlimited, not only in respect to the conduct of the war, but in civil affairs and the finances. The confederates lavished honours upon the favourite chiefly to engage Elizabeth in their interest; and the queen penetrating their design, was by no means pleased with their extraordinary indulgence to her minion. Some attribute her resentment to jealousy, others with more probability to policy, which required that she should not too deeply involve herself in the quarrel between Philip and his subjects. It was soon perceived, that the confidence of the states was misplaced. Leicester not only shewed his incapacity to direct military operations; by permitting the duke of Parma to proceed in a rapid course of conquests; but he assumed the air of a sovereign prince, swayed arbitrarily in the Netherlands, and expressed a contempt of the queen of England's authority; a princess whose ill-judged favour had raised him to the height of ambition. They had suffered him to nominate a counsellor of state for each province, to change the great seal, and quarter his own arms with those of the states; but all this was insufficient to gratify the earl's ambition. Actuated by a kind of fatality, and intoxicated with his elevation, he refused the instructions of the states, filled up all vacant places, coined base nobles to pass for double their intrinsic value, erected a new court of exchequer, filled the colleges of the admiralty with his unqualified favourites, opposed the levying German auxiliaries, excited the people to rise against the magistrates, introduced disorder into the finances, and filled the provinces with confusion.

BEFORE Leicester had betrayed his incapacity, Elizabeth remonstrated to the states on his extraordinary elevation, without her knowledge or consent, notwithstanding she had publicly declared her intention was only to assist her oppressed neighbours, not to seize upon the sovereignty of the provinces: she now required that they would revoke those honours conferred so wantonly, not that she meant to desert their interest, but to maintain her own honour. The states submissively apologized for their conduct, and declared it was the farthest from their intention to offend her majesty; but finding that a governor-general was necessary to preserve unanimity, they had preferred a subject of England to any other. They had put the word absolute in the act only to distinguish him from some temporary governors, and to give weight to his dignity. They concluded with requesting her majesty, that she would not insist upon a revocation, which they apprehended would be attended with confusion, and the most fatal consequences. This letter was accompa-a nished with another from the earl, filled with the most humble submissions and feigned contrition, with which however Elizabeth rested satisfied <sup>c</sup>.

LEICESTER began his government with restoring military discipline, for regulating which he published some good ordinances. Had he kept to this plan, his administration would have been happy, and his person beloved; but he immediately proceeded to pass certain decrees relative to commerce, that were justly deemed very arbitrary, oppressive, and injurious to the country. He prohibited all kinds of warlike stores, provisions, or other merchandize, to be sold not only to the enemies of the state and their allies, but to neutral powers; by which means trade sustained considerable damage: he even prohibited all intercourse either by exchange or otherwise with Spain, France, and the northern powers, b under penalty of the confiscation of their ships and goods. The adviser of this measure was James Reginault, a person before odious to the people; and to enforce it, Reginault, in contempt of the council of state, procured an extraordinary commission to proceed with rigour against those who should be guilty of a trespass upon the decree: by this commission he was empowered to examine the books and papers of merchants, contrary to the ancient rights and privileges of the commercial inhabitants of the Netherlands. Leicester likewise demanded, that all foreign traders should have passports from him, by which he pretended he could greatly augment the revenue: certain it is, that he levied great sums by those oppressive measures; but no part was applied to the public service <sup>c</sup>.

WHILE the earl was busied in rendering his government odious, and destructive to the c people who had just promoted him to the pinnacle of human grandeur, the duke of Parma was pushing the operations of the campaign. Count Manfveldt was ordered to block up the town of Grave on the Maese, and to throw a bridge cross the river, to prevent the entrance of supplies. He built four forts upon the river, which he strongly garrisoned, and completed the bridge in the manner directed; though the garrison of Grave used every expedient to obstruct his operations. Leicester sent orders to Hohenlo and Norris, the general of the English infantry, to attempt the relief of the town; they immediately seized on the fort and town of Bottemburgh, but were driven from that post by Manfveldt, while they were preparing to entrench themselves; being afterwards reinforced, they attacked the Spaniards with such vigour as obliged them to retreat; however, the duke of Parma's ar- rival prevented their succouring Grave: he now turned the blockade into a siege, and carried on his approaches so rapidly, that the governor surrendered before a breach was made, or the garrison in the least stinted for provisions. Pursuing his successes, the duke of Parma led his army against Venlo, higher up the Maese, invested the town, and obliged the garrison in two days to capitulate, at the intreaty of the bishop of Cologne; he attacked Wuys, the garrison of which place had pillaged the country, and obstructed all convoys of provision; and by the impetuosity of the assault, forced the governor to submission. Next he reduced Meurs, Alphen, and the castle of Crulno; after which he invested Birk, but was forced to relinquish the enterprize; Morgan an English officer having thrown himself with 1000 men into the place <sup>c</sup>.

To stop the duke of Parma's progress, Leicester detached prince Maurice and Sir Philip Sidney with 2000 men into Flanders; they surprised the little town of Axel on the 17th of July; but failed in an enterprize formed against Graveline: at last, Leicester determined to take the field in person; he ordered the army to move to Guelderland, and, accompanied by the princes of the house of Nassau, and all the general officers, English, German, and Flemish, he arrived at Arnheim on the 6th of September; finding his strength inferior to the enemy's, he contented himself with reducing Doesburgh upon the Rbine, and blocking up Zutphen, into which the duke of Parma threw supplies at pleasure. It was in attacking one of these convoys that the brave, generous, gallant, and amiable Sir Philip Sidney lost his life. After taking all the outworks, and building little forts round the town f to restrain the excursions of the garrison, who levied heavy contributions on the neighbouring country, Leicester cantoned his army in winter-quarters, without effecting any thing worthy of the public expectation <sup>h</sup>.

DURING this recess from hostilities, the earl of Leicester would seem to have made it his whole study to render himself odious. He put into all vacant offices persons the most obnoxious to the people; and, among others, one York an Englishman, who had deserted from the confederates to the duke of Parma, served for two years in the Spanish army, and now deserted it to obtain preferment from the English general. The states remonstrated against the promotion of a person, who had so often betrayed his trust; but Leicester, without regarding them, poured down his favours upon a man whose sole talent consisted in a servile adulation and compliance with the humour of his patron. The government of Deventer became another cause of altercation between the governor and the states. That trust was conferred upon another Englishman, whose character was equally liable to censure. Besides, the right of appointing belonged to the earl of Meurs, as governor of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overyssel; but Leicester, without attending to his prerogative, or to the murmurs of the people, vindicated his own conduct, and refused to relinquish the interest of his dependent. Happily for the provinces, he was called to attend the English parliament. On his departure, the states exhorted him to use his influence with the queen to accept of the sovereignty of the Netherlands; he promised to exert his utmost endeavours, but at the same time was too much enamoured of power to have any intention to perform his engagements. While he resided at Flushing, waiting for a fair wind, he seduced the garrison of Vere, a place belonging to prince Maurice, persuading the soldiers that they owed no allegiance but to the queen of England and her governor. The same attempt was made on several other garrisons, in all which it is impossible to conceive Leicester could have any other object in view, than to render himself detestable to the very people whose affections he ought by every means to conciliate<sup>1</sup>. On his arrival in England, he wrote to the states, demanding payment of 480,000 livres, due in arrears to the army. Their answer was, that the supplies raised, if managed with oeconomy, were more than sufficient to answer every purpose of the government. Some altercation arose, which was followed by a long catalogue of grievances, transmitted from the states to queen Elizabeth. This produced mutual recriminations, which enflamed both sides to a degree of animosity.

He sets sail for England.

A. D. 1587.

Sluys besieged.

Leicester returns to Holland.

Now was the season for the duke of Parma to reap the advantage of these contentions. He made several motions, in order to perplex the confederates, and cover his designs. At last it appeared that he meditated the conquest of Flanders, by first reducing Ostend and Sluys. The former was saved by a seasonable reinforcement of seven hundred English; but Sluys was invested in despite of the utmost endeavours of prince Maurice and Hohenlo, who tried every expedient to divert the duke from this enterprize. As the place was badly provided, the governor sent repeatedly to Flushing for supplies; but the Spaniards had so closely blocked up all the avenues that it was impossible to throw in a convoy. The garrison, however, determined to make a vigorous defence. They withstood several assaults, and always displayed the most obstinate courage. Sluys had been now six weeks besieged; when the earl of Leicester, by the queen's mediation, returned to his government. On his arrival at Flushing, it was determined in a council of war to succour the place by sea. A detachment of five thousand foot and six hundred horse were ordered to make a diversion in favour of the fleet; but the project was frustrated by the narrowness of the channel, which would not admit the shipping. Leicester was blamed for not attacking the duke of Parma's trenches, and to his want of courage the public voice ascribed the loss of Sluys; which, after sustaining numberless hardships during a brave defence of two months, at last surrendered, when the garrison had expended all their provision and ammunition. The duke of Parma entertained so high an opinion of the conduct of the governor, Arnaudd de Groenveldt, and of the courage of the garrison, that he voluntarily granted them all military honours, their baggage, and lighted matches. His conquest indeed was dearly purchased; he lost in the siege seven general officers, and near four thousand soldiers<sup>2</sup>.

Disputes between Leicester and Hohenlo.

THE reduction of Sluys renewed the clamour against the earl of Leicester's administration. Out of compliment to the queen, he was again received by the provinces, but the reconciliation was not cordial. Had he however acted with proper spirit and prudence, he might have regained the esteem and affections of the people. He determined otherwise, and proceeded upon his old plan, of introducing discord, confusion and anarchy. He renewed his complaints against the states, prince Maurice, and Hohenlo. They answered; he replied in terms full of passion and resentment, in which he lost all regard to decorum. Hohenlo was, in particular, the object of his detestation, merely because he strenuously vindicated the privileges of his country, and discharged the duty of an able, bold, and faithful officer. He had this year performed considerable services in Brabant; but he was accused by Leicester of disobedience, because he had not joined the main army with his detachment, at a time when it was not possible, without sacrificing the public interest. Hohenlo published a very spirited and sensible answer, in which he fully vindicated his own conduct, and obliquely hinted at the weakness and absurdity of Leicester's measures. A long paper-altercation passed likewise between the states of Holland and the governor-general. Nothing can be more masterly than all the remonstrances published on this occasion by the states; they fully explain the privileges of the provinces, and the prerogative of the governor-general; vindicate their own conduct, without throwing blame on the queen of

<sup>a</sup> England; and artfully distinguish between the misconduct of the queen's lieutenant, and her majesty's own intentions. In a word, though Leicester was foiled at every weapon, such was the unsteadiness of the people, and address of his faction, that even the provincial states were divided in opinion; some blaming, while others highly applauded his conduct. The magistrates of Utrecht, and the clergy of Holland and Zealand strongly espoused his interests, and bitterly reflected on the states of Holland, whose opposition arose, they said, from a jealous, capricious, and turbulent humour. Even the magistrates of several towns in Holland, blamed the states, especially those of Dordrecht, who appeared to have solely enlisted themselves in the earl's faction. In the midst of these contentions Leicester imprudently gave colour to the accusations of his enemies, by forming a project to seize upon Leyden. The plan was concerted with one Cosmo de Pascarengis, an Italian banker; it was discovered by accident, and fully detected by the confession of the banker and his accomplices, on the rack. Killegrew, who was of the council of state for Elizabeth, interceded for the criminals, and boldly affirmed, in their vindication, that they had acted by orders from the governor-general<sup>1</sup>. This alone was sufficient testimony against Leicester; but the states not chusing to irritate and inflame the public dissensions, wisely suppressed their sentiments.

<sup>b</sup> WHEN the winter approached, lord Leicester was recalled, either for the defence of England, threatened with a Spanish invasion, or to prevent his falling into further errors in the Netherlands. The Dutch writers alledge, that the queen was so well satisfied of his misconduct, pride, and ambition, that she dreaded the consequences to her favourite, of suffering him longer to hold the reins of government, which he had hitherto directed with so little prudence and ability. Before he quitted the Low Countries, he sent an apology to the states of Holland, for not bidding them a personal farewell; he exaggerated the services he had done the provinces; gently reproached the states for having traversed all his measures, to which he attributed the failure of every enterprize; admonished them to a different behaviour; and promised upon these conditions to use his utmost influence with the queen in their behalf. On his arrival in England, though he was well received by Elizabeth, and appointed to the command of an army encamped at Tilbury, yet he was divested of his government. Leicester apprehending he should be arraigned before the council, had the address by his submission to procure the queen's pardon, and a stop to all proceedings touching his conduct in the Low Countries. However, his enemies were so powerful, and the remonstrances sent over by the states so evincive and undeniable, that nothing but the vast preparations in Spain to invade England, which turned the whole attention of the ministry to the security of the nation, could screen him from a public trial. Among other articles of accusation transmitted by the states, it appeared that the earl had formed a design to apprehend, and put to death John Olden Barneveldt, and thirteen other strenuous opposers of his arbitrary measures; to seize Dort, Enckhuysen, Leyden, and other places; in a word, to render himself despotic, and establish a kind of military government in the United Provinces<sup>m</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> By orders from the court of Spain, the duke of Parma, since the reduction of Sluys, was forced to drop all thoughts of pursuing his advantages in the Netherlands, in order to assist with his whole power the enterprize concerted against England. Here was a fair opportunity for the confederates to redeem their losses, had they not been divided by factions, and poorly supplied with money, ammunition, and provision, from England. The penurious disposition of Elizabeth would seem in this instance to have suppressed the dictates of prudence and sound policy. Spain had great confidence in the duke of Parma's assistance in carrying on the grand expedition. That general had assembled thirty thousand men to be transported into England, in four hundred flat-bottomed boats, under the convoy of a squadron of twenty ships of war; yet did Elizabeth use no expedient to divert his intention, by enabling the confederated provinces to engage him at home. All hostilities ceased on both sides until the miscarriage of the most formidable scheme ever planned for the conquest of England. It is not within our province to relate the circumstances which contributed to the defeat of the Spanish armada; sufficient it is, that providence seemed to co-operate with the intrepidity of lord Effingham, the English admiral, to baffle the designs, and mortify the pride of Philip. His fleet was first dispersed in a hard gale, afterwards roughly handled by the English, and at last shattered, destroyed, and wholly ruined, in a terrible storm, off the coast of Scotland. Seventeen ships, having five thousand land-forces on board, were cast away on the Hebrides and coast of Ireland; some were wrecked on the rocks of Norway, and many perished by fire, or were swallowed up by the ocean. In a word, of one hundred and thirty great ships, which set sail from the ports of Spain, manned with twenty thousand soldiers and nine thousand seamen, and mounting two thousand three hundred and sixty pieces of fine cannon, only fifty-three ever returned, and these in a miserable, shattered condition".

Negotiations
in the Netherlands.

WHILE Philip and Elizabeth were making the utmost preparations, the one for attacking, the other for defending England, they both endeavoured to gain time, by amusing each other with a negotiation. It was the business of Philip to procrastinate matters until he should be able to strike, and of Elizabeth, until her affairs should be in a posture to ward off the blow. The king sent the duke of Parma a commission to treat with the English envoys; he accordingly repaired to Ostend, and the conferences were opened at Bourbourg, notwithstanding the estates of the Netherlands had refused to consent to the treaty. It was proposed by the English, that liberty of conscience should be granted for two years to the reformed; but neither the duke of Parma, nor the estates, would hearken to this proposition. A truce was in the next place demanded by the commissaries, and rejected by the duke. Then they required that the ancient alliance between England and the house of Burgundy should be renewed; that all foreign troops should be withdrawn from the Low Countries; that the people should be secured in their liberties; and that the money lent the estates by queen Elizabeth should be repaid by the king of Spain. A variety of debates arose upon these articles, and it was obvious that the whole design of the conference was to retard measures until the armada should enter the channel. It no sooner appeared than the negotiations were broke off, and the English commissioners dismissed with a safe-conduct to Calais.

the field.

As soon as the defeat of the grand expedition was known in the Netherlands, the duke of Parma turned his attention to the affairs of his government. He now determined to repair the loss sustained from his late inactivity, by prosecuting the most vigorous measures. The marquis de Renthes and Charles Mansveldt, were sent with a strong detachment to reduce the Isle of Tolen, separated by a canal from Brabant. By this he meant to facilitate his approaches against Bergen-op-Zoom. The bravery of colonel count Solmes frustrated the attempt on the island. He repulsed the Spaniards in two vigorous attacks, but could not prevent the duke from forming the siege. Bergen-op-Zoom was invested on the 24th of September. It was defended by lord Willoughby, general of the English forces, and an English garrison, with so much spirit and intrepidity, that after divers efforts and stratagems of war, the duke was forced to relinquish the enterprize. Chagrin and disappointment having impaired the duke of Parma's health, and the season becoming rigorous, he put his army into winter-quarters.

ON the 14th of September died the earl of Leicester, to the great joy of the states of Holland, who now at length conceived hopes that they might be able to crush his faction, and introduce harmony among those provinces so long torn by civil dissensions, while they were maintaining a war against the most powerful potentate of Europe. Immediately the towns which, in consequence of his protection, had withdrawn their allegiance from the states, returned to their duty. The garrison of Gertruydenberg alone stood out; they first mutinied, then revolted against the states, and at last threw themselves into the arms of the duke of Parma, after committing shocking outrages, under pretence that they had sworn only to obey the queen and Leicester. Willoughby and the English are blamed by Dutch historians for their conduct in this transaction. The year concluded with the siege of Wachtendock, an enterprize formed by count Peter Ernest Mansveldt, contrary to the opinion of Verdugo, and the most experienced generals in the Spanish army, and indeed of the duke of Parma himself. The place was strong and well provided; the season was rigorous, and the Spanish soldiers reluctant, and averse to the undertaking; but Mansveldt's success was a full vindication of his conduct. The garrison surrendered on the 20th of December, after the town had almost been laid wholly in ashes by a ruinous bombardment. Some writers alledge that Mansveldt used only ignited bullets, with which he set fire to the place, and terrified the garrison into submission.

State of the Spanish affairs in the Netherlands.

In the beginning of the year this general passed into the isle of Bommel, where he reduced several forts, but failed in his principal aim, that of seizing the capital by surprise. While he was thus employed, prince Maurice, count Solmes, and Hohenlo, uniting their forces, attacked and retook Heusden in sight of the Spanish army. From this time we may date the decline of Philip's affairs. His best officer the duke of Parma was in a bad state of health, his soldiers became mutinous for their pay, and his finances were exhausted by the immense expences of the armada, and the destruction of his commerce and rich plate fleet. Jealousies likewise arose between the duke of Parma and the Spaniards, who even had the presumption to tax that great general with the miscarriage of the grand expedition, and of the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom. One John Mora, a Spaniard, wrote letters of coma plaint to the king, in which he bitterly inveighed against the duke; these letters were intercepted by prince Maurice, decyphered, and sent to the duke of Parma. In consequence Ricardot was dispatched to Madrid, to vindicate the duke, and Mora being invited to dinner was poisoned: an action, that leaves an indelible stain on the character of the duke of Parma.

WHILE the duke was drinking the waters of the Spaw, the marquis of Waremben, the Spanish governor in Guelderland, projected a scheme for reducing the whole province, and began the execution with surprizing the castle of Bleimbeck. He then resolved to lay siege to Rhimberg, but was anticipated by a strong reinforcement thrown in by general Schenk. Besides reinforcing Rhimberg, this active officer cut off a regiment of Spaniards in Frise-
b land, but unfortunately perished in an unsuccessful attempt on Nimeguen. Waremben, after Schenk's death, renewed his design on Rhimberg, but constant supplies were thrown in by lord Falkenstein and Sir Francis Vere, who commanded a body of 2000 English infantry. The marquis resolved to attack the English. He sent a strong detachment to that purpose; but the Spaniards met with so warm a reception, that they retired in disorder, with the loss of 300 men and ten standards. Notwithstanding this advantage, the states suffered Rhimberg to fall into the hands of the enemy, because they found it expensive and hazardous to cover with an army a place so distant from their frontiers. The loss of Rhimberg however was balanced by divers successes in Groningen, where prince Maurice foiled the Spanish general Verdugo in every attempt. Notwithstanding he had not an army sufficient to perform
c any signal exploit, or considerable enterprize, the Batavian prince exhibited sufficient proofs of his superior military talents and towering genius. One very important blow was given to the power of Spain in the Netherlands by the reduction of Breda. This city and Gertruydenberg were the keys of Brabant; and the loss of the latter had wholly excluded the confederates from that province. A project was laid for surprizing Breda, and it succeeded. The master of a trading vessel, who was permitted to supply the Spanish general with necessaries, took on board about sixty Dutch foldiers, and concealed them so artfully under planks and boards, that his vessel was visited in the usual manner by the officers on guard, without discovery. In the night, the concealed party seized upon the city-gates, and being opposed by Hobenlo, who lay with a body of troops at a little distance from the d town, gained possession without hardly striking a blow. By order of the duke of Parma, the commanding Spanish officer was put to death for neglect of duty, cowardice, and remissness. He afterwards took every possible method to recover Breda. Mansveldt was detached with a select body of troops to attack Nortdam, a fort on the canal, by which the city was supplied with necessaries; but he was so warmly received by Matthias Hall, a Fleming, who commanded, that he retired precipitately, leaving 600 dead before the fort. A. D. 1590.
e All he could effect was to build a fort opposite to Nortdam, to restrain the garrison; after which he invested Breda. Prince Maurice immediately took the field to protect a town of such consequence. He marched straight to Nimeguen, and by his operations persuaded the duke of Parma that he intended besieging the town; upon which Mansveldt was ordered to relinquish Breda, and succour Nimeguen, a town of still infinitely greater moment. In despite of Mansveldt's endeavours, prince Maurice erected the fortress of Knotzembourg, to cut off the trade of Nimeguen, and facilitate any future attempts to reduce the city.

THOUGH the naval power of the states was greatly augmented, and their commerce carried to a high degree, they could not restrain the pernicious prizes of the Dunkirk privateers, which swarmed in all the neighbouring seas, to the immediate damage of traffic. The Zealanders equipped several squadrons of small vessels; but these being found insufficient to restrain the pirates, grown bold by success, it necessarily became a national concern. The different colleges of the admiralty stationed a number of ships in such a f manner as to block up the port of Dunkirk, by which means numbers of privateers loaded with booty fell into their hands before they could enter the harbour, and others were prevented from putting to sea. We have, in a former volume, largely expatiated on the origin and progress of the Dutch commerce, which took its rise from their profitable voyages to the East-Indies, and the ruin of Antwerp; it will therefore be unnecessary to dwell upon it in this place. Sufficient it is, that the provinces were now enabled to furnish their contingencies towards the public expence, to act offensively, and maintain greater armies, than they had ever before sent into the field. They even sent supplies of men and money, to support Henry IV. against the league and the king of Spain, whence they deduced the advantage of making a powerful diversion from the Netherlands.

prince Maurice.

ABOUT this time, the duke of Parma received orders to hasten to the assistance of the duke of Mayence, defeated by Henry IV. with the greater part of the Spanish army in the Low Countries. The duke immediately perceived that the loss of the Netherlands would be the consequence; but his orders being absolute, he directed his march with 12000 foot, and 3000 horse, to the frontiers of France, leaving count Mansveldt to conduct the war against the United Provinces. This general was too weak to keep the field, or to prevent prince Maurice from razing and destroying all the Spanish forts on the frontiers of the provinces. The confederates resolving to make the most of the opportunity, attacked and reduced the fort of Blamemberg. This enterprise was conducted by Norris, governor of Ostend, for the queen of England. The garrison retreating to another fort in the Dunes, he vigorously assaulted this fortress, took it, and put the garrison to the sword. b
On the 2d of April the garrison of Breda surprised the castle of Turnbont, one of the largest villages of Brabant; and on the 9th of May they gained possession of Westerloo, a place extremely convenient for keeping the province under contribution. As soon as the season was sufficiently advanced to afford forage for the cavalry, the states sent an army of 10,000 foot, and 1000 horse, into the field, under the conduct of prince Maurice, lately made governor of Guelderland, and by thus directing the affairs of three of the most considerable provinces of the union, raised to great influence and authority. By this time the duke of Parma was returned, after having acquired laurels in a defensive war against Henry IV. by relieving Paris. Maurice made some movements which raised apprehensions in the duke for Gertruydenberg, imagining his design was upon that city; but the prince c turned suddenly towards the territory of Velaw, and presented himself before Zutphen; after having the good fortune to seize by a stratagem upon some of the outworks, he then regularly invested the place, and pursued his operations with so much rapidity, that the garrison capitulated on condition that they should have a safe-conduct to Deventer. The Spanish garrison no sooner entered this last place, than Maurice was close at their heels, laid siege to Deventer, and took it after a short resistance. It was defended by Herman de Horam, being the prince's own cousin-german, who had served Philip with great fidelity, and would now have considerably retarded the progress of the confederate army, had he not received a wound in the face, by which he was confined. From Deventer the prince directed his rout to Groningen, with design to invest that city; but on receiving advice that d the garrison was strongly reinforced and well supplied, he filed off towards Delfziel, which together with some neighbouring forts he reduced, and thereby extremely incommoded the city of Groningen <sup>a</sup>.

As the duke of Parma's army did not exceed 5000 foot, and 2000 horse, he dreaded the extension of Maurice's conquests, and that Nimeguen would be the next object of his operations. To prevent this he determined to attack Knotsemberg, and thereby to throw unfurmoutable obstructions in the way of the confederates. After seizing some posts in the higher Guelderland, he made a feint as if he intended to fall upon fort Schenk, and then suddenly passing the Vaal, invested Knotsemberg on the 13th of July. The artillery of this fort totally destroyed the works on the opposite side of Nimeguen, and the garrison had more e the command of the river than the city itself. It was of great importance to Maurice to maintain this advantage; he was therefore watchful of the motions of the Spanish army, and suspected the duke's design which he had so artfully concealed. Before the duke of Parma approached, he had directed count Solmes powerfully to reinforce the garrison, and supply the fort with every necessary. He then followed with his army nearly equal to that of the enemy, and encamped at a short distance from the duke of Parma's trenches. The Spaniards carried on the siege with vigour, but every inch of ground they gained lost a multitude of lives. Frequent skirmishes passed between the two armies, in one of which Nicelli, captain of the horse-guards, and 400 troopers, were made prisoners. Very seasonably for the duke of Parma's reputation, he received an order to repair with all expedition f to France, leaving only troops sufficient for a defensive war in the Netherlands. He immediately complied with the royal mandate, and accordingly raised the siege, and covered his retreat with so much address, that he crossed the Vaal without furnishing the enemy with an opportunity of falling upon his rear. This was his last campaign in the Netherlands, where his long services had deservedly acquired him the reputation of an able, vigilant, and faithful general, though numberless attempts were made by envious Spaniards to blast his character. Before he quitted the Low Countries, he endeavoured to persuade the inhabitants of Nimeguen to admit a reinforcement of Spanish soldiers; but the magistrates not chusing to be saddled with foreign pensioners, took upon themselves the defence of the city <sup>x</sup>.

a PRINCE Maurice, satisfied with seeing Knotsemberg relieved, and the Spanish army weakened by the detachments sent off to France, passed to Guelderland, without, however, relinquishing his designs on Nimeguen. In the middle of September, he marched with 4000 foot, and 600 horse, into the territory of Was, and laid siege to Hulst. On the 19th the place was invested; the batteries began to play on the 23d, and by the 25th the garrison capitulated. The same terms were granted as to the other conquered places; that is, the inhabitants were permitted their own religion, but the magistrates were protestants. Count Solmes was appointed governor of the town and adjacent territory. As soon as transports could be provided, Maurice embarked a strong body of horse and foot, alarmed the whole coast of Flanders, spread a report that he proposed besieging Dunkirk or Newport, b then debarked his troops, and appeared unexpectedly before Nimeguen. He began with forming a bridge of boats across the river, to prevent the town's being supplied, then erected batteries, and all at once battered the walls with sixty-five pieces of heavy cannon. First, however, he summoned the magistrates; but they answered, "that as the prince c " was a young man, he ought to consider Nimeguen as a coy virgin, whose favours were " only to be gained by gallantry and assiduity." They soon, however, changed their tone, beat a parley, and desired to capitulate. The effects of the red hot balls poured into the city, terrified them into submission. All the conditions imposed by Maurice were accepted, only they refused to embrace the reformed religion, but consented to a liberty of conscience; and that the magistrates should be appointed by the prince, a right which he preserved during the course of the war. Six companies of foot and two troops of horse were left in garrison, after which Maurice put his army into winter-quarters in Overyssel and Friseland.

So glorious and successful a campaign highly elated the spirits of the people, and raised the young prince to the height of popularity and fame. Since his father's death, the United Provinces had experienced nothing but disappointment and misfortune. They were every where defeated, divided among themselves, impoverished, dispirited, and on the point of despair. The alliance of England contributed only to augment their misery, it rendered them dependent on the queen, and her insolent, capricious, and arbitrary lieutenant, whose sole aim was to establish despotic sway, by fomenting the civil discord of the provinces, and d forming a powerful faction. It is true, the English forces performed considerable services in the three last campaigns; but these were more than weighed down by the inconveniences consequent on Leicester's mal-administration. Now the Dutch saw their frontiers extended by prince Maurice, and the whole country secured by rivers, and covered by fortified towns, with the greatest probability of driving the Spaniards in another campaign out of Friseland.

S E C T. IV.

Containing the transactions in the Low Countries, during the administration of the Spanish governors Manfeldt, Ernest, and Fuentes, to the arrival of the arch-duke Albert.

THE year 1592 was ushered in by some abortive efforts of the emperor Rodolph to establish peace. The minds of both parties were still too much heated to admit of equitable propositions; and the point of religion, upon which so many conferences split, was now an unsurmountable obstruction. In a word, Philip, harassed as he was with the war maintained in France, required too much, and the United Provinces, insolent with their late success, would grant too little. Hostilities accordingly commenced, f and prince Maurice taking the field in the month of May, sat down before Steinwyck, a strong town on the frontiers of Overyssel. It was the 13th of June before the batteries were opened, when they began to play with unremitting fury. The garrison made a brave defence, and prince Maurice received a wound from a musket-ball, which, however, did not retard the progress of the siege. Observing that his heavy cannon produced no effect, he sprung a mine on the third of July, which made a practicable breach. He then prepared to storm the town; but the general not caring to hazard the consequences of an assault, capitulated upon honourable conditions. In this siege the prince lost about 700 soldiers, and the garrison more than half that number. Several deserters were excepted in the articles, surrendered, and immediately hanged. From Steinwyck, Maurice proceeded to Oknarsch in the territory of Twente, which he reduced before the close of the month. Then g he invested Corvoerden, a strongly fortified town in the district of Drente. Before any progress was made in the siege, the Spanish general Verdugo, having been strongly reinforced by the duke of Parma, marched to Oldenzeel, with intention to relieve Corvaerden, defended by the same Haremborg lately mentioned. The prince with 300 men went to reconnoitre the enemy, and had the good fortune to intercept a letter from Verdugo to the governor, acquainting him, that he proposed raising the siege, by attacking Hobenlo's quarters early next morning, and desiring him to second his attack by a vigorous sally. Maurice took his measures, he was attacked in the manner expected, but received the enemy with such vigour, that they retreated in great confusion, leaving behind 400 dead, and an equal number of prisoners. Despairing of relief, the governor capitulated, and surrendered himself a second time to his cousin upon honourable conditions. After repairing the fortifications, the prince led his army into Guelderland, where, dividing his troops, he cantoned them in winter-quarters. This season the duke of Parma attended the Spaw, but his bad state of health prevented his taking any share in the government; and indeed the unjust clamours of the Spaniards against his conduct, obliged him to write pressing to the king to permit him to retire; but Philip had resolved to use his services another campaign in France.<sup>a</sup>

A. D. 1547.

New regulations in the Spanish provinces.

COUNT Mansveldt had for these two campaigns the direction of affairs in the Netherlands; as deputy to the duke of Parma, but circumstances obliged him to leave the execution to the count de Fuentes, don Estavan de Ibarra, and Verdugo. To gain the entire confidence of the Flemish nobility, Philip promoted him to the government of the Ten Provinces that continued in their allegiance. The duke d'Archot was made particular governor of Flanders, the prince de Chimai of Hainault, and the count d'Haremborg of Artois. The council of war, however, which enjoyed extensive privileges, rendered the provinces dependent on the general of the army and governor. It was wholly composed of Spaniards, and the chief authority of the council was vested in Fuentes and Ibarra. They were strictly enjoined by the king to be extremely frugal of the public money, and to reform the abuses of the revenue complained of under the administration of the duke of Parma. However, to give credit to the new government, the army was paid the arrears due, without which it was impossible to suppress those mutinies and tumults which had been the greatest prejudice to the affairs of Spain in the Netherlands. The count de Fuentes immediately proposed several alterations, which produced divisions in the council of war. They were absolutely necessary, but contrary to the interest of several of the members. Others indeed appeared rigid, though they passed into an act without opposition. On the fifth of January, Mansveldt published an edict, prohibiting contributions to be paid to the enemy, or safe-conducts accepted, under the penalty of death, and military execution. The nobility and clergy seeing their lands pillaged without the possibility of redress, loudly demanded a revocation of this cruel edict. To counteract the effects of Mansveldt's ordonnance, the states of the United Provinces published a declaration on the 17th of February, taxing the Spaniards with cruelty, exhorting the inhabitants of the Netherlands without distinction to join with them against their cruel oppressors, and granting them to the first of April to change their sentiments and conduct; after which time they would give no quarters to prisoners, or those who refused to pay the stipulated contributions. To enforce their declaration, count Philip of Nassau was sent with a strong detachment to levy contributions in the province of Luxemburg. His soldiers committed shocking ravages, and the count Barlaimont retaliated upon the frontiers of the Seven Provinces. The situation of the people was deplorable, death presenting itself, and all the horrors of war, which ever way they turned, whatsoever resolution they formed. If they complied with the edict of the states, they were subject to legal punishment; if they refused, to military execution. At the same time, the soldiers of the Spanish army mutinied against a decree, which intitled them to no quarter after they had discharged their duty in the field and garrison, notwithstanding their defeat might be the consequence of the ignorance of their commander.<sup>a</sup>

Gertruydenberg besieged.

WHILE matters were in this state of confusion, prince Maurice invested Gertruydenberg, from which he had cut off all convoys of provisions and ammunition during the preceding season. His approaches were considerably retarded by the marshy situation of the place, and by the vigour of the garrison, which consisted of a thousand veterans well inured to action, hardships, and fatigue. To prevent the enemy's throwing in succours before his works were compleated, the prince drew lines of circumvallation, such as for strength had never before appeared in the Netherlands, mounted at proper distances with more than an hundred pieces of cannon. In a word, the expence, labour, and genius, bestowed on these lines were wonderful, the camp being plentifully supplied with provisions by the canal, guarded with intrenchments equal to the fortifications of a city, and the industrious peasant pursuing his rural occupations in the midst of war, with the same security as in the most profound peace. From this it appears, that the lines took in a considerable compass of ground, which Grotius estimates, by calling the walls three hours walking round. Soon

- a after this prodigious work was finished, a messenger, sent from the governor to solicit succours from count Manfveldt, was taken. The prince ordered him to be carried round the lines, and then dismissed with the governor's letter, to report what he had seen to the count. This would have effectually deterred Manfveldt from attempting the relief of Gertruydenberg at so imminent a risque; but the council of war imagined it would be shameful to suffer a barrier so important to be lost without making extraordinary efforts. They were determined to stop the draughts ordered for France, in order to reinforce the army so powerfully, as to put the success of a battle beyond doubt. Accordingly the army, amounting to 12,000 foot and 3000 horse, was assembled at Tournhout. With this force, Manfveldt approached the lines, which he found were strong and regular beyond expectation.
- b He erected batteries against prince Maurice's quarter, as if he had been carrying on a regular siege; but finding provisions failing, he removed to the opposite quarter commanded by Hobenlo. Here he employed himself in filling up the ditches and canals, in battering the lines, and making regular approaches; while Maurice, with a handful of men, was repelling his efforts, advancing his works towards the town, battering in breach, and at the same time forming lines of contravallation to secure him against the sallies of the garrison. The art of war, as then known, was exhausted between the fruitful genius of the prince, and the long experience of Manfveldt, grown hoary in military service; when at length the garrison capitulated, after having lost their best officers. Before a parley was beat, Manfveldt, by a letter, acquainted the garrison, that he intended to decamp, and desired they
- c would not be disheartened, for he would attempt their relief by another method. The messenger was taken, but prince Maurice suffered him to enter the town. Manfveldt's resolution determined the commanding officer to demand terms; he obtained honourable conditions, and the articles were signed on the 25th of June, after a siege of three months<sup>b</sup>.

- Thus ended the siege of Gertruydenberg, the most remarkable in the war; in which the besiegers were themselves besieged by a greatly superior army, commanded by one of the best officers in the Spanish service. The surrender of the town was announced to Manfveldt by a general discharge of the artillery on the lines and ramparts, upon which he immediately broke up his camp, and retired, greatly chagrined, towards the Isle of Bonneval, with design to attack Crevecoeur. In this he was frustrated by the diligence of the garrison, and activity of Maurice; the one laid the country under water, and the other marched with such expedition, that he was entrenched on the only accessible eminence near the town, before the arrival of the Spanish army. Manfveldt, after expressing his astonishment at the rapidity of the prince's manœuvres, retired, highly disgusted at having been thus foiled by a body sending strong detachments to Verdugo in Friseland<sup>c</sup>.

- THE prince's next exploit was to break off the communication between Germany and Groningen, by erecting a fort at the passage Bourtange. This he effected, in defiance of the utmost efforts of Verdugo; and leaving five companies of foot for its defence, he retired. Verdugo, being powerfully reinforced by Manfveldt, attacked Fort Bourtange, but was forced by the vigour of the garrison, and scarcity of provisions, to relinquish the enterprise for one which, if successful, would be more decisive. This was to surprise Maurice in his camp. He was greatly superior in strength, and marched with such silence and diligence, that he did not doubt of finding the prince unprepared; but on his arrival he perceived the confederate army under arms, an intrenchment began the night before almost finished, and every other measure taken to baffle his project. Upon this he began to skirmish with the out-parties, in hopes of drawing Maurice out of his intrenchments; but on finding him too cautious, retired under cover of the night, and sent his troops into winter-quarters. The operations of the year ended with an abortive attempt made by Maurice to surprise Bruges, and another of Manfveldt's equally unsuccessful, to penetrate into Zealand<sup>d</sup>.

- PHILIP had now conferred the government of the Netherlands upon the archduke Ernest, in hopes that a German would be more acceptable to the Flemings, than their Spanish or Italian governors. On the 30th of January, Ernest made his public entry into Brussels, attended by a numerous retinue of the nobility, and was welcomed with loud acclamations, and great demonstrations of joy. The United Provinces were terrified that the war would now be renewed with redoubled vigour. It was reported that the new governor had made powerful levies in Germany, and was fully determined to subdue the whole Netherlands, and terminate a war tedious, expensive, and vexatious to Philip. These fears, however, were soon quieted by certain advice, that the levies could not even pass in review for want of pay, and that most of them were already defeated. It was likewise a favourable circumstance to the confederates, that Ernest being a foreigner, unacquainted with the laws and customs of the country, must devolve the conduct of affairs upon others; which would probably breed diffension, and excite jealousy among the enemy. Their conjecture was well founded. The very first measure entered upon by the archduke incurred the displeasure of the Spaniards. He found means to convey a letter to the states-general, in which, after pathetically enumerating the calamities of war, and the distresses of the provinces, he earnestly exhorted them to think of peace, and propose such terms of accommodation, as he might reasonably offer, and press upon the king. In this particular he acted with honour and integrity; but it was imprudent in the first step of his administration to give umbrage to the Spaniards, whose interest it was to continue the war. They held all the lucrative places, had the whole management of the revenue, and acquired immense fortunes by a war that exhausted the treasures of Spain, and brought the Netherlands on the verge of destruction. The letter was well received, but answered in a manner that shewed the states were determined to hazard all rather than submit to any terms to the tyrant who had so long endeavoured to subvert their liberties. This negotiation was scarce finished, when a conspiracy against the life of prince Maurice was detected. One Michael de Renichen, a monk, was seduced by the count Barlaimont, and other noblemen, to make the attempt, and instructed in the manner. He was seized, and executed at the Hague. Soon after, a second conspiracy of the same nature was discovered, and the criminal hanged, drawn, and quartered. It was publicly averred, and confirmed by the testimony of the expiring criminal, that the archduke was privy to this attempt, that it was planned by Ibarra, and debated in the duke's own cabinet-council. This rendered him extremely odious to the confederates, and wiped out all remembrance of the kindness formerly intended by his letter. It indeed persuaded the protestants that he was a hypocrite, who concealed the darkest designs under the cloak of friendship. Both parties soon came to despise him, on discovering that he was a weak, dissolute prince, directed by minions, and governed by women.

Groningen besieged and taken by prince Maurice.

WHILE the public were forming various conjectures on the character of the new governor, Verdugo, in the depth of winter, assembled part of his army, and closely blocked up Coevoerden. But the obstinacy of the garrison exhausted his patience, and obliged him to withdraw the blockade. The garrison of Groningen was likewise defeated in an attempt to surprise fort Delfziel. Nor was prince Maurice more fortunate in the enterprises formed against Bolduc and Maastricht; one of which miscarried by accident, the other through the misconduct of his officers. But the great object was the reduction of Groningen, to effect which the states made numerous levies in Germany. Count Solmes happily conducted these new troops to the prince's camp, amidst all the schemes and ambuscades laid in their way by Verdugo. Maurice immediately put his army in motion, and on the 20th of March invested Groningen with ten thousand foot, and two thousand horse. The garrison was summoned, and they returned a resolute answer; upon which the prince opened his batteries, mounted with sixty pieces of battering cannon. The attack and defence were equally vigorous. The besiegers set the town on fire with red-hot bullets, but this produced no effect on the garrison. As the former advanced their works, the latter multiplied their sallies, and fought with desperate fury. Maurice at last sprung a mine, by which he gained the ravelin. This gave the first shock to the constancy of the besieged, particularly of the burghers, who dreaded an assault. The soldiers however would have stood the consequence, but the clamours of the townsmen prevailed, a parly was demanded, and articles of capitulation were signed the 24th of July. William of Nassau was appointed governor, with five companies of foot, to support his authority, and maintain the right he assumed of chusing the magistrates. Six companies more were quartered in the suburbs, the great extent of the city rendering an extraordinary garrison necessary.

Mutiny of the Spanish army.

WHILE Maurice was pursuing his conquests, the utmost confusion appeared in the Spanish army under Verdugo, whole regiments refusing to act, to acknowledge military discipline, and even menacing the life of their general, unless their pay was advanced. The wretched inhabitants were the chief sufferers in all those tumults; they were pillaged without remorse, and their effects seized as legal plunder. Two Spanish regiments of foot revolted in Picardy, where they committed the most terrible disorders. Two thousand foot, and one thousand Italian and Spanish horse, seized on Sichem in Brabant, demanded their pay, and acted as if it had been due to them from the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood. No sooner was one mutiny appeased, than another appeared; the archduke's authority was despised, and the mutineers at length became so formidable, that they threatened the city of Brussels, and the subversion of the Spanish government in the Netherlands. Apprehending that force might be used to reduce them to obedience, they tampered with prince Maurice, and demanded to know if he would afford them a retreat and protection. Indolent as the archduke was, he dreaded the consequences of this last overture, assembled a considerable body of troops appeased by the advance of their pay, and ordered don Lewis a de Velasco to march against the rebels. They had built some forts, which Velasco attacked with such imperiousness as obliged the besieged to withdraw, unite themselves in a body, and take shelter in the territory of Langestraat, in the neighbourhood of Gertruydenberg, where they were protected by the confederate army and garrisons. Though the mutineers would not consent to enter into the service of the states, the prince found it his interest to keep up the division, by which the Spanish army was weakened. The rebels were no expence to the United Provinces, for they supported themselves by excursions into the Spanish Netherlands, in which they were assisted by a body of confederate cavalry. Notwithstanding this desertion, the diligence of the council of war assembled an army of eleven thousand men, with which the archduke blocked up Cambray, held by Balagney, who had hitherto preserved a strict neutrality. This measure produced no other effect than obliging Balagney to declare for the confederates. The governor of Cambray made incursions into the Spanish territories, carrying terror and desolation to the gates of Arras and Valenciennes. In return, the archduke laid waste not only the district round Cambray, but the frontiers of France, which produced a letter from Henry IV. to the cities of Hainault and Artois, complaining of the usage, and threatening retribution, unless the Spanish troops were immediately withdrawn. The letter was sent to the archduke, who referred the contents to the assembly.

WHEN the assembly met at Brussels, the French monarch's letter made but a small part of their business. Disputes and contentions arose between the Flemings and Spaniards. The duke d'Archot refused appearing at the first meeting, because the count de Fuentes, a Spaniard, was to have a superior seat at the board. The archduke opened the congress with a long speech, in Spanish, recommending pacific measures; or if that was found impracticable, exhorting the assembly to use their utmost efforts in terminating the war by the sword. Next day the same topics were repeated in French, and approved by the clergy, and a great number of moderate persons. On the contrary, Archot, though he had firmly adhered to the king, highly resented the influence of foreigners. He said that his majesty's loyal Flemish subjects were a sufficient defence of his authority; that the provinces had been ruined by the avarice of foreigners, who found their interest in fomenting a civil war; and diligently supplied with fuel the fire of discord, lighted by their misconduct. He asked what the Spaniards would have done, had Philip been hedged round at Madrid with Flemish counsellors, who should exclude natives from the royal person, from all places of trust, influence, and profit? The Netherlands, he said, were subject to Philip, not to Spain. Charles V. had thought them worthy of the imperial residence; he did not convert them into pastures to fatten starved and emaciated Spaniards. He then ran into invectives against the conduct of Fuentes; and concluded with affirming, that peace could never be restored to the provinces until foreigners were withdrawn, and the privileges of the people committed to those who were excited to preserve the country, by nature, duty, and interest. Archot's speech highly offended the Spaniards, but it was well received by the rest of the assembly. The archduke then proposed three questions: Whether peace was so absolutely necessary as to be obtained on conditions contrary to the king's inclination? Whether terms which had before been refused to the rebels should be now granted? and, Whether the same ends could not be attained by other means? To this all the Flemings unanimously answered, that peace was necessary, honourable, and very possible; in a word, that it was the best and most practicable measure. Ernest then broke up the assembly, with an assurance that he would lay their sentiments before the king, and enforce them so strongly, that he had no doubts about the success: however, it appeared by his intercepted letter to Philip, that he was endeavouring to demonstrate to that prince the impossibility of restoring the tranquillity of the provinces, except by the sword: sentiments, probably, dictated by the Spanish council.

The assembly convoked.

A. D. 1595.

The Flemings jealous of the Spaniards.

ALL this time not the smallest regard was paid to the king of France's letter; it was not even mentioned to the assembly. Henry IV. therefore published a declaration of war against Philip; and the archduke then wrote to the frontier provinces, to prepare for their own defence. There could not be a more glaring instance of the absurdity of the Spanish councils, than involving the kingdom so unnecessarily in a war with a powerful and spirited monarch, forced now by private interest into an alliance with the United Provinces. Mutual preparations were making; the king of Spain published a counter-declaration at Brussels; the forces of the states joined the duke of Bouillon at Luxembourg, and in the mean time the archduke Ernest yielded up his last breath, appointing the count de Fuentes to the government of the Netherlands. Fuentes was approved by the king, and vested with the same authority as count Mansveldt enjoyed. Still, however, the government apparently continued in the hands of the council of state, though the count, by commanding the army and finances, possessed great authority. His promotion was highly displeasing to the natives, natives, and the first act of his government heightened their aversion. Under pre-<sup>a</sup> tence of quelling a tumult of German soldiers in Brussels, he saddled the city with a numerous Spanish garrison; the burghers complained; the operations in the field suffered; but Fuentes was headstrong and immovable. The late mutinies were not yet appeased, and the great scarcity of corn excited other tumults. All degrees of men in the Spanish Netherlands now more ardently than ever wished for peace, but the prospect was at a great distance. Conferences were set on foot with prince Maurice, and rendered fruitless by the intrigues of Fuentes and the Spaniards. Indeed such terms were demanded by the states, as Philip was not yet sufficiently humbled to grant.

As soon as the negotiations of peace were broken off, prince Maurice, though extremely weakened by the strong reinforcements sent to the duke of Bouillon, took the field, as<sup>b</sup> if he intended to fall upon Bolduc; and Fuentes opposed Madragon to him, then about eighty years of age. After various feints, Maurice appeared before Grol, in the territory of Zutphen, in hopes of reducing the place in a few days, on intelligence that the garrison was ill provided. He was carrying on his approaches, when Madragon appeared with 11,000 foot and 1000 horse, and obliged him to relinquish the enterprize: some consequent manœuvres produced a skirmish between the cavalry of both armies, in which Philip of Nassau was wounded, and the confederates worsted. Maurice next made a fruitless attempt to surprize Meurs, after which both armies retired into quarters<sup>1</sup>.

Elizabeth represents the alliance of the states with Henry IV.

AFTER the affair of Brussels, Fuentes determined so to regulate his conduct, that the Flemings should be forced to esteem, if they could not be induced to love his person. He<sup>c</sup> now unexpectedly renewed the negotiations with prince Maurice, possibly to amuse both the Flemings and the states, but was new-modelling the army, as if he doubted the success of the conference. Though he failed in the design of a general peace, he managed matters with such address, that the Italian and Spanish mutineers, protected by the prince, returned to their duty: he had numerous forces in the field. Vilasco, constable of Castile, was at the head of an army in Burgundy; Waramben commanded another army in Artois and Picardy, a third was opposed under Madragon to prince Maurice, and a fourth acted in Luxemburg under the direction of Verdugo. It was not the diligence of Fuentes alone the states had to combat; greater difficulties arose on the side of their allies. Queen Elizabeth loudly complained of the strict union entered into with Henry IV. yet had this mo-<sup>d</sup> narch compelled them into the alliance by threatening to make peace with Spain, and suffer Philip to employ his whole strength in the Netherlands. The policy of the queen directed that the states should not fall under the dominion of Philip, and yet she could not bear to see them independent. The vast commercial schemes planned about this time in Holland, and the successful expeditions of certain merchants to the East Indies, excited her jealousy; the bold and enterprising genius of the French monarch likewise gave her umbrage; she had refused that prince four regiments, though the city of Nevers engaged to pay the subsidy; but she willingly consented that her troops should garrison Dieppe, Boulogne, and Calais; an offer of friendship which Henry was too penetrating to accept<sup>e</sup>. She sent her ambassador Thomas Bodley, to complain to the states of their sending succours to<sup>e</sup> France, while they were themselves supported by the English forces. The states pleaded the necessity of making a diversion to keep the whole weight of Spain from falling upon the provinces. Not satisfied with this answer, the ambassador demanded repayment of the money lent by the queen to the provinces in their distress, though the treaty imported that the money should not be reimbursed before the conclusion of the war. Bodley, to enforce his demands, added menaces, and hinted that her majesty would take such measures as would prove very disagreeable to the states, in case of refusal. It was not the business of the United Provinces to come to a rupture with England: they therefore endeavoured to appease her majesty; they besought her to reflect on the conjuncture of affairs; they pleaded inability, exaggerated their losses at sea, the inundation of their<sup>f</sup> country, and the great expence incurred in equipping a fleet to join her navy against the Spaniards. In fact, however, the Dutch were grown rich by the war; the queen therefore could not admit their excuses, alledging, that if they could supply the king of France with money, they could not surely be at a loss for the means to pay their just debts: she taxed them with ingratitude, and again reminded them of their deplorable situation when she generously took them under her protection. The Dutch might justly have retorted, that the assistance granted proceeded more from a sense of her own interest, than from motives of generosity and compassion; but they chose to temporise, to deprecate the queen's wrath by submission, and obtain a respite, by furnishing her with a fleet of twenty-four men of war, appointed to join the English squadron destined upon an enterprize against the<sup>g</sup> Spaniards.

a In the midst of these altercations, king Philip appointed the cardinal archduke Albert to the government of the Low Countries: the design was well laid, and more deeply founded than was at first imagined. Born to vast possessions, and still vaster designs, Philip, after a long dream of ambition and universal monarchy, was now depressed with disappointment, broken with age and infirmity, and distempered in mind by continual care and solitude. Hitherto had he sacrificed his health, his ease, and all the pleasures of life, to vain glory and empty projects; but now his thoughts were turned towards obtaining that rest and quiet which he never suffered the world or himself to experience. His designs on France and England had terminated in events the most contrary to those he proposed; and instead of subduing the spirit of his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands, he saw himself b dispossessed of seven provinces, obliged to hold the rest upon the uncertain tenure of a destructive war; by his obstinate ambition he had given birth to a powerful republic, whose grandeur should be reared on the ruins of his dominions. His pride, however, disdained the thoughts of proposing peace to his revolted subjects in his own name; yet he wished for the means of accomplishing that end, without prejudice to his honour: he resolved therefore to commit this important business to cardinal Albert, intending, that if he could subdue the provinces, he should govern them as Spanish dominions; if that was in vain attempted, he should, by a marriage with the infanta Clara Isabella Eugenia, receive the Netherlands in dowry, become their prince, and with this provision only, that they should revert to the Spanish monarchy in case the infanta died without issue. The c king had reason to believe, that the birth and manners of Albert, a German born, the affable sweet disposition of Isabella, and the presence of a native prince might contribute more to subdue his stubborn people, than the force and rigour of his former measures; at the worst, the cardinal could make peace, without affecting the grandeur, or derogating from the dignity of the Spanish monarchy, should he find arms ineffectual. In pursuit of this resolution, Philip made the utmost preparations for war, though his intentions were altogether pacific; every thing was reasonably expected d from the administration of Albert, who had passed twenty-six years in pain highly esteemed, and governed Portugal in quality of viceroy, with great approbation. Before he quitted Spain, he procured the liberty of Philip William de Nassau, prince of Orange, and eldest son of the late prince William of Orange, after he had lived twenty-eight years in a kind of captivity: not was this sufficient, he prevailed on the king to restore him to his titles, estates, and honours; persuaded that this act would prove grateful to the United Provinces, and useful to the royal cause, as the prince had been from his infancy bred in the rigid principles of popery. Philip of Orange accompanied Albert in his voyage to Italy, and was by him sent to the court of Rome; where he was received with the utmost respect. As soon as the states general of the United Provinces had certain advice of what was transacted, they sent an embassy to the prince, congratulating him on his deliverance, professing the utmost esteem for his father's memory, and affection for his family; but at the same time lamenting his change of principles, from which the Spaniards boasted they should derive e great advantages. They persuaded themselves, that a prince of the family of Nassau, the son and representative of William of Orange, that strenuous assertor of freedom, would never swerve from the cause of liberty, and those maxims which rendered the memory of his heroic parent immortal. They admonished his highness to defer his intention of returning to his native country, to a more favourable opportunity, and until such passports as were necessary to his safety could be obtained. This message the prince answered by a letter couched in the most obliging terms, professing his sincere regard for the provinces, and offering the strongest assurances that his whole endeavours should be directed to obtain for them a just and honourable peace. Such was the situation of affairs at the time cardinal Albert was appointed to the government <sup>m</sup> (A).

(A) Though we have in a former volume given an explicit detail of the rise, origin, and progress of the Dutch East India company, which gave birth to the wealth and grandeur of the republic, we cannot avoid mentioning their present naval strength, in the midst of a bloody ruinous war, in which they were so long and deeply engaged. Grotius affirms, that the provinces of Holland and Zealand alone sent yearly 70,000 sailors to sea, and were then the most formidable naval power in Europe (1). This year they built 200 ships, in which number our author probably includes small craft and coasting vessels. During the course of the war with Spain, not less than 400 ships went annually to Lisbon, Cadiz, St. Lucar, and other ports of Spain and Portugal (2); at which illicit commerce the king connived, knowing it to be necessary to his subjects, tho' advantageous to his enemies. The reciprocal necessity of both states obliged them mutually to tolerate and even cultivate their traffic, under the disguise of the ships hoisting foreign colours. In consequence however of a remonstrance sent to Philip this year by the provinces of Hainault and Artois he seized upon all the Dutch ships trading to the king's ports; a Dutch squadron in conjunction with the English navy, was de-

Containing the administration of cardinal Albert; the death of Philip II. and of queen Elizabeth; with other particulars.

A. D. 1596.
Cardinal Albert made governor of the Low-Countries.

CARDINAL Albert dispatching matters in Italy, quitted Turin on the 29th of September 1595, and arrived in Luxemburg on the 29th of January following; thence he posted to Namur, in order to assemble the troops, and make preparations for pushing vigorously the war with France; which was the first objects of his politics. Here he was congratulated by crowds of the nobility, and the count de Fuentes waited upon the cardinal to surrender his trust, and give him the necessary information concerning the state of the country.

Henry IV. in the mean time was busied in prosecuting the war; he chased the Spaniards out of Burgundy, forced the duke de Mayenne to sue for an accommodation, and now besieged le Ferre, a strong town in Picardy, which he reduced under his obedience. The cardinal however retaliated by investing Calais, and obliged the garrison to surrender; it was immediately after this success, that, by advice of the Spanish provinces, he formed the resolution of laying siege to Ostend, then garrisoned by English forces; but deferred the enterprize as impracticable so late in the season, in order to bestow his whole attention on the reduction of Hulst. Count Solmes commanded the garrison, he took every precaution to render the cardinal's approach difficult. To draw off the attention of prince Maurice from his principal object, the cardinal made a feint as if his design was on Breda; this obliged the prince to send part of the garrison to succour that city, upon which Albert made a sudden turning, and sat down before the former: the surrounding marshes and canals greatly obstructed his operations, and fort Nassau still kept open a communication between the besieged and the provinces; the artillery on both sides played with fury, and the garrison made frequent vigorous sallies; but some failure in the execution of prince Maurice's orders obliged them on the 17th of August to capitulate on conditions extremely honourable. In this siege the cardinal lost 3000 men, among whom was the famous sieur de Rbone, mareschal of the league, known in the French historians by the name of Christian Chavigni. Though count Solmes had made spirited efforts in defence of Hulst, the province of Zealand was incensed to see a place, the fortifications of which had cost some millions of livres, lost in so short a time: in resentment he was deprived of his regiment; but the states general judging more favourably of his conduct, received him again into their service. Some writers allege, that he had orders from prince Maurice not to stand an assault, but to preserve the garrison for more important services; and it is certain, that the prince greatly wanted a reinforcement, his inferiority on account of the detachments sent to France, and numerous body of troops now on the Spanish expedition under the earl of Essex, preventing his keeping the field, and facing the cardinal, who had 30,000 men at the siege of Hulst.

A treaty between Holland and Henry IV.

In the spring of this year a treaty offensive and defensive was concluded between the queen of England and the French king, to which all princes and states were invited to accede. The United Provinces were highly delighted with an alliance which permitted them to link themselves more closely to Henry, without giving umbrage to Elizabeth. Accordingly, in the month of November, they signed a treaty with that monarch, whereby they agreed to pay him the sum of 450,000 florins for the maintenance of 4000 foot to be employed in France, unless Philip should attack the United Provinces. In return, the king granted the states very extraordinary commercial privileges; among others, that their subjects should be exempted from the rights of Aubaine, as they are called; whereby the goods of foreign merchants dying in France, became the king's property.

Expedition to Cadiz.

It was now that the English and Dutch fleets, under the lord Charles Howard admiral of England, and the earl of Essex general of the combined land-forces, set sail from Plymouth, and anchored on the west side of the island of Cadiz. The Spanish ships of war retiring into the Punta, were vigorously attacked; the engagement lasted from break of day till noon, when the enemy perceiving their galleons miserably shattered, and their men slaughtered, resolved to set their vessels on fire, and run them on shore. Here the desolation was terrible; but three ships were saved, and taken by the English. Immediately after this success, the earl of Essex debarked with 800 men at the Punta, and advancing destroying the Spanish fleet in the port of Cadiz, assisting in the reduction of that city, undermining the Portuguese commerce in the East Indies, ruining their settlements, and ravaging the Spanish plantations in the West Indies; so early did the cunning, the artifice, and commercial spirit of this republic distinguish itself.

a ing briskly against a body of Spaniards, forced them to retreat to Cadiz, and pursued them so closely, that the inhabitants were in too much confusion to reflect on the proper measures for their defence. The English burst open the gates, entered the city, and after a short skirmish in the streets, obliged the garrison to retire to the castle; where they soon capitulated. In the mean time Sir Walter Raleigh had orders to burn the merchant-ships that had taken shelter in port Real. Two millions of ducats were offered for their ransom; which the English admiral rejecting, he began setting them on fire, though the duke de Medina Sidonia found means to save great part of their cargoes. This expedition was a severe blow to Spain: besides the loss sustained by the merchantmen, the king lost two galleons, thirteen ships of war, twenty-four vessels laden with merchandize for the Indies; in b a word, to the amount of twenty millions of ducatoons. Cadiz was pillaged and burnt, and the combined fleet put again to sea, loaded with rich booty, though the expedition might have turned out to much greater advantage, had it been judiciously conducted. The Dutch writers mention an obliging letter sent by queen Elizabeth to John de Duvenvoorde, thanking him for his gallant behaviour, and ascribing great part of the success to the bravery of the Hollanders; but in this particular all the English historians are silent.

. DURING the winter, the states, by means of the city of Breda and other openings, laid A. D. 1597. heavy contributions on Brabant; the inhabitants implored the assistance of cardinal Albert, and he detached the count de Vaux to their relief. Prince Maurice formed the design c of surprising the count; but failing in this, he attacked him in his retreat, and pushed the enemy with such superiority, that he obtained a complete victory, with the loss only of 300 men. In this action, fought near Tournbont, the enemy left 1200 dead upon the field, 300 pair of colours, their military chest, and other trophies of war. Such an advantage was necessary to raise the spirits of the confederates, after the late glorious campaign of the cardinal. Next day Tournbont surrendered, after which the prince again put his troops in garrison; as for Maurice, he went to the Hague, where his trophies were deposited as a monument of his past victory gained in the open field; for hitherto all his successes consisted in reducing and defending towns (A).

THE cardinal now turned his whole thoughts to the augmentation of his army, and d making new levies; but the treasury of Spain was so exhausted, that this was a matter of difficulty. Philip was in a manner already bankrupt, he having publicly declared his inability to pay even the interest of the immense sums borrowed of foreign bankers and Spanish merchants. He was forced to stop the course of justice against those merchants become bankrupts by their loans to the court; and this, instead of mending, entirely destroyed his credit. Albert however stirred himself so effectually, that he was able to bring a considerable army into the field, though not before it was late in the season. Considerable efforts were made on the side of France; Dourlens was taken by the count de Conquests of prince Maurice. Fuentes, and Amiens surprised by Teglio Portocarrero. To revenge himself, the French monarch invested Arras, and performed incredible service to the United Provinces, by engaging the whole attention of the cardinal to the relief of that city. Maurice did not let slip the opportunity; he hastened with all possible expedition to assemble his army, crossed the Rhine, took the castle of Alphen, and then fell upon Meurs, which surrendered on the 3d of September; on the 8th he again crossed the Rhine, and invested Grol, defended by a numerous garrison; notwithstanding the brave defence of the besieged, Maurice pushed his operations with such rapidity, as obliged the place to surrender by the 26th of September, upon receiving honourable conditions. The town of Briefort, situated among bogs and fens, was the next object of the prince's plan of operations; this place he scarce invested when the burghers retreated precipitately to the citadel; which was likewise reduced by the 12th of October. After an incredible swift course of conquests, after having in a few days f obliged Enschede, Oldenseel, and Otmarsen, to receive his garrisons, Maurice sat down with his army before Linghen, which he completely invested by the 28th of October; count Frederic de Berg commanded a numerous and resolute garrison. Divers brisk sallies were made without effect; Maurice's sagacity foresaw and prepared for every event, and the besieged were by the middle of November reduced to the greatest extremities and the necessity of capitulating; upon which the prince put his army in quarters, and was received by the states with all those honours which his great services merited. In this campaign Maurice placed great confidence in the abilities of a celebrated mathematician, one Simon Stevin, to whose skill in the attack, and defence of fortified places some writers attribute the celerity of the prince's conquests; but Maurice had discovered profound knowledge g in this branch of the military art long before Stevin was employed.

(A) Prince Maurice is reported to have gained this victory by means of his cavalry, whom he armed with carbines instead of lances: he was likewise the first general who introduced pistols among the confederate horse, if we may credit Meteren, p. 408. lib. xix.

Negotiations
of peace.

BROKEN with age, and chagrined by disappointment, Philip endeavoured to engage the emperor, and the diet, to use their influence with the United Provinces, to listen to reasonable terms of accommodation. He could not, however, support the thought of renouncing his sovereignty over a country which had cost him more blood and treasure than all his other wars; and nothing would content the states but their being acknowledged a free people. For this they had fought, and sustained an incredible variety of hardships; now to relinquish it, would be to surrender the fruits of all their toil and labour. They had already experienced that all the negotiations proved abortive, because neither side would yield what was an essential article of peace: they perceived Philip's insincerity, from the frequent attempts made to surprise them unguarded, at the time when the forwardness of the negotiations had lulled the states into security. However, they received Nutzel, the imperial ambassador, who arrived in the month of August at the Hague, with letters from the emperor, and divers German princes. Christiern IV. of Denmark likewise offered his mediation, and promised he would be guarantee for the security of the protestant religion; but the states replied to both ambassadors, that all the conditions hitherto proposed by Spain were insidious and oppressive, tending to divide the provinces, weaken the alliance, extinguish that liberty of conscience they had hitherto asserted, and treacherously wrest from them their liberty; at the same time they assured the ambassadors, that if proper security of the rights and privileges of the provinces could be obtained, nothing could be a more desirable object than the establishment of the public tranquility, the blessings of which were almost forgot and unknown in the Netherlands. It was certainly not the interest of the Northern powers, to augment the power of Spain; but they were deceived by Philip, and cozened into a belief, that the obstinacy of the states alone prevented an accommodation. Sigismund, king of Poland, was prevailed on to send an ambassador to England, with a view of detaching the queen from the states general. Sweden had likewise made some overtures towards mediating a peace; but the states opened the eyes of these powers, and plainly demonstrated to them that the catholic king would never consent to such terms as they were determined only to accept. As for Elizabeth, she treated the Polish ambassador, who assumed extraordinary airs, with the highest contempt; and dismissed him disgusted at her spirited treatment. Thus the decision of all differences was again committed to the sword, though it was imagined that Philip's design of marrying his daughter, the infanta, to Albert, and giving him the Netherlands for a portion, would prove so agreeable to the states, as greatly to facilitate the king's pacific intentions. Time was indeed when the provinces would have rejoiced at this event, and accepted of any terms founded upon this basis. Now they had been so long engaged in the cause of absolute freedom, that subjection to any master was become irksome. We shall see how, after farther noble efforts and glorious struggles, they obtained their end, and the full scope of their ambition; first by a truce concluded in 1609, whereby the king of Spain acknowledged the freedom of the United Provinces; and afterwards by the peace of Westphalia, in which they were acknowledged a sovereign state; the court of Spain renouncing all pretensions to sovereignty over the seven United Provinces.

Peace between Spain and France.

WHILE Philip was trying every expedient to engage the mediation of the empire and northern powers, he was making prodigious offers to Henry IV. of France, in order to detach so powerful a monarch from the confederacy with England and Holland. France was quite spent and exhausted with war; Henry was equally desirous of peace as Philip, but he could not with honour receive proposals without communicating them to the queen of England and the United States. The sieur de Busenval was dispatched with letters to the states general, acquainting them of the advantageous terms offered by Philip, of the situation of the kingdom, and of the king's resolution to act in concert with his allies. It was obvious, however, from the pathetic description Henry drew of the deplorable state of his affairs, that he meditated an accommodation with Spain. The states therefore used all their address to prevent this measure, which would enable Philip to employ his whole force in the Netherlands. They told the ambassador, that the fortunate issue of the last campaign would enable them to prosecute the war with double vigour and advantage; that Philip desired peace with France only until he could oppress and subdue his subjects in the Netherlands; that when he had obtained this great object, he would, agreeable to his constant system of policy, turn his arms against Henry, and with more success, as the conquest of the Netherlands would enable him to maintain 100,000 men without touching the Spanish revenue. They concluded with beseeching his majesty, to accept of no conditions until they had first consulted Elizabeth, their common ally. Busenval replied in the most obliging terms, assuring the states of the king's inviolable friendship; but Henry was too much a politician to let slip this opportunity of recovering his towns in <sup>a</sup> Picardy, and restoring the blessings of peace to his subjects. Pope Clement VIII. laboured with indefatigable pains to conciliate the courts of France and Spain, and he sent upon that commission his legate, the cardinal Alexander de Medicis, the most expert statesman of Italy. He came to Vervins, and was there met by the Spanish and French ambassadors. No remonstrances from the states could retard a treaty upon which Henry had already resolved. The greatest obstructions which that prince had encountered, were raised by Philip. His kingdom was torn with faction, and ruined with the expences of an oppressive war. To enjoy the felicity of governing obedient subjects, peace with Spain was essentially necessary. He was urged by his most faithful servants, and particularly by Gabriel d'Etrees, who pressed it as the only measure which could firmly establish him in the throne. Bentivoglio <sup>d</sup> indeed ascribes the whole to the influence of Clement and his legate; but had not Henry found a reconciliation with Philip attended with the greatest advantages to himself and his people, it is probable he would never have suffered himself to be moved by all the address and arguments of the pope and the cardinal de Medicis.

THE states of Holland, alarmed at the congress of Vervins, immediately dispatched Justin Nassau, admiral of Zealand, and John Olden-Barneveldt, to throw off every possible impediment in the course of the approaching pacification. They proceeded to Nantz, and laid their instructions before Henry, who, receiving them politely, replied, that he apprehended peace was more distant than he could wish: he must insist upon restitution of Blavet and Calais, and he feared Philip would have no inclination to part with those towns; in which case the war would be undoubtedly continued. Peace, he said, was necessary to his kingdom; but they might depend it should be such as would turn out to the confusion of his enemies. Elizabeth laboured in the same cause with the states general. Her ambassadors had a conference at Nantz with the chancellor of France, and the dukes d'Epemon and Bouillon, about the means of establishing a general peace, which the queen was ready to accept in concert with the states: but the Dutch ambassadors replied, that their instructions were limited to demonstrate the necessity and advantage of continuing the war; a proposition which would scarce admit of hesitation, with respect to Holland. The English ambassadors acceded to this opinion, the scheme for a general pacification was relinquished; but the treaty between France and Spain took place on the 2d of May. Elizabeth and the states exclaimed against the conduct of the French king; but that wise prince soon convinced the latter, that he had not renounced their interest by restoring peace to his own subjects. On the contrary, we shall find the court of Spain complaining loudly of the sums of money he remitted to Holland, which remonstrances Henry answered, by saying, That he did not assist the states, but he was paying his debts.

A. D. 1598.

THE treaty of Vervins was no sooner signed, than Justin Nassau and Olden-Barneveldt quitted the French court, and set out for England, to concert a plan of operations for the farther prosecution of war. Here they were civilly received, but treated at the same time with great freedom by Elizabeth. That princess told them frankly, that she had liberally assisted the United Provinces with her money, but never met with any returns of gratitude. No attempt was made to reimburse her expences, notwithstanding the commercial wealth of the states, and her necessities, entirely occasioned by her compassion for their sufferings. This had involved her in a war with Spain, at the very time when the disturbances in Ireland, and intrigues in Scotland, greatly embarrassed her affairs. In consequence of her rupture with Philip, her subjects were cut off from all intercourse with Spain, to the great detriment of trade; it was therefore now incumbent upon her to listen to the catholic king's proposals, which, however, she promised never to accept, without first acquainting the states general. After all, the Dutch envoys easily perceived from the temper of the public, that the English would shew no aversion to the continuance of the war, provided the states would break off all traffic with Spain, reimburse the queen's expences, and take upon themselves a more reasonable proportion of the burthen. At that time the English councils were divided into two parties, headed by lord Burleigh, treasurer, and the earl of Essex. The frugal disposition of the former inclined him to a peace with Spain; the ambition and martial genius of the latter made him favour the opposite system, in which alone glory could be acquired. Warm debates arose, and the most poignant sarcasms were levelled against Holland. It was said that the states, under the mask of religion and liberty, had destroyed the former, by permitting every faith besides the Roman catholic; the latter, by converting freedom into licentiousness; that they fought entirely for their own interest, and artfully threw the weight of their cause upon the shoulders of their allies; that they committed the most intolerable frauds, with respect to the pay of the English forces, extorting from them a double price for every kind of provision; that they traded to a vast extent with Spain, and grew wealthy amidst all the

the States.

horrors of a war, ruinous to their allies, and particularly to England; that in all pecuniary transactions with England they adulterated the coin, recoined the English money, and made payments to them in base money, greatly below standard; that they had monopolized all the trade of Europe and the Indies, excluding their greatest benefactors from those markets in which the Dutch were lately but interlopers. Such were the assertions, many of them founded on truth, thrown out by the partizans of Burleigh, and the advocates for a peace with Spain. On the other hand, the power, the policy, the perfidy of Philip, were urged as reasons for continuing the war, until the wings of his soaring ambition should be sufficiently clipped. It was affirmed, that no lasting treaty could be concluded with a monarch who broke through all moral obligations; to gratify his lust of power, and set oaths at defiance to satiate his resentment; that if the queen abandoned the states general, and suffered Spain to gain possession of Brille and Flushing; she would at the same time lose the sums lent to the states, and bring dishonour on the kingdom; that if Spain once re-established her power in the Netherlands, she would then become a more formidable antagonist than ever to England; that if an offensive war carried on in the Low Countries, or the coasts of Spain and Portugal, was found expensive, her majesty might easily and advantageously direct her operations against the Spanish colonies in America, the reduction of which would more than compensate the expences of the armament; lastly, it was asserted that the United Provinces, and particularly those of Holland and Zealand, were the strongest barriers of England against the attempts of the Spanish monarch. Had Cecil lived, the issue of this dispute might possibly have been different; his death immediately turned the scale in favour of the opposite party, and produced a renewal of the treaty with the states, which was signed at London the twenty-sixth day of August. The articles were, that the states should repay the queen, at stated instalments, the sum of eight hundred thousand pounds sterling; that they should maintain at their expence the English garrisons in the Brille and Flushing; that they should levy troops in England, to be commanded by English officers, and paid by the states; that, in case of any attempts to invade England, the states would immediately send to the assistance of that kingdom a body of five thousand foot, and an equal number of horse; that the number of ships and the strength of squadrons, equipped in the common cause, should be equal; that the queen's claim to the money due from the provinces of Brabant and Flanders, to Palavicini, should remain entire, as a deposit for her yearly expences of twenty-five thousand pounds. These were the measures taken for vigorously supporting the war, and resisting the power of Philip, now at liberty to point his whole strength against the provinces.

Transactions of the court of Madrid.

IN the mean time, the councils of this prince were fluctuating and unsteady: that depth of policy and refined understanding, for which he was formerly celebrated, were clouded with disappointment, weakened by infirmity, and entangled in embarrassments. It had long been debated, whether the infant and the Netherlands should not be given to the archduke Albert, as the best method of preserving those provinces, and extricating Philip out of a labyrinth of difficulties; but great inconveniencies attended this measure, in case Isabella should ever succeed, as was not improbable, to the Spanish monarchy. When the affair was proposed to the council, the count de Fuentes opposed it with a variety of specious arguments. The marquis de Castel Roderigo answered the reasoning of Fuentes, and declared with equal warmth in favour of the measure, insisting that the dismemberment of the Netherlands from the monarchy would produce a variety of advantages, and particularly a great saving of blood and treasure. Philip was himself of the same sentiments, and declared for them the more readily, as they were approved of by a majority of the council. He considered that France was ascending by vast paces to a great height of power; that the union of the crowns of England and Scotland would, under the successor of Elizabeth, render Great Britain formidable; and that those kingdoms, by keeping alive the sparks of rebellion in the Netherlands, might perpetually harass, disturb, and embroil the Spanish monarchy. He likewise dreaded lest the Flemings should carry their conquests into the Indies; and was in hopes that the provinces, placed under a prince of the house of Austria, would content themselves with a free trade with Spain, without equipping fleets for long and dangerous voyages at so vast an expence. He was not aware that a spirit of liberty, of commerce and enterprise, was now excited, which it would be impossible to extinguish. What affected the king most, according to Bentivoglio, was the loss the church would sustain, by permitting the free use of the protestant religion. It was falsely supposed, that the provinces wanted nothing more than to be subject to a prince of the house of Austria; they had now so long tasted liberty, though imbittered with war and bloodshed, that no terms would have induced them to renounce what was purchased at the price of many battles. Philip, however, not doubting but their submission would follow, had the contract of a marriage between Isabella and his nephew the archduke Albert, made out and signed; the articles of which were, that she should enjoy for her portion the Netherlands and provinces of Burgundy and Charlerois; that the male heirs should succeed, and in case of failure the females; that provided one daughter only survived of this marriage, she should marry the king of Spain; that the archduke should oblige his subjects to cease trading to the Indies, and rest satisfied with a free intercourse with the Spanish dominions in Europe, &c.

To execute this treaty, the cardinal Albert quitted the Netherlands, and proceeded with all expedition to the court of Madrid. His absence was suddenly perceived by violent seditions and tumults among the troops, who, unawed by his presence, threw aside all restraint. All the garrisons of the towns in Picardy, which by the treaty were to be restored to the French monarch, demanded large sums of money before they would evacuate the places they possessed. Their example was followed by the garrisons of Ghent, Antwerp and Cambray, who demanded their arrears, and threatened to throw off all subjection. This seditious humour was propagated like a contagious disease among all the troops, every man expressing his unwillingness to serve a court too needy and profuse to regard the wants of the soldiers, who were fighting her battles, and shedding their blood for her security. At length supplies of money arrived, and the mutineers were appeased.

b BEFORE the archduke left his government, he appointed a successor, and nominated his brother the cardinal Andrea of Austria to that dignity. He likewise quitted the ecclesiastical habit, and resigned the archbishopric of Toledo, reserving only a pension, payable out of the revenues of the see, of 5000 ducatoons. Before his arrival at Madrid, Philip was in extremities, and exceedingly impatient to see the marriage concluded before he took leave of all sublunary enjoyments. A variety of accidents retarded the archduke; and before he could reach the court, the king had breathed his last (A). Philip's will, however, was punctually executed, the marriage was solemnized, and the ceremony performed by pope Clement, by means of proxies sent to Ferrara, where his holiness at that time resided.

Death of king Philip, and marriage of the archduke and Isabella.

c THE contract of marriage had no sooner been signed by the late king, than Albert passed the necessary forms of taking possession of his sovereignty; previous to his journey to Spain. He likewise wrote a letter to the states of Holland, Zealand, and their allies, acquainting them with the king's having resigned the Low Countries in favour of his daughter, and requesting that they would no longer refuse submission to their natural princess, who would endeavour to govern with the utmost lenity, indulgence, and affection. This letter was enforced by another from Philip prince of Orange to his brother Maurice; but no reply was made to either.

d ABOUT this time 4000 Spanish recruits arrived in Flanders, to complete the old corps broken and diminished in the last campaign. With this reinforcement, the king's army consisted of 7000 Spanish infantry, 3000 Italian, 2000 Burgundian, 1000 Irish, and 7000 German and Flemish foot, with the cavalry, amounting to 25,000 men complete. After the archduke's departure, the admiral of Arragon was placed at the head of this army, to which the states were unable to oppose an equal force. Passing the Meuse at Ruremonde, Mendoza took possession of Orsois, an open town belonging to the duchy of Cleves. As the place was of considerable importance, the admiral ordered a citadel to be built, erecting likewise a strong fort at Wassum. Prince Maurice having notice of the fate of Orsois, quitted the Hague to put himself at the head of the army quartered about Arnhem. In the month of September he marched to Gueldres Weert, to watch the enemy's motions, and while he lay encamped here, the admiral reduced the fortresses of Alphen and Bronk. Thence he proceeded to Rhimberg, an unfortified town, subject to the elector of Cologne, but guarded by a body of the confederate forces. In his way thither, he seized the castle of Barila, and then cannonaded Rhimberg with such fury, that the garrison immediately surrendered. Maurice was too weak to oppose the enemy in the field; he was obliged to content himself with fortifying his camp, and reinforcing the garrisons of the places most likely to attract the admiral's attention; but he entertained hopes that the scarcity of money and provisions would excite mutinies in the Spanish army before the winter, and effectually stop Mendoza's operations. In this, however, he was disappointed, the admiral having found means to support his troops by contributions raised on these towns, which desired to be exempted from garrisons. Having made himself master of Rbeex, Emmerick, Dotchoum, and other places, he placed his troops in quarters, the heavy rains rendering it impossible to keep the field longer. The inhabitants of Westphalia and Cleves loudly complained of the oppression of maintaining the Spanish forces; they sent remonstrances to the cardinal Andrea, but were not redressed.

(A) The particulars of the life and death of this prince, whose ambition, policy and genius for intrigue, had, for a series of years, embroiled all Europe, may be seen in a former volume of this work.

WHILE the admiral lay before Dotchoum, prince Maurice apprehending his next effort <sup>a</sup> would be pointed against Doesburg, a place of more consequence, fortified all the posts by which it was accessible, and encamped before the walls, in a strong situation, until the advanced season removed all danger. During the whole winter skirmishes passed between the troops; but they were too inconsiderable to merit regard. Thus ended the campaign, in which the vigilance, activity, and address of Maurice, prevented Mendoza, with a greatly superior army, from obtaining any important advantage.

Naval transactions, and the state of commerce in the Provinces.

ABOUT the close of the year a fleet arrived from the East Indies, which disappointed the expectations of the proprietors and the publick, the profits having been scarce sufficient to defray the expences of the voyage. This did not, however, check that spirit of enterprize now so general and ardent in Holland. A new society subscribed large sums, and eight <sup>b</sup> new ships were equipped for the same voyage. Numbers of individuals embarked in attempts to make new discoveries, and open fresh sources of commerce. Voyages were made to the remote quarters of the globe, where the Dutch flag was unknown, and one Balthasar Moncbuen, a Zealander, fitted out at his own expence, not only two ships to India, but a squadron of five large vessels, to establish colonies in the islands of St. Thomas and the continent of Africa. At first his project was attended with all possible success, the Portuguese of St. Thomas joyfully accepted the proffers of an advantageous trade, a mutual oath was taken to exclude all other nations; but the Portuguese soon renounced their engagement, drove the Zealanders out of the island, and ruined the whole scheme, which had greatly raised Balthasar's reputation <sup>c</sup>. This year was particularly fruitful in bold expeditions. Certain merchants of Rotterdam equipped four ships, which they sent through the straits of Magellan to California, with intention to discover a passage to Japan and China, and return by the Cape of Good Hope, after having encompassed the globe. In a word, such was the avidity and spirit of this people, that no less than thirty large ships were sent by the provinces of Holland and Zealand to the East and West Indies, while they at the same time were establishing a Levant trade by means of the French ambassador at Constantinople, and prosecuting their fisheries with great diligence. The trade indeed was considerably disturbed by the swarms of privateers that issued from Calais, still garrisoned by the Spaniards. This was an affair of so much importance as to require the attention of the legislature. The states general assembled to deliberate upon the means of securing <sup>d</sup> the navigation of the provinces; but they could come to no other resolution, than that the general officers of the marine should, in their turns, cruise upon the privateers, and block up the harbour of Calais. The year concluded with a rich capture made by a small squadron equipped by prince Maurice. Four Spanish merchantmen, richly laden, were taken before they got out of sight of Calais. We have mentioned these naval transactions, to shew how assiduously the Dutch cultivated commerce, in the midst of an oppressive war, which would otherwise have proved intolerable.

Oppression of the Spaniards in Germany.

THE arrogance of the Spanish troops quartered in the empire caused violent commotions, particularly in the districts of Cleves and Westphalia. They committed the most horrible outrages; entering, without distinction, and plundering neutral cities, to compensate their deficiency of pay. All the peasants deserted their usual employments, and sought protection in the fortified towns; industry was wholly laid aside, and every <sup>f</sup> consequent misery introduced. Sensible that their little effects would fall into the hands of the enemy, the peasants indemnified themselves by plundering the seats of the nobility, resolved to obviate the prospects they foresaw from the neglect of agriculture. The Spanish soldiers were in the mean while over-running the bishopric of Munster, the archbishopric of Cologne, the counties of Bentheim, the duchies of Juliers and Berg; in a word, all the country from the Meuse to the Rhine, where they seized upon all the towns, and collected so rich a booty, that private men remitted large sums to Antwerp. Their avidity was accompanied with the utmost riot and most dissolute luxury. Unaccustomed to affluence, they spent it in profusion, in drunkenness, incontinence, and abandoned mirth; endeavouring at the same time to repair their fluctuating fortune by the most cruel extortion, <sup>g</sup> putting all those suspected of concealing their wealth to the torture. All were surprised that the Germans, so jealous of their liberty, should have permitted those violences on the a laws of nations to pass unpunished. Repeated assemblies were held by the princes of the empire, but nothing was determined. Only the count of Oldenburgh, the bishops of Bremen and Osnabrug, and John of Nassau, had the courage to repel by force the insults of the Spaniards. The assemblies wrote several pathetic letters to the cardinal Andrea; but that prelate, unable to advance the arrears of the soldiers, was forced to wink at their excesses, and disregard the remonstrances of the assembly. The emperor sent Neutzel, a member of his privy council, to regulate the affairs of the duchy of Cleves, but he returned without having executed his instructions. Mendoza treated the inhabitants with great contempt, and he publicly expressed his detestation of the protestant princes of the empire, boasting that the Almighty had sent him as a scourge to punish heresy. Incensed at this conduct, the emperor published a decree, ordering Mendoza and the Spaniards immediately to quit the imperial dominions, a similar injunction being at the same time transmitted to the confederate forces. In substance the edicts differed in nothing; but that to Mendoza was couched in terms more bitter and poignant. Both were enjoined to make immediate reparation, to release all the prisoners made in the imperial dominions, to abstain from future violation of the laws of nations, under penalty of incurring the emperor's wrath, and feeling the weight of his displeasure.

MENDOZA paid little regard to impotent menaces; a few days after the decree was put into his hands, he seized upon Calcar, a town in the duchy of Juliers, and obliged the inhabitants to receive a Spanish garrison. He carried his indignation against the Lutherans to so high a pitch of enthusiasm, that he wrote to the bishop of Paderborn to purge his see of heretics, or expect suddenly a Spanish army in his diocese, which would at his expence perform the episcopal duty. Once more the German princes met to apply effectual remedies to an evil grown altogether insupportable: hither the cardinal Andrea and Mendoza sent their commissioners; Delrio and Bedwitz were pitched on to execute this important business; but the latter fell into the hands of a body of confederate cavalry, and was threatened with being treated as a spy. Delrio acquitted himself with so much dexterity, that after throwing a variety of embarrassments in the way, after procrastinating the resolutions of the assembly, and detaining the princes for months to hear encomiums on the equity and moderation of the catholic king, the congress at last broke up without coming to any determination, although all were convinced, and secretly felt the injuries sustained. As to the states they sent no deputies to attend the business of the assembly, justly supposing the time would be employed in fruitless altercation. Thus, after a decree of the aulic council had passed, declaring those enemies who should longer remain in the empire, after repeated congresses were held to avenge the insults upon the imperial dignity; the Spaniards proceeded in their usual course, and maintained garrisons in five towns upon the Rhine.

In the winter prince Maurice surprised Emmeric, and thereby opened a path to disturb the enemy in winter-quarters. It was partly the policy of the states to remove the seat of war into the empire, hoping thereby to engage the imperial council and the injured princes of the empire to take arms against the Spaniards; but they did not long maintain their post at Emmeric, it was retaken with little opposition by the Spaniards. Upon this, prince Maurice formed a design against Zavemar, in which he succeeded: as the season for opening the campaign was now approaching, the states determined to enable prince Maurice to act with vigour; new levies were ordered to be made: to support which expence, the provinces of Holland and Zealand granted a new duty upon merchandize, and a tax upon moveable effects, donations, and legacies; premiums and six per cent. were likewise given to those who lent money to the government, and all persons exempted from taxes for a certain number of years upon subscribing a thousand livres. To these measures all the other provinces, except Groningen, acceded.

CARDINAL Andrea, to counteract the vigorous measures of the states, published a declaration in the name of the infanta Isabella, reproaching the states with having abused the indulgence of the late king, who permitted them to trade with his Spanish subjects, offered them the most reasonable terms of peace, gave three archdukes for their governors, dismembered the monarchy to gratify their caprice, and was now repaid with ingratitude, and a determined resolution to continue in their rebellion. They were accused of seducing the people, by persuading them that their riches and commerce would increase by war. That this was true, might be attributed to the affection of the king for unworthy subjects, whom he hoped to reclaim by his lenity. These measures proving fruitless, the infanta and the king of Spain prohibited, under the penalty of imprisonment and confiscation of goods, all communication between the United Provinces and the kingdom of Spain, or the Spanish Netherlands. The infanta, in particular, forbid the smallest intercourse between her subjects and the United Provinces, withdrawing all permissions and passports which had hitherto been granted for that purpose. One month only was allowed to merchants to settle their affairs, after which the princess resolved to push the war with vigour, unless the provinces accepted the terms of peace proposed by her father, which she now again offered. A counter-declaration was published by the states, and the sole effect of the cardinal's edict was to stimulate the provinces to a more assiduous application to foreign commerce, and to give birth to that India company, which, in a short time, raised the republic to the highest pitch of grandeur.

Edict published by the archduke.

IMMEDIATELY after the publication of the edict passed by the states general, a fleet was ordered to be equipped to cruize upon the Spaniards, and the land levies were prosecuted with great diligence. Not only the old regiments were completed, but several new corps raised; particularly a regiment composed of two battalions of a thousand men each, in Germany, levied at the expence of count Ernest of Nassau; two thousand French veterans, disbanded by the king at the late peace, and now enlisted by La Noue; and a thousand Swiss, likewise dismissed from the French service. When the Spanish ambassador complained to La Noue, that the French auxiliaries were an infraction of the late treaty between the two courts, he was answered, that his intention was to purge the provinces of certain evil humours fermented by their late civil divisions<sup>b</sup>. Several regulations were made in the cavalry, and the number of horse was very considerably augmented. Nothing, in a word, was omitted to withstand the utmost efforts of the Spaniards and the archduke (A). On the other hand, the cardinal was no less diligent in his endeavours to bring a numerous army into the field. His first care was to raise sufficient supplies to defray the arrears due to the army and garrisons, some of which had mutinied for their pay. The garrison of Onburs was particularly insolent, and the cardinal had the courage to execute what no former governor ever presumed to attempt. He changed the garrison, and exemplarily punished the offenders; rewarding at the same time the garrison of Ghent, who in the same circumstances had conducted themselves with modesty and discretion. Next he returned to Maestricht, to consult with the chief officers the operations of the campaign. The first object proposed was an attempt on the Isle of Bommel; of which prince Maurice gaining intelligence, by intercepted letters, he took measures for its security. The cardinal passed the Rhine on a bridge made of boats, on the 17th of April, with a resolution immediately to enter the territories of the states, but the chief officers were divided where to strike the first blow. Mendoza was for attacking fort Schenk, which might be deemed the key to the Isle of Betaw; others, aware of the difficulty of this enterprize, proposed investing Nimeguen, to which Mendoza raised specious objections; particularly, that the garrison could always receive supplies by means of the river and fort Knotsemburgh. The last scheme, supported by a majority of the officers, was embraced. It proposed crossing the Meuse lower, and attacking Bommel, the capital of the island of that name. To facilitate the attempt, Barlotte, a famous partizan, undertook to seize on the Isle of Voren, but he was baffled by the vigilance of prince Maurice, who, not content with disappointing the enemy in this enterprize, detached a body of horse and foot to watch their motions, and disturb their march. This corps was fortunate enough to engage and defeat a party of the Spaniards, whereby Mendoza's dispatches, and the whole plan formed, were disclosed to the prince. Every means accordingly was employed to oppose the enemy's crossing the river. An infinity of boats and bridges were prepared, and batteries erected upon the opposite banks, by which the Spaniards were greatly annoyed in their course along the banks. Under pretence, however, of besieging fort Schenk, which he battered furiously with his heavy cannon, Mendoza at last passed the Val with considerable loss, penetrated into the isle of Bommel, and regularly invested the capital; but not until Maurice had encamped under the walls, and raised several new works for its defence. The Spanish general was not deterred by difficulties. He erected batteries, and prosecuted his measures with determined courage, notwithstanding the army which covered the city was little inferior to his own. His conduct was joyfully observed by Maurice, who

(A) Two thousand of the English forces were exchanged at the queen's request, for an equal number of new-raised forces, who, however, behaved with the courage and conduct of veterans, at the battle of Newport. Among other military regulations, one, in particular, regarded false musters; a common practice among the officers. This deceit and public fraud, of the worst tendency, was made capital. Several changes took place in the method of arming the troops. Lances were laid aside, and carabines given to the horse, in their stead. This institution was first introduced by prince Maurice in particular regiments. Now it became general by order of the states. Several regiments were converted into light infantry, their heavy arms being exchanged for others more portable, and better calculated for expedition (1). It is, however, a question hitherto undecided by critics, whether the present light arms in use produce all the effects of the more clumsy weapons which formerly adorned the soldier. Certain we are, that the Romans, the best disciplined troops in the world, ascribed a great part of their successes to the weight of their arms.

- a perceived the attempt would necessarily terminate in the ruin of the Spanish army, should it be obstinately prosecuted. He was taking all the proper measures for drawing the enemy gradually into his snares, when he received an express order from the states to give them battle the first opportunity. Maurice was astonished at orders so different from the usual cautious and deliberate conduct of the government; he perceived they were dictated by the frugal disposition of the deputies, who found it necessary to end the campaign at a certain time, to prevent exceeding the supplies granted by the provinces; and he determined not to obey, until he had first remonstrated to the states general. A joint letter was sent by Maurice and William of Nassau, representing the danger of giving the enemy battle at that time, when scarce any advantage could flow from victory, and a defeat would be attended with the most fatal consequences. Though he was equal in force, he was by no means superior in courage to the enemy, who fought in despair, the precipitate measures of Mendoza having brought them into a critical situation, from which resolution alone could extricate them. The Dutch forces, they said, consisted chiefly of new-raised levies and auxiliary troops, who could not be deemed equal to the veterans of Spain; if this army gave way, the provinces would lie open to all the ravages of war; if the enemy were defeated, the treasures of Spain, and populousness of the Spanish Netherlands, would soon set on foot another army; he was now gaining more important advantages than could even result from victory, as Mendoza obstinately persisted in wasting his blood and treasure against the walls of a city which he never should be able to reduce, while the confederates preserved their present situation; in a word, he urged, that the proper season for giving battle, depended on a variety of circumstances, which could only be determined upon the spot, and ought therefore to be referred to the discretion of the general, who either deserved their confidence, or ought to be recalled. Just, however, as this reasoning must appear, it was construed by the deputies into a desire of prolonging the war. The great influence of Maurice depended on his being at the head of an army; and though his zealous attachment to his country was approved, yet his ambition was not unknown. He was therefore obliged so far to comply with the sentiments of the government, as to promise he would seize the first favourable moment for giving battle<sup>c</sup>.
- d MENDOZA was in the mean time playing furiously from his batteries, while his troops were miserably galled from the enemy's boats, and batteries ranged along the river. He persisted in the notion he should be able to force Maurice to quit his situation, and the prince artfully cherished this opinion, the better to destroy the Spanish army. At length he determined upon a general sally from four different quarters of his intrenchments, while his artillery from the boats kept up an incessant fire. The Dutch forces marched out in the middle of the day, and attacked the Spanish intrenchments with the utmost resolution. They were received with equal gallantry, and, after a bloody conflict, drawn off before victory had declared. The action was maintained for three hours; above fifteen hundred men perished on each side, but no impression was made on Mendoza's quarters, nor did any important consequence result. The night following a less general, but more successful, sally was made. It was expected the enemy might be unprepared, not expecting the Dutch would so soon renew their efforts. The conjecture was well founded; all was in security in Mendoza's camp, and the utmost consternation introduced by the arrival of the confederates, whose attack succeeded beyond expectation. Several batteries were destroyed, prodigious slaughter made, and a great number of prisoners taken. After a respite of three days, the English and French auxiliaries, under Sir Francis Vere and La Noue, made another desperate sally on the Walloon quarter, which they forced with terrible slaughter. At last, overpowered with numbers, and badly supported by the Dutch, they retreated in good order. Such vigorous attacks, and the length of the siege, now protracted to the space of three weeks, convinced Mendoza of his error, and the impossibility of reducing Bommel; but the difficulty was to relinquish the design without exposing himself to the ridicule of his own troops, and the assaults of the enemy on his rear. The latter, however, he avoided, by means of little forts and batteries, erected with great judgment along the river; but could not escape the former, which broke out in sedition and mutiny. Disappointed of the expected booty from the plunder of Bommel, the Spanish soldiers became clamorous for their arrears, and were, with great difficulty and large promises, appeased. All the rest of the campaign was consumed in building and attacking forts, erected to cover the winter-quarters of both armies. The Spaniards made an attempt on a fort raised by Maurice at Herwerden, and were repulsed with loss; on the other hand, the confederates, led by the prince in person, were equally unsuccessful in an attack on the Spanish fort at Meguen, which, though unfinished, the garrison defended with extreme valour<sup>d</sup>.

The German princes take arms.

DURING these transactions a circumstance occurred, which, if judiciously improved, <sup>a</sup> would, beyond doubt, have ruined the Spanish dominion in the Netherlands. The German princes, incensed that the Spaniards still maintained posts and garrisons in their dominions, entered into an association to expel all foreigners; and for this purpose raised an army of twenty-five thousand foot and four thousand horse, under the conduct of the count de Lippe. The states general pressed the associated Germans to join their army; but they did not withdraw their own troops out of the districts of Juliers, Berg, Munster, and Cleves. For this reason the princes declared, that they armed in their own defence, without intending to interfere in the quarrel between the king of Spain and his subjects, who had both violated the privileges of the empire. Cardinal Andrea, to appease the Germans, withdrew his garrison from Emmerick, which he ordered immediately to be restored <sup>b</sup> to the duke of Cleves. This, however, did not satisfy the count de Lippe; he invested Rhimberg, held by a mutinous Spanish garrison, who would have surrendered it had he agreed to pay their arrears. Their proposal was rejected, the assault given, and the Germans repulsed with great loss, and obliged to relinquish the enterprize<sup>c</sup>. From thence the count proceeded to Rbeez, where he was not more fortunate; a fall from the town having put one of his quarters in confusion, and spread terror through the whole army. The panic was so great, and the harmony among the princes so ill established, that in a few weeks the army disbanded, and Spain, without striking one blow, was delivered from this formidable enemy.

The archduke
and duchess arrive in the Low Countries.

IN the mean time, the archduke Albert, and his consort, returned to the Low Countries, <sup>e</sup> and made their public entry into Brussels with such ostentation and magnificence, as impressed unfavourable ideas of their characters. It is alledged by the Dutch writers, that the nobility were received with a cold civility, and disgusting air of superiority; that the deputies of the states paid their compliments on the knee, a servility inconsistent with the dignity of freemen; and that Albert and the infanta, in every respect, received sovereign honours, and those marks of abject humiliation shewn to crowned heads. These remarks are probably dictated by prejudice, since even the Dutch writers allow that the archduke, during his former residence, had distinguished himself for his moderation, lenity, and affability: a carriage at this time no less necessary than before. On his entering upon business, the first difficulty that occurred, was, the oath usually taken by the <sup>d</sup> archdukes, to preserve the privileges of the provinces inviolable. The states hinted to them the necessity of withdrawing foreign troops, demolishing the citadels, and committing the defence of the towns to the inhabitants. Nothing could be more shocking to the archduchess, nursed in the arms of despotism, than an insinuation which tended to limit her prerogative. Her prejudices were, however, surmounted by Albert's moderation, who acquainted her, that she could only obtain her ends by temporising, and promising to withdraw all foreigners, as soon as the dangers of war were removed at a distance. Having adjusted this point, the archduke and duchess set out for Louvain, where they took the oaths prescribed; and, after making the tour of the provinces, returned to Brussels. Next, the state of the country was taken into consideration; and the causes of the miscarriage at <sup>e</sup> Bommel, which was charged to the misconduct and obstinacy of Mendoza. This general recriminated; accusing the troops of disobedience, and the government of neglect, in furnishing money and the necessary supplies; to which he, in some measure justly, attributed the disgraces sustained<sup>f</sup>. After a long hearing, Mendoza was acquitted, continued in his command, and the necessary measures taken to prevent future disturbances and mutinies<sup>g</sup>.

Discord in the seven provinces.

THE United Provinces were no less embarrassed and divided among themselves. Great clamours were raised by the deputies of the provinces, against the expences of the campaign, which had already greatly exceeded the supplies raised, without producing any <sup>t</sup> public advantage. It was not considered that prince Maurice had done all that could be expected in defending Bommel, and securing all the frontier against the irruptions of the enemy. A fresh demand of money was made, and positively refused by some of the provinces, who desired the army might be sent into winter-quarters. The divisions were running high, when a remittance of three hundred thousand francs arrived from France, Henry IV. wisely foreseeing that the penuriousness of the provincial states would ruin the cause, and once more render the Spaniards absolute masters of the Netherlands. Notwithstanding this unexpected supply, deputies were dispatched to confer with prince Maurice, and represent to him the state of the revenue, which required that the troops should immediately quit the field. The prince replied, that money expended in defence of liberty should never be grudged; that in the present case they must determine to support the war <sup>g</sup> a with vigour, or lose the fruits of all their blood, toil, and treasure, already bestowed. That nothing could be attributed to mismanagement, since he was ready to lay before the states a clear account of the services in which the public money had been employed; that marching so early into quarters would afford the enemy an opportunity of penetrating into the bowels of a country, the very frontiers of which they had hitherto found impregnable. He consented, however, that the charge of boats, waggons, and baggage horses, should be diminished; but earnestly exhorted the deputies to reflect on the fatal consequences of entertaining a hostile army for the winter, in the heart of the provinces, and the difficulty of dislodging so powerful an enemy. He desired he might be permitted to erect three forts on the banks of the Vaal, to restrain the irruptions of the garrison of St. Andrew; but the b expence amounting to eighty thousand francs, he was forced to content himself with throwing up some slight works on the dyke of the Ile of Tiel. In a word, notwithstanding all the prince's remonstrances, and the probability that the archduke would endeavour to retrieve the character of the Spanish arms by some bold action, the states resolved upon a reduction of the forces, strongly suspecting that the corps were uncomplete. All the companies of foot consisting of two hundred men, were reduced to one hundred and thirty, and those of horse composed of one hundred men, were reduced to eighty, by which means the government saved sixty thousand livres per month. A ferment was excited in the army, and this reduction would have proved the most fatal blow ever sustained by the provinces, had the enemy embraced the opportunity. The rivers were all frozen, the states were defenceless, and every thing contributed to render an irruption into the provinces successful, c had Albert been careful to maintain discipline, catch at circumstances, and recruit his army. But all this was neglected. Prince Maurice having, in the month of November, by express order of the states, placed his troops in winter-quarters, the admiral of Arragon followed his example, after leaving a strong garrison in Fort St. Andrew. He imprudently indeed gave out, that he only waited for a frost, to invade the provinces; and thereby cautioned prince Maurice to take all measures in his power for their security.

Reduction of the troops.

With respect to naval affairs, great preparations were made towards the beginning of the year; as soon as all intercourse between the Spanish dominions and the provinces were prohibited, the states equipped an armament composed of sixty-three sail under the conduct of Peter Vander Dous, to harrafs the coasts of Spain, and prevent all commerce between that nation and the other maritime powers. Great encouragement was likewise given to private adventurers in the East and West-India trade; inasmuch that Balthasar Monchuren, so unfortunate the preceding year on the coast of Africa, now fitted out a considerable squadron to cruize in the West-Indies, and search for the gold mines in Guiana. While the grand armament was preparing, a part of the East-India fleet returned richly laden, and sufficiently compensated the former disappointment. This success gave fresh vigour to the states; and enabled them to pursue their schemes with redoubled vigour. On the 28th of May the fleet quitted the Texel, and arrived by the 11th of next month on the coast of Portugal. Finding he could make no impression on the coast, Vander Dous proceeded to the Canaries, and made a descent on the island called Grand Canary, though vigorously opposed by the Spaniards. Next morning the town was taken by assault, the inhabitants escaping to the mountains, and carrying with them their most valuable effects. Vander Dous offered to ransom the place; but the Spaniards refusing to give the price demanded, he laid the whole in ashes. Hence he sailed for Gomara, which he plundered, proceeding with half the fleet to America; and sending the other half back under admiral Geebrantsen. This voyage proved unfortunate; the climate and fruits of South America produced terrible diseases among the seamen, which swept them off in great numbers, occasioned the death of Vander Dous, and several of his officers. After some fruitless attempts on the Spanish settlements, the fleet returned to Holland, except a squadron of seven ships, f which came back the following year, heavy laden with a booty of sugar and other commodities, carried off from the West-India islands. After all, the whole advantage obtained from this formidable armament, was to draw the attention of the court of Spain from the affairs of the Netherlands, and put the king to great expence in equipping a fleet, which lay afterwards to rot in his harbours. As to the booty taken, it by no means defrayed the charges of the government. The year concluded with a negotiation for peace, carried on under the auspices of the emperor, who offered his mediation. The issue was the same with that of all preceding attempts, to reconcile parties too much inflamed to listen to reasonable conditions.

Naval affairs.

NEVER was the court of Spain more distressed for money than at present. Yet were g Philip III. and Albert too haughty to descend from their dignity, and relax in the terms of peace proposed the former year. The archduke's long journey and voyage, his marriage, and the brilliancy of his court, had exhausted the supplies intended for the prosecution of the war; and Philip's own marriage, and the expences of equipping a powerful fleet, rendered him incapable of making the necessary remittances. Long arrears were due to the troops, who every where became clamorous. The Spanish forces first broke out into open mutiny. A small party took post at Hamel in the diocese of Liege; in a short time it was augmented to a corps of two thousand foot and eight hundred horse. Their example was followed by the German and Walloon garrisons of Crevecœur and fort St. Andrew, and at last the revolt had almost become general. Albert was forced to treat with the mutineers, and assign them free quarters, and a fortified town in Brabant, until their arrears were discharged, paying them at the same time a sum of money sufficient to answer other exigencies. Scarce had the mutineers at Hamel quitted that post, when a body of Italians who had mutinied, seized upon the place, which they fortified. Albert was forced to appease this sedition in the same manner he had done the former. To prevent the garrisons of St. Andrew and Crevecœur from proceeding to extremities, the archduke pretended he would send them upon an enterprize, where the booty would more than compensate the deficiencies of their pay. Barlette the partizan was appointed to conduct the expedition; he reviewed the troops on his arrival; but neglecting to distribute money among the soldiers, they mutinied, seized their officers, and sent them with their families prisoners to Balduc. It was dangerous to employ the forces that remained firm in their obedience against the mutineers. Albert dreaded that the contagion would spread through the whole; and yet this would have proved the most effectual measure, as there was no end to answering their insolent demands.

Prince Maurice reduces several important places.

MAURICE perceived that a fair opportunity now offered of attacking the Spaniards to advantage; but his powers were limited, and his force inconsiderable. However, that the occasion might not wholly slip without deducing any benefit, he assembled eight companies of infantry, and an equal number of cavalry, which he dispatched under Lewis of Nassau, and colonel Edmond a Scotchman, to make an attempt on Watchtendoc in Guelderland. The enterprize was suggested by Rhibove; it succeeded to admiration, the town and citadel were taken after a slight resistance, and the government given to the officer who had formed the design. This success encouraged prince Maurice to pursue his blow. He marched secretly with a strong detachment towards Crevecœur, seized the out-works before the mutinous garrison was apprised of his design, and in the space of three days was master of all the fortifications, after defeating a detachment of five hundred Spanish horse, which came to the relief of the besieged. The prince made overtures to the garrison of St. Andrew; but the mutineers refused to surrender the fort, unless the prince advanced a sum equal to the arrears owing by the court of Spain, which he had not in his power. Maurice then determined to apply force; he summoned the garrison, and threatened to give no quarter, if they did not immediately capitulate; but they despised his menaces, while the country round the fort was under water; and even put to death the trumpet sent with the summons. Next he hemmed in the garrison by a number of little forts and redoubts, sufficient to prevent their being supplied; at the same time keeping up so brisk a fire from certain batteries which he had erected, as forced the besieged to conceal themselves behind their ramparts. Just as they were reduced to extremity for want of fuel, and necessaries for their sick and wounded, a signal from the garrison of Balduc revived their courage, and gave them hopes of speedy assistance. But this glimmering of expectation soon vanished. Velasco who was sent with a detachment for the relief of the besieged, made fruitless efforts to enter. He was baffled in every attempt by Maurice; and forced to leave the garrison to their fate. In consequence, they immediately capitulated, and to a man enlisted in the service of the states, where they behaved with great courage and fidelity.

The province of Groningen compelled to pay the taxes.

WHILE Maurice was pursuing the advantage afforded by the disorder of the Spanish army, the states, as usual, assembled to deliberate on the means of raising the supplies for the ensuing campaign. Groningen had for three years refused to pay the contingent stipulated; a bold exertion of power was necessary to bring the province to reason, and upon this the states resolved. William of Nassau, governor of Friseland and Groningen, was dispatched with a body of troops to the capital of the latter province, to compel the inhabitants to perform the articles of the union. He entered the city without the least disorder, disarmed the burghers, and built a citadel, leaving the provincial states to make their complaints to the states-general. In this they were not wanting: deputies were immediately dispatched, with loud complaints of this violation of their privileges; but they were given to understand, that as Groningen was protected by the government, it must expect to bear a share of the public expence, and on the same footing of equality with the other provinces. Finding they could have no redress, the provincial states consented to pay their contingent; upon which William of Nassau proceeded to Friseland, where, by a just mixa ture of persuasion and force, he quelled a violent tumult among the peasants*, who refused to pay the public tax. These, it must be confessed, were violent remedies in a free constitution; but at this time they were absolutely necessary, to prevent the dissolution of the whole constitution, as the other provinces refused to pay their quotas, if Groningen was exempted.

b ALBERT was upon no better terms with the states of the Spanish provinces, who renewed their complaints against the oppression of the people with foreign soldiers, the mismanagement of the public money, the weight of taxes, and the profusion of the court. He demanded that the supplies for the next campaign might be granted, a civil list for the support of the court established, and a sum of money advanced upon the credit of the remittances expected from Madrid. They, on the other hand, required security that any such remittances were actually expected, and that when they arrived, they would be paid into their hands; they desired the account of the preceding year might be laid before them; and before they granted fresh supplies, irresistible proofs were required that the last were not misapplied.

c Such were the state of affairs, when the United Provinces entered upon a resolution to open the campaign with vigour, and strike some blow, which should at the same time secure their own commerce, and confound the enemy. The states of Holland and Zealand argued the necessity of an attempt upon Dunkirk, the privateers of which place extremely molested their merchantmen. It was said, that this enterprize, though important, would not be difficult, because the army could be transported by sea, and by seizing certain forts round Newport, might march unmolested to Dunkirk. After this it was proposed, that Newport and Furnese should be attacked, by which a way to Ostend, defended by an English garrison, would be secured. Prince Maurice of Nassau was present at these deliberations, and astonished at the unusual vigour of the proposals, which he was ready to attribute to the despair of the merchants of Holland and Zealand, who had suffered extremely from the enemy's cruizers. Though he would not discountenance bold resolutions, he thought it his duty to represent the hazard of the attempt, and the impossibility of reducing Dunkirk, before the archduke would be in a condition to march with a superior army to its relief. After enlarging upon the subject, and pointing out all the inconveniencies which attended the project, he concluded with advising that Sluys might be invested, as an enterprize which would facilitate all their future operations, and be attended with less hazard. This, among other advantages, would, he said, enable the states to remove the seat of war into Flanders, the richest province belonging to the enemy, and from whence they drew their chief resources for continuing the war. The proposal, however judicious, was rejected, because it presented no immediate relief to commerce; the other was preferred with all its dangers and difficulties. The transports were immediately got in readiness, and the troops, to the number of twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, conducted by prince Maurice, and accompanied with a large train of battering cannon, were embarked. On the ninth of June the fleet arrived at Rammekins, where, being detained by adverse winds, the prince desired leave to proceed by land through Flanders, which was immediately granted. In his march Maurice published manifestos, promising the utmost security to all the peasants who would supply the army with provision, and threatening to lay all the villages in ashes if the inhabitants absconded. In his way he seized upon the forts of Oudenberg, Snacskerk, and Budene, which he garrisoned with his own soldiers. Arriving at Ostend, he detached count Solmes to attack fort Albert, situated at the distance of half a league from the town. The garrison consisted of five hundred Spaniards, who made so brave a defence, that, having reduced this, Maurice determined not to lose time in attacking all the other forts erected to restrain the English garrison†.

f MAURICE was scarce arrived at Newport, when he received intelligence from the governor he had left in fort Oudenberg, that the archduke was in full march to attack him, with a numerous army, already flushed with the reduction of all the forts that prince had left behind. It was hardly credited in the confederate army that Albert could so suddenly begin his march, considering the seditious mutinous disposition of his troops; but when he had passed Bruges, when he had made himself master of the forts of Oudenberg, Snacskerk, and Budene, Maurice was disconcerted. Resolving to remove from Newport, where he found it impossible to chuse a situation to his liking, he detached Ernest of Nassau, with colonel Edmond's Scotch regiment, a battalion of Zealanders, four troops of horse, and four pieces of cannon, to seize on the post at Leffingen, through which the enemy must pass. On Ernest's arrival, he found the Spaniards in possession of the passage, upon which he determined to stand his ground until he should be supported by Maurice. At first the enemy mistook him for the van of prince Maurice's army ; but finding it was only a detachment, they attacked the confederates with irresistible impetuosity ; broke the cavalry, which took shelter in Ostend ; then fell upon the infantry, which would have baffled all their attempts, had not the Zealanders quitted the field, and left the Scotch regiment alone to sustain the whole weight of the enemy. So obstinate was Edmond's resistance, that his corps was almost all cut to pieces, endeavouring to secure a regular retreat to Ostend, which prince Ernest effected. In this action nine hundred men perished, and the consternation among the Dutch deputies at Ostend was equal to what might have been expected, had Maurice and the whole army been defeated. Next day, the second of July, the archduke held a council of war, to deliberate whether he should wait for the detachment of three thousand men under Velasco, or immediately march, and attack the confederate army. Zapena, an experienced officer, was of the former opinion. Barlotte, the partizan, of the latter ; and both offered specious arguments in support of their sentiments. Albert seemed inclined to follow the opinion of Zapena, but an accident determined him in favour of Barlotte. Some of the out-guards had spied the Dutch fleet stirring from Ostend, whence it was concluded that Maurice had no intention of re-imbarking his army ; it was therefore thought adviseable to attack him, while the panic of Ernest's defeat was fresh in the minds of the soldiers. Agreeable to this resolution, orders were immediately issued for the army to march with all possible expedition ; the troops that had mutinied, desiring to lead the van, in order to distinguish their courage and fidelity. Maurice was beginning his march to Ostend, when the advanced-guards of the enemy were descried. Immediately he drew up in order of battle, ordering the rear-guard to halt, and the transports with the baggage and artillery were all failed for Ostend ; in order to shew the troops that they must either conquer or die, as there was no possibility of escaping. All the eminences were planted with artillery, the charge of which was given to the sailors, who served with great courage and alacrity. Scarce was the army ranged, when certain soldiers, who had escaped from the late defeat, brought the first intelligence of Ernest's misfortune. Prince Maurice was greatly chagrined, but dissembled his sentiments, and forbade the soldiers, on pain of death, to suffer a syllable to transpire ; sent them for the greater security, on board some boats which were setting off for Ostend. It is said, that he immediately ordered one of them to be put to death for having communicated the secret. Never was assembled a greater number of volunteers of distinction, than at this time served under Maurice, to learn the art of war from a general so renowned. They consisted of English, French, and German nobility, who formed a kind of body-guard to the prince, and determined to share his fortune. Lewis of Nassau put himself at the head of the van-guard, drawn up in such a manner that the second and third lines might relieve the first, without confusion ; a manœuvre never effectually practised, except at the battle of Newport. The English, commanded by Sir Francis Vere, composed the chief part of the van ; the rear was led by count Solmes, and consisted of the provincial troops, the Swiss and French auxiliaries. As to the rear-guard, it was formed of German soldiers, under the conduct of Oliver de Temple, a general officer of reputation.

Newport.

In this order Maurice firmly expected the enemy, whose disposition was nearly similar, each having a body of cavalry in front, who began the charge, after the artillery had been briskly served for near three hours ; during which time each expected the other would advance to the attack. But the prince was determined not to fatigue his troops with marching over sultry sands, and the archduke was advised by Zapena to defer the engagement to the next day, when the army would be refreshed, and other circumstances possibly more favourable than at present. He observed that the sun was now directly in the eyes of the Spaniards, that a strong westerly wind blew clouds of sand, and would drive the whole smoke of the artillery and musketry in the faces of the soldiers, which would prevent their distinguishing the enemy, and greatly disturb their operations ; that the event of an attack upon the confederates, rendered desperate by their situation, was extremely doubtful ; that victory would more certainly result from deferring battle, and cooping them up in a post where they must soon perish or surrender, having no retreat, and being destitute of provision and water. But the soldiers, flushed with the advantage gained over Ernest the preceding day, loudly demanded battle, and complained of being deprived of their plunder, which they believed certain. They repeated a saying, usual in the wars against the Moriscos : The more Moors, the more glorious the victory.

PRINCE Maurice's cannon was so well served, and the ships kept up so continual a fire on the enemy, during high water, as forced them to remove to a greater distance from the shore, upon which the fleet kept on its course to Ostend. Both vans engaged with the utmost intrepidity, and sustained the fight with astonishing obstinacy. Albert directed his chief strength against the English, who baffled all his efforts, until Sir Francis Vere received a wound, which obliged him, for a while, to quit the field. They were now supported by a body of French auxiliaries, and the battle became more general, the confederates right wing

a wing being deeply engaged with the left of the Spaniards. Here prodigious havock was made among the enemy, who repeatedly returned to the charge, after they were broken and repulsed by the incessant fire kept up from the artillery and musketry. Upon the left the confederates frequently gave way; but they were constantly rallied, brought back, and supported with fresh troops kept in reserve. At last both wings of the enemy were united, and the center, composed of the best Italian and Spanish infantry, alone stood firm, repelling all the efforts of Maurice, who vigorously attacked with the cavalry mixed with infantry. After the engagement had continued for three hours, and both sides seemed rather exhausted, and spent with fatigue, than fatiated with blood, four pieces of cannon were so happily pointed against this impregnable body of Spaniards, as put the whole in confusion, and obliged victory at length to declare in favour of the confederates. The fire of the artillery was seconded with a general attack of the cavalry, led on by Maurice in person, and pushed with irresistible impetuosity. As soon as the enemy were perceived to stagger, the Dutch horse cried out, Victory: the word instantaneously spread through the whole army, the center of the infantry advanced, and fell on with fury; the archduke received a slight wound, and his troops were wholly disordered, dispersed, and routed. Five thousand men, besides officers; were slain, and taken prisoners; among the latter were Mendoza and Zapena: and thus ended a battle brought on by the imprudence of the states, won by the courage and skill of Maurice, together with the blunders committed by Albert; with the loss of fifteen hundred men killed, and an equal number wounded, on the side of the confederates (A). Never had the United Provinces experienced an event more important, their very existence depending on the fate of Maurice and his army. Nothing could exceed the anxiety of the Dutch deputies shut up in Ostend during the battle, except their joy on receiving the news of the victory, and the congratulations of the conqueror, who ascribed all his good fortune to the goodness of divine providence, and the courage of his troops, claiming to himself no part of the merit.

WHEN the pursuit of the flying enemy was over, Maurice alighted from his horse, and at the head of the troops kneeled on the ground with great devotion, returning thanks to God in a loud and fervent prayer, for the signal victory with which the Almighty was pleased to bless the confederate arms. His example was followed by the army, and next day was appointed for public thanksgivings at Ostend, where he suffered the troops to refresh themselves, while he was deliberating with the deputies and his officers the future plan of operations. Here violent contests among the soldiers arose about the prisoners, whom some were for putting to death, in revenge of the cruelties exercised on their comrades, after the defeat of Ernest; and others for saving, in order to procure their ransom. However, Maurice's authority quelled the tumult, and his generosity diffused a spirit of humanity through the whole army. Every man was touched with the tenderness of his behaviour to Mendoza and Zapena, who, to the mortification of being prisoners, had the additional affliction of being mortally wounded. Notwithstanding the utmost care Zapena died in a few days, filled with sentiments of the deepest gratitude and veneration for the character of Maurice, whose conduct more resembled that of a father, than of the conqueror of an inveterate enemy<sup>n</sup>.

Prince Maurice gains a complete victory.

As for Albert, he set out the day after the battle to Ghent, to consult with the archduchess upon further measures; and was received with such affection and intrepidity of conduct by that princess, as inspired new hopes and fresh courage. She had heard before his arrival a variety of reports, which, in the usual manner, exaggerated the loss, and even asserted that Albert was killed; but she maintained her constancy, and behaved in such a manner, as secured the esteem and admiration of her subjects. Thence the archduke returned to Bruges, where he collected together the scattered remains of his army, which he joined to Valasco's corps, with such expedition, that he reinforced the garrison of Newport, and the forts he had taken round Ostend, before the confederates had left that city. Maurice incurred censure for having spent three days in this place; for not having pur-

(A) Various are the accounts of the battle of Newport. In circumstances no two historians agree. Grotius relates that the loss of the Spaniards did not exceed three thousand men; Bentivoglio diminishes the number one third, but allows that the victory was complete. Sir William Temple ascribes the defeat of the Spaniards to the obstinate courage of the English; and all the Dutch writers acknowledge their bravery, but deny the consequences drawn by the English writer. Reidanus is severe in his animadversions upon both parties. The Dutch are blamed for having reduced themselves to the necessity of fighting or perishing; and the Spaniards for not avoiding battle, when without striking a blow, they might have reduced the enemy. We are however of a different opinion, as Maurice might certainly receive supplies by the shipping, which did not quit the coast until the engagement began (1).

fued the enemy further; and for delaying a moment to lay siege to Newport; but he vindicated himself, by alledging the fatigue his troops had undergone, and their reluctance to enter upon any new enterprize, before they had recovered their exhausted strength and spirits. On the sixteenth of July, he compleatly invested Newport, the garrison of which, amounting to three thousand men, made vigorous sallies, and so obstinate a resistance, that the prince was forced to abandon the design, and embark his army for Ostend. From hence he made divers irruptions into the enemy's territories, but they were rendered fruitless by the powerful army assembled by Albert; and as the states were not in humour to enter upon fresh undertakings, he distributed the forces in winter-quarters. By this means Flanders escaped the impending storm, at a time when all men imagined the conquest of this province would be the necessary consequence of the victory at Newport°.

Negotiations
for a peace
broke off.

WHEN the operations in the field ceased, overtures of peace were renewed. Deputies were sent by the archduke to confer with the states general, at Bergen-op-zoom. Here they were met by deputies from the states, and both sides readily agreed, that an accommodation was necessary, and essential to the good of the Netherlands; but they differed as widely as ever about the conditions. It was acknowledged by the deputies of the United Provinces, that nothing could be more agreeable to their wishes than to see an end put to a ruinous and destructive war; but this was not to be expected while foreign troops resided in the country, and possessed all the fortresses. They solicited the assistance of the Spanish provinces in expelling foreigners, and restoring the privileges of the Netherlands; assuring them, that the difference of religion would occasion none in the affection they owed to each other as countrymen, provided the liberty of the whole could be secured. They further urged, that so dependent was the archduke on the court of Spain, and several of the provinces on the archduke, that no treaty with either could be binding or safe, while they were reined in by citadels, and under the lash of a powerful army. To this the other deputies replied, that they were sent to conclude peace with their countrymen, and not to enter upon revilings against their sovereign; that it could not be expected the archduke would leave himself defenceless, while the United Provinces remained compleatly armed, and ready to seize the advantage which his credulity might offer. They concluded with solemn assurances that the prince would ratify whatever conditions were settled among the deputies. Neither side would consent to be disarmed, and thus the conferences ended; upon which the Spanish provinces applied their whole attention to the means of supporting the war for another campaign. While they were deliberating upon these measures, letters arrived from Philip III. which equally disgusted the states of the Spanish provinces, and the archduke. They were addressed in the stile of Philip II. before the dismemberment of the Netherlands from the Spanish monarchy, and the phrase, To our estates of the provinces, retained. The ambassador, however, removed the blame on the secretary, who had inadvertently copied the phrase from former dispatches, and thus the minds of the people and prince were quieted.

THE first operations concerted by the states of the Spanish provinces were against the trade of the enemy. A fleet was equipped at Dunkirk, under admiral Wakena, to destroy the herring-fisheries of Holland and Zealand; upon the success of which depended, in a great measure, the strength and opulence of those provinces. The fishing-busses were protected by three men of war; but Wakena attacked the convoy with such desperate fury, that after sinking one of the men of war, and obliging the others to sheer off, he fell upon the busses, which he sunk, burned, and destroyed. The Dutch immediately sent a squadron in quest of the Flemish admiral; but he found means to elude the enemy, and bring his fleet safe into Dantzick, and the ports of Galicia. This loss, however, was compensated to the Hollanders, by the arrival of the richest ships ever returned from the Indies, upon which the proprietors shared four hundred per cent. upon their capital, and were encouraged to launch out deeper in this profitable commerce. As to the squadron sent by the freights of Magellan, it came back disappointed, shattered, and sickly, after having weathered terrible storms, and sustained incredible hardships (B).

(B) We must not omit the following incident, which merits a place among the transactions of the year. The countess of Newenar, first married to count Horn, who was beheaded by the duke of Alva and afterwards to the count of Newenar, bequeathed to prince Maurice, at her death, the counties of Meurs and Horn, with their dependencies. Upon the former the duke of Cleves seized, as a fief of his principality. To be revenged,

Maurice sent one Cloet, an officer of a bold and enterprising genius, to seize upon Cracon, a fortress of Meurs, which he executed with success, after having defeated the governor of Staten, with a detachment of four hundred horse and five hundred foot. By this means the whole county of Meurs was preserved in the prince's obedience, and the ambition of the duke of Cleves extinguished, by one vigorous blow judiciously aimed (1).

(1) Reidan. lib. 17. Le Clerc, lib. 7.

<sup>a</sup> DURING the winter a variety of schemes were set on foot, and enterprizes formed A. D. 1601. for seizing upon cities, towns, and fortresses. The most important was a design projected by one Francis de Province, to deliver Gertruydenburg to the Spaniards; which being happily discovered, the traitor was condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. About this time, Mendoza and other prisoners of distinction obtained their liberty, on condition that all the soldiers of the United Provinces, confined in the prisons, or on board the Spanish gallies, should be released; that they paid the sum of twenty-three thousand livres, and gave security for the payment of seventy-five thousand more, at a time appointed. Le Clerc, however, alleges, that the prisoners on neither side were dismissed before the following year, because Philip neglected to ratify the articles of exchange.

<sup>b</sup> As the spring approached, the United Provinces pushed more vigorously their preparations to act offensively the ensuing campaign, without which it was obvious the victory at Newport must prove fruitless. They received fresh remittances from France, Henry taking this opportunity of clearing off the old debts, to enable the states to withstand the power of Spain; and they considerably increased the revenue, by new duties upon all imported merchandize. Money was likewise borrowed from the India traders, so successful in the late voyage to the Molucca Islands, and a variety of schemes proposed, and adopted, for raising the necessary supplies. Prince Maurice had given orders for the army to assemble in the neighbourhood of Gravenfwaert, and his cavalry, in marching thither, encountered <sup>A party of the enemy defeated, and Rhimberg taken by prince Maurice.</sup> a body of the enemy's horse, under count Adolphus de Berg, whom they defeated with considerable slaughter. This accidental advantage was deemed a happy omen; the troops <sup>c</sup> assembled with alacrity, crossed the Rhine the ninth of June, and appeared three days after before Rhimberg, garrisoned by twelve hundred men, under the conduct of Bernard d'Avila. The prince began his operations by attacking a fort situated in a small island in the Rhine, to prevent this being exposed to the insults of the enemy. After forming this post, he made it the head of his trenches, at which the soldiers worked with great diligence <sup>r</sup>.

ALBERT was not in a condition to attempt raising the siege; but he ordered count <sup>Ostend besieged by the archduke.</sup> Herman de Berg, governor of Spanish Guelderland, to endeavour throwing in supplies; and he projected making an effectual diversion, by laying siege in person to Ostend. The prince was acquainted with his intentions, but continued to prosecute his operations, in <sup>d</sup> which he encountered a variety of difficulties from the vigorous sallies of the garrison. By the fourteenth of the month, in despite of all obstruction, he pushed his works to the rampart of the counterscarp, which he undermined, and blew up with great success. Just as he effected a lodgment, he was deprived of eight companies of English troops, detached, by order of the states, to join Sir Francis Vere, sent with a strong corps to annoy the archduke's army before Ostend. This diminution of his strength did not discourage Maurice; he plied the garrison with red-hot bullets, effected a breach by another successful mine, and was preparing to give the assault, when the garrison capitulated upon honourable conditions. The reduction of Rhimberg was of the utmost consequence, because it covered the province of Overyssel, and now prevented the enemy from levying contributions towards <sup>e</sup> that quarter. In this manner it was that a town, sequestered in the hands of the elector of Cologn, and committed by him to the Spaniards, whom he favoured, fell at last into the hands of the states general.

<sup>f</sup> At Ostend, Albert made the most vigorous efforts. The affections of his subjects had enabled him to raise such an army as it was impossible for Maurice to attack with any probability of success. Yet, after months were spent in the siege, little progress was made. Sir Francis Vere threw himself into the town, and the garrison behaved with such intrepidity as astonished, but did not discourage, the archduke. An infinity of batteries were raised, and assaults made without number. Rivers of blood were spilt, but neither side was dispirited, because they received constant supplies of men and provision; the army from the country <sup>g</sup> around, and the garrison by the sea, which was constantly kept open. The obstinacy of Albert, in prosecuting this siege, afforded the United Provinces all the advantages they could desire. Maurice was left master of the field, while the treasures and forces of Spain and the Flemish provinces, were exhausted before a place deemed impregnable, because it could always be relieved. He accordingly invested Bolduc with an army of seven thousand foot and three thousand horse. The place was garrisoned only by ten companies of infantry and an equal number of cavalry; but such was the spirit of the burghers, animated by the clergy, that they resolved to suffer all extremities rather than submit to heretics. The trenches were opened on the first of November, and the siege vigorously pushed until a strong reinforcement entered the town on the twenty-seventh; the prince's army being insufficient to defend lines of so great extent. This, together with a report that the archduke was marching with powerful forces to the relief of the garrison, and the severity of the season, obliged Maurice to relinquish the enterprize, and send his troops into winter-quarters.

ALL this time the siege of Ostend went on without intermission. Neither the inclemency of the season, the murmurs of the troops, or the intrepid gallantry of the garrison, could oblige the archduke to renounce an attempt upon which he had set his affections. Both the army without, and the garrison within, suffered extremely by sickness and fatigue. The English, in particular, who were constantly in action, and unseasoned to the climate, were greatly diminished; insomuch that the besieged, who at first amounted to seven thousand men, were, in the space of three months, reduced to three thousand men. At the same time the outworks were greatly damaged by the enemy, and unusual inundations of the sea, to repair and defend which required an exceeding exertion of vigour and diligence. Dykes, surrounded by fascines, were erected to oppose the fury of the waves; and had scarce been finished, when the archduke ordered them to be attacked and set on fire, with so much success, that they burned for three days, to the great terror of the garrison. The most vigorous sallies were made, and the utmost efforts used, to extinguish the flames, without success. At last, when the besieged were quite spent with fatigue, Sir Francis Vere received intelligence from a prisoner, that the archduke had appointed the next day for a general assault with all his forces. Alarmed at this intimation, the truth of which he could not doubt, because the soldier was so particular as to give a plan of the disposition of the attack; he determined to elude the danger, by setting on foot a capitulation, which might protract the time until his garrison was refreshed, and the place reinforced. His stratagem succeeded; he received a succour of four companies of foot, and accomplished all his other purposes, before his design was suspected. His conduct was blamed, as dissingenuous and unworthy of a soldier; it certainly, however, protracted the fate of Ostend, which he afterwards defended with such astonishing spirit and resolution.

IRRITATED at having been the dupe of the English governor, Albert resolved upon revenge; and appointed the seventeenth of January for storming a wide breach which his batteries effected. The attack was made with the utmost vigour, under Mexia, an experienced Spanish officer. It was supported for three hours with unremitting courage, and at last repelled by the invincible intrepidity of the besieged, after the Spaniards had lost one thousand men. After this unprosperous assault, the archduke was advised to raise the siege, which the severity of the season rendered intolerable to the troops; but he now thought his own reputation and the honour of the Spanish arms too deeply interested to listen to any propositions. He ordered barracks to be erected for the accommodation of the soldiers, committed the direction of the siege to don Juan de Rivas, and set out for Ghent, to concert the means of pushing his operations with still more vigour. The states general embraced this occasion to exchange the garrison of Ostend, which was worn out and emaciated with perpetual fatigue and watching. As the enemy had considerably relaxed in their diligence, and the communication with the sea was preserved open, the scheme was executed without difficulty. A fresh garrison, supplied with every necessary, accordingly took charge of the town, under the conduct of colonel Dorp, colonel Edmonds, a Scotchman, and Hertain, a Frenchman. Sir Francis Vere, with the former garrison, joined the army under prince Maurice.

OSTEND was certainly not worth a moiety of the treasures expended in that siege and defence. The garrison cost the states near two hundred thousand livres per month; how much more must the archduke have lavished away in useless works, ammunition, provision, barracks, and the other expences of a numerous army? The Spaniards had an idea, that, by gaining possession of Ostend, they could shut up all the ports in Zealand, and wholly destroy the commerce of the province: that indeed would have been a considerable object; but experience proved that the trade of Zealand was independent of Ostend. It was the court of Spain, and not the Ten Provinces, that pushed this siege; the latter perceived that they lay exposed to the insults of the enemy, while the whole force of the Netherlands was employed upon a single object; they therefore positively refused the sum demanded by the archduke, and insisted on his supplying the mutinied troops out of the money arrived from Spain, which he now destined for prosecuting the siege of Ostend. But the army was augmented early in the summer by eight thousand Italians, under the marquis Spinola, to whom, in the end, the prosecution of the siege was committed. The United Provinces formed a scheme for preventing the junction of Spinola and the Spanish army, but it vanished in smoke. It was therefore proposed that Maurice with his army should make the tour of Brabant, enter Flanders on that side, and march to the relief of Ostend. Maurice represented the difficulty of marching a large army through an enemy's country, filled with forts and garrisons, and narrowly watched by an army; but his opinion was overruled. He was ordered to begin his march, and he accordingly passed the Meuse with all his forces, attended with two thousand waggons laden with provisions. On his entering the a the territory of Liege, he obliged the inhabitants to furnish the army with every kind of subsistence, under pain of military execution. In Brabant he published an edict sent him by the states general, inviting the provinces subject to the archduke, to join with him in restoring the privileges of the Netherlands, and throwing off the oppressive yoke of the Spaniards; but this publication producing no effect, the army advanced to Tillemont, where Mendoza was posted with a body of fourteen thousand horse and foot. He had taken possession of a pass through which the prince must necessarily march, and must be forced before the army could proceed. Maurice attacked his advanced guard, drew up before him in order of battle, but could not bring the Spaniard, grown more cautious by his imprisonment, to an engagement. Upon this a council of war was called; and here b it was unanimously determined, that pursuing the rout marked out by the states would be impracticable, and that investing Grave was a measure more safe and important. This enterprise was accordingly undertaken with great spirit and alacrity. Nature and art had contrived to render this one of the strongest bulwarks in the Netherlands; it was garrisoned by a body of veterans, under Gonzales, a Spanish officer of merit, and supplied with all the requisites of a vigorous defence. Maurice began his operations with attacking a half-moon, on the side of the river, of which he gained possession in a few days. He opened trenches on the opposite side, pushed his attacks by sap, merely to save the destruction of his men, and was opposed by the most vigorous sallies, in one of which Sir Francis Vere, who commanded on the right, was wounded. Mendoza approached within half a league of the c prince's quarter, with intention to force succours into the town, or raise the siege by a battle; but he found the intrenchments so judiciously formed, that he despaired of succeeding in the latter, and applied his whole attention to the former. His attempts were baffled, he was reduced to extremities in his camp, and forced to retire to Venlo, leaving the garrison of Grave to make the best defence in their power. In consequence, after sustaining a siege of ten weeks, Gonzales surrendered upon honourable conditions*.

It was soon after the reduction of Grave, that the Italian auxiliaries mutinied, and formed one of the most dangerous conspiracies, which had yet appeared in the Spanish army. At first they endeavoured seizing upon Deift; but being disappointed, they marched to Graven-dork, and thence to Hoogstrade, so near Breda, that they could easily be protected, should d the archduke offer to reduce them by violent measures. After receiving assurances of prince Maurice's favour, they began with levying contributions in Brabant. At the same time the garrisons of Antwerp and Weert raised great clamours for their pay, and at last openly mutinied. The latter were appeased by the advancement of part of their arrears; but it was not easy to satisfy the large demands made by the former, of arrears upwards of twelve months standing. Money indeed was so scarce, that Mendoza quitted the command, and set out for Spain, where he was very coldly received. In this situation the archduke resolved to try the effects of severity; he had often, to no purpose, used gentle methods. A manifesto was published, declaring the mutineers at Hoogstrade proscribed, their effects confiscated, and themselves guilty of high treason, for which a reward of an hundred e crowns was offered for the head of a subaltern officer; two hundred for that of a field officer; and ten for the head of each private soldier. Immediately the mutineers published a well-drawn apology, in which was refuted every assertion of the archduke, and that duke was taxed with profusion and luxury at his court, while the army was perishing with cold and hunger. Not satisfied with mere words, they made a furious irruption into Liege and Brabant, levying heavy contributions, and punishing with military execution whoever refused to comply with their demands. Such was the terror they inspired, that the pope's nuncio interceded, promised to procure their pardon if they would submit, and likewise offered them a considerable sum of money. The states of the Ten Provinces assembled to deliberate the means of advancing their whole pay; but this the archduke, resolved to try f the effects of rigour, opposed. The incursions of the mutineers in Brabant were supported by others made by the confederate soldiers, no less ruinous to the country. It is remarkable that the laws of war were observed by the mutineers, who formed themselves into a kind of military establishment, under certain laws, which they rigidly observed. Certain officers of their cavalry having been won over by the archduke's promises, were seized, put to the torture, and hanged by the heels. They had not only their officers, their council, and their general; but a secretary, a seal, arms, and motto. Albert had given Frederic de Berg orders to march with seven thousand men against the mutineers, who had now assumed the name of The Squadron. Maurice gave them notice of the approach of the enemy, and desired, if they should want his protection, to advance nearer his camp; but Frederic de Berg made so much haste that he surrounded them in Hoogstrade, and would have obliged them to g surrender at discretion, had not Maurice seasonably arrived to their relief, and obliged Berg to retire.

Continuation of the siege of Ostend.

SUCH was the situation of affairs at the close of the year, during which the siege of Ostend was carried on with the same vigour as the preceding year, and with as little success, tho' it now became apparent that the garrison must at length surrender, for want of room, which daily diminished by inches. The works were considerably damaged, many of them were taken by the enemy, but constantly supplied by others erected in their stead. By this means the garrison continually lost ground, and they were at last cooped up in a very narrow space; though they still maintained their spirits, as they received every kind of supplies and refreshments from the harbour.

*Progress of

To conclude the transactions of the year, the returns from the East Indies were no less considerable than the former year. Three ships, loaded with spices, arrived, and brought with them ambassadors to prince Maurice, from the king of Achem, who had no idea of a republic. These successes, and the growing commerce of England and France to the same quarter, inspired the first idea of a company, which has since proved the strength and bulwark of the United Provinces, and the most opulent mercantile body in the universe. For the farther particulars of this flourishing company, the reader may consult the explicit account already given in the tenth volume of this work. We shall only observe, that the return of the Indian ambassador inspired the Eastern nations with sentiments of great respect for the Dutch, whom they now regarded as equal in power to the Spaniards and Portuguese. The island of Ternate, one of the Moluccas, declared in their favour, and was supported by the Hollanders in a war against an inveterate enemy, the king of Tidore. In a word, the sum paid by the company for their charter, the vast exportation of home manufactures, the prodigious wealth drawn into the provinces by the sale of India commodities, the astonishing increase of the marine, and the immense revenues arising from even slight duties upon so immense a trade, raised the United Provinces to a degree of opulence and grandeur, amidst all the horrors of a civil war, which will hardly be credited by posterity. Hence they were enabled to prosecute their military operations, without detriment to commerce; and to foil the attempts of Philip and Albert to destroy their liberties, while they were duping every other nation in trade, and engrossing to themselves the commerce of Asia, of the Levant, the Baltic, and a great part of that of America <sup>u</sup>.

Containing the death of queen Elizabeth, and the transactions which followed, to the conclusion of the truce with Spain and the archduke Albert, in the year 1609.

<sup>a</sup> THIS year was ushered in by the death of queen Elizabeth, the strenuous protectress of Holland against the usurpation of Spain. In this, it must be confessed, she was wholly actuated by self-interest; but still the assistance of men and money afforded to the provinces, laid the foundation of their independency, and often met with unmerited returns. Some writers suppose, and not improbably, that this event was no way disagreeable to the states-general. The spirit of Elizabeth was too violent, and the superiority she assumed so disgusting, that necessity alone forced them to comply with her humour. The Hollanders had now thrown off that humility which characterised them, when the protection of the English queen was first implored; wealth, power, and the success of their arms, inspired a haughtiness which could not suit with the spirit of Elizabeth. From the character of James I. they hoped to find in him an ally equally powerful, but less troublesome and imperious. To secure the interest of this prince, a solemn embassy was sent to congratulate him on his accession to the throne of England. The ambassadors, after demonstrating the necessity they were under of continuing the war against Spain and the archduke, besought his majesty to continue the English auxiliaries in the pay of the states, and suffer them to be recruited; that he would enter into a league with other powers of Europe, to oppose the aspiring views of Spain after universal monarchy; adding, that her late majesty having desired they would equip a squadron of large men of war to join an armament she intended against Spain, they had accordingly got ready nine ships and two frigates, which were lying in the Downs for his majesty's orders. To this James answered in general terms, expressing his intention to live upon terms of friendship with the states-general, but his irresolution as to the measures which should be formed for the good of his kingdoms; he was but just come to the crown, and they must excuse him if he declined involving himself in a war so early. By this the ambassadors easily perceived that they were disappointed in their views, and their situation nothing improved by the change of princes in England.<sup>a</sup>

<sup>d</sup> THE court of Spain was entering upon the most vigorous resolutions to support the archduke, as they now entertained certain expectations that he would have no issue by Isabella, and of consequence the Netherlands must again revert to the crown of Spain. While mutual preparations were making, the governor of Bolduc, by a stratagem, cut off five troops of confederate cavalry, most of whom he made prisoners. Upon this Maurice determined to lay siege to the place; and though he could not expect to reduce it without artillery, with which the depth of the roads had prevented his furnishing himself, yet to check the insolence of the garrison, and stop their incursions into the territories of the states, was an object of considerable importance. Thither Albert marched with all expedition; but on his arrival found that Maurice had not seriously determined on the siege, because he had neglected to occupy all the posts necessary for that purpose. To profit by the situation of the confederate army, the archduke detached, in the middle of the night, the marquis de Bella, with a select body of troops, to seize and fortify a post which would greatly straiten the enemy's quarters. Maurice had intelligence of the motion, and prepared to frustrate the design. He set out at the head of three thousand English, Scotch, and French, with whom he came upon the marquis, as he was preparing to intrench himself, and attacked with such irresistible impetuosity, at first put the enemy in confusion, and soon obtained a complete victory, and possession of the important post disputed. It was this activity and penetration which rendered the prince on every occasion superior to his enemies, who possessed all his prudence and experience without that intuitive talent so essential to the general. After this, the prince abandoned all the forts and works he had erected, and remained for two days encamped in the open country, at a short distance from the enemy, to provoke them to an engagement. But Albert had now so little inclination to try the fortune of a battle, that he retired, and under pretence of the severity of the cold, put his troops in winter-quarters.<sup>b</sup> Such were the operations of the campaign, after the most vigorous resolutions were taken on both sides, of pushing their operations with uncommon diligence and perseverance.

<sup>f</sup> As to the siege of Ostend, it proceeded but slowly; both the general without, and the governor within, had been changed, but no considerable advantage resulted to either party; Rivas commanded the army, and practised every expedient to approve himself worthy of the trust, but he was repeatedly baffled by the diligence of Vander Noot, the governor. At last he succeeded in reducing three out-forts, which he joined to the quarter <sup>a</sup> commanded by fort Albert, by means of a great platform, mounted with heavy cannon, and surrounded with gabions full of earth. The garrison erected a battery, to frustrate the effects of this platform, and threw bombs so successfully, as destroyed the whole attempt, and cost the enemy infinite labour and expence. They seconded the fire of their battery by a vigorous sally, in which seven hundred Spaniards were killed, and an equal number made prisoners. Disappointed in this design, Rivas applied his mind to cutting off the communication between the garrison and the sea. Pompey Torgau, the best engineer in the service, contrived a kind of floating battery, which would prevent the entrance of ships, provided it could be secured from the fury of the waves, by dykes and other defences. To raise these, above half the army was assiduously employed for several days, <sup>b</sup> and when the work was almost perfected, Rivas had the mortification to see the whole destroyed by a storm of wind, which drove the sea with great violence against the dyke, and an incessant shower of bullets poured out from the heavy artillery of the garrison. Upon the whole, though no officer ever laboured with more diligence than Rivas, he made little progress, which so chagrined the archduke, that he resolved to commit the conduct of the whole to the marquis Spinola. Before the marquis would accept the honour intended, he desired leave to examine the state of the siege, for which purpose he sent experienced officers to view the works. Some of these dissuaded him from hazarding his reputation in an undertaking which must necessarily prove unsuccessful, from the impossibility of cutting off the communication of the garrison with the sea. Others were of a contrary opinion; <sup>c</sup> they believed the town must infallibly surrender in time, and that perseverance would surmount every difficulty. The love of glory spurred on the mind of Spinola to embrace this last opinion. Success, he knew, would raise his reputation to the highest pinnacle of military fame; and should he fail, he hoped it would be imputed to the impossibility of succeeding.

A. D. 1604.
The states resolve to besiege Sluyce.

In the month of October, he took charge of the army, and soon distinguished his capacity. Before the spring of the succeeding year he advanced his works so far, that the states-general plainly perceived that Ostend could only be saved by hazarding a battle, or at least making such a diversion, as would probably oblige the archduke to withdraw his army. The latter proposal was thought the least hazardous; and upon this the states resolved, fixing <sup>d</sup> for that purpose upon the siege of Sluyce, a place so important, as would certainly engage the archduke's attention. The army, amounting to fifteen thousand foot, and twenty-five hundred horse, embarked immediately for Zealand, where they were met by prince Maurice, attended by William Nassau governor of Friseland, Frederic Henry Nassau his brother, general of the horse, three other princes of the house of Orange, the prince of Anhalt, the deputies of the states-general, and the council of state. Next day the fleet set sail for Flanders, and the troops debarked on the banks of the canal Swartagate, after they had taken two small forts on the isle of Cadsant. It is imagined, that if Maurice had proceeded directly to Sluyce, according to the advice of the deputies, he might have taken the place unprepared, and obliged the enemy to have raised the siege of Ostend, by cutting off all <sup>e</sup> their convoys of provision. On the contrary, he rejected the proposal, as attended with a thousand difficulties, which could only be foreseen by those who were experienced in the art of war; but the reasons he offered were such as confirmed the suspicions of the deputies, that he was not desirous of finishing a war, upon the continuance of which depended his own great authority, and the elevation of the house of Nassau. We shall see how these jealousies gave birth to a strong faction, which has ever since been the chief barrier of the republic, against the aspiring ambition of the princes of Orange.

MAURICE proceeded with reducing all the out-posts which could obstruct the siege of Sluyce. He took Isendyck, defeated a body of twelve companies of German foot posted at Ardembourg, and took possession of Middelebourg in Flanders, which the enemy evacuated at <sup>f</sup> his approach. Whether he ought not to have proceeded directly to Sluyce, is what cannot be determined at this distance of time, through all the mists of prejudice and passion which obscure this whole transaction, and by rendering it equivocal, tarnish the lustre of the prince's character. Albert had no sooner intelligence of the motions of Maurice, than he detached Velasco general of the horse, since Mendoza's departure, to take post at Damare, a strong situation between Bruges and Sluyce. Here he was by every possible means to oppose the progress of the enemy. Maurice determined to dislodge him, and with that intention detached a numerous body of cavalry, under the generals Ghend and Bax. The Dutch met with almost insurmountable obstacles, by reason of the difficulty of the roads, and the resistance made by Velasco. Bax was wounded, and his troops on the brink of being defeated, when the infantry seasonably arrived, renewed the engagement, forced the post, <sup>g</sup>

a and defeated the Spaniards with great slaughter. Upon this success the prince invested Sluys, evacuating all the posts which commanded the town, and taking the best measures for preventing the garrison from receiving succours, until his lines were completed. Serrano, a Spanish officer of reputation, commanded in the town; but he was badly provided with necessaries, and supported only by a slender garrison, of which he gave the archduke immediate notice. Supplies of men and provision were frequently thrown in before Maurice had finished his lines: one indeed would have imagined, that he purposely suffered the garrison to be reinforced, in order to try the strength of his own capacity, in reducing a town which had every advantage that nature and art could communicate. At last he had so completely invested it, that the archduke placed all his hopes of the safety of Sluys in b the marquis Spinola, who was far advanced in the siege of Ostend, and had gained more ground in a few weeks, than the former generals had done for the two preceding years. Spinola, however, had too much discernment to undertake dislodging prince Maurice, which was necessary for the relief of the garrison. He found his lines too strong, and drawn too judiciously to be forced. After viewing the posts, and finding them impregnable, he marched with all expedition to Damare, where he attacked a detachment commanded by William of Nassau, who received him gallantly, and sustained the shock of the whole Spanish army, until he was supported by prince Maurice, which obliged Spinola to retreat, after having lost above a thousand men. Next day, the garrison, reduced to the last extremity for want of provision, capitulated on honourable conditions, marched out with their arms c and baggage, but so emaciated and exhausted, as to excite the compassion of their enemies. The garrison of Sluys, when it surrendered, amounted to four thousand men, so weakened with disease and hunger, that several hundreds dropt down dead in the short march to Damare <sup>f</sup>.

THE success of Maurice greatly chagrined Spinola. That prince had in the space of three months reduced the strongest fortresses in the Netherlands; whereas the Spaniards had spent three years before Ostend, and it was still a matter of doubt with some men whether they could succeed.

SPINOLA returning to the siege, soon demonstrated the possibility of reducing the strongest situations. He blew up mines every where, he made violent assaults, and hemmed the besieged within so narrow a circle, as determined the fate of Ostend. Several governors since Noor's departure had been killed, and a multitude of inferior officers were either slain or grievously wounded. Almost every shot from the enemy's batteries now did execution, as the balls fell within a small compass wholly occupied by the troops. At last a strong wind from the south-west, at high water, gave the finishing blow to the works of the besieged, which being newly erected in the room of others that were demolished, could not withstand the fury of the waves. They were all overturned, and it was afterwards in vain for the garrison to resist; however, they refused to surrender, before the sentiments of the states and prince Maurice were known. A council was immediately called at Sluys, to deliberate whether the relief of the garrison was to be attempted, or the place e immediately surrendered. The latter opinion prevailed, and orders were accordingly dispatched to the governor. The capitulation, in which the garrison and inhabitants obtained the most honourable terms, was signed the twentieth day of September, above three years after the town had been first invested; and it had cost the lives of an hundred thousand brave soldiers. By means of this fortress, the states-general employed the whole strength of Spain for three campaigns, and prevented the archduke from entering with a superior army into the United Provinces, while it left Maurice at liberty to reduce Rimbach, Grave, and Sluys. Curiosity drew the archduke and dukes to see the remains of a place which had so long and gloriously resisted the whole force of their arms; but scarce the vestiges of what it had been, could now be traced; all was a heap of ruins, and those fine works, upon f which such vast sums had been lavished, were reduced to rubbish and a mere chaos. As for Spinola, he was loaded with honours, and equally caressed as if he had terminated the war. He went to the court of Madrid, to solicit supplies for the ensuing year, was graciously received by the king, and promised all he required. He gave Philip a clear detail of the state of the Netherlands, and the necessity of carrying the war into the enemy's country. By crossing the Rhine, and finishing their operations on that side, they might easily penetrate into the provinces, which they would find impracticable on the side of Zealand, where canals, rivers, and dykes, rendered the Hollanders inaccessible. He represented, in A. D. 1903. the most lively colours, the disorders consequent on the mutiny of the troops, which proved the greatest obstruction to the service; and demonstrated, that the disease was incurable, g unless they were paid more regularly; for loyalty and fidelity did not require that soldiers should fight upon trust, and starve in the cause of their country. He proved that the da-images sustained from the depredations of the mutineers, cost the government more than if they were scrupulously paid, and that the mismanagement of the revenue was the whole source of the evil. The king and council were fully convinced with his reasoning, and they entered immediately on the necessary measures to send Spinola back, with full power to remedy all the disorders of which he complained. On his departure he was declared marshal-general of the camp, and commander in chief of the Spanish and Italian forces. He had authority to dispose of the king's revenues and troops in the provinces, in what manner he thought proper. He was created a knight of the golden fleece, and loaded with honours and preferments, which equally shewed the discernment of Philip and the merit of Spinola <sup>a</sup>.

Spanish forces.

DURING the absence of the marquis de Spinola, terrible disturbances happened among the Spanish troops, who were all on the wing of revolting. Several of the mutineers had already entered into the service of the states; others were plundering the ten provinces, and some had the insolence to demand the strongest fortresses of the Netherlands, as security for the payment of their arrears. Albert's situation was truly deplorable; the scarcity of money rendered him incapable of satisfying the troops, and his lost authority prevented his protecting his subjects from their violences. He became, through no fault of his own, equally obnoxious to the inhabitants and the soldiers, while the states at the same time refused the supplies necessary for the maintenance of the court, until their demands were answered, and assurances given that the foreign troops should be withdrawn. Spinola fortunately arrived in time to stop the progress of an evil, which must soon have worked the ruin of the provinces. He began with immediately paying off the troops, and bringing them back to their duty, with redressing the grievances of the people, and giving all possible satisfaction to the states. Then he set on foot his levies, which were prosecuted with such diligence in Germany, Italy, and the provinces, that the states-general of the United Provinces became soon sensible of the necessity of opposing this vigilant officer with all their prudence and fortitude. <sup>b</sup>

prince Maurice
and Spinola.

MAURICE had orders to augment the troops, and levy a body of horse in Germany. The king of France promised succours in a secret manner, and advised the states to enable the prince to enter early upon action, and stop the designs of Spinola. But with the utmost endeavours Maurice had his army complete a month before their expectation. In the month of May he made a bold attempt on Antwerp, which proved fruitless, though it was planned with the utmost prudence, and conducted with all imaginable resolution. The shipwreck of the vessels employed in the enterprize ruined the whole, and afforded the Spaniards an opportunity of making a great number of prisoners. It was further intended by this expedition, to attack Spinola at his head-quarters in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, before his whole strength was collected; but both enterprizes failed through a variety of cross accidents. The prince having provided all the forts on the Scheld with every necessary, resolved to remove the seat of war into Flanders, to prevent Spinola's design of penetrating into the United Provinces; and the Italian general throwing a bridge over the river, enabled his troops to turn themselves on every side, and commence hostilities in whatever quarter was found most convenient. Maurice was encamped in the neighbourhood of Isendyck, and Spinola imagining his design was to attack Sasde Gand, or Bruges, removed to a situation where he could watch the motions of the confederates, without any danger of being attacked, his camp being surrounded with fens and marshes <sup>c</sup>.

WHILE the two principal armies were attentively observing each other, the archduke detached the count de Buquoi with a body of eight thousand men, to seize upon certain passages of the Rhine. This officer, after defeating several small parties of the enemy, reduced Keisers-waert, into which the coadjutor of Cologne put a garrison, thereby infringing the neutrality with respect to the United Provinces. The motions of count Buquoi put Maurice in fear that an attempt would be made on Reinbach; to prevent which, he detached his brother Henry, and Ernest of Nassau, to put this important place in a state of defence. They encamped on the Rhine, threw a bridge over the river, and chose such a situation as should enable them to succour Wesel, Rheez, Emmerick, or Rhimberg. Wesel armed the burghers in its own defence. The inhabitants of Linguen, Oldenzeel, Grol, and Bravocort, demanded supplies of them, and provisions from the deputies who attended prince Henry, which they promised, and neglected, not imagining that Spinola would penetrate so far. In this they were deceived; the marquis perceiving he could do nothing in Flanders, left the reduction of that province to count Frederic de Bergh, and suddenly arrived with five thousand men on the banks of the Rhine, halting at Boorort. This river he crossed on the twenty-fourth of July, having received intelligence that the provinces of Friseland and Overyssel were defended only by a small body of forces. To secure his <sup>d</sup> a retreat, he ordered the count de Buquoi to build forts in certain posts; and to conceal his design, it was debated in the archduke's cabinet-council, whether Grave, Sluys, Breda, or Bergen-op-zoom, should be invested. Informed of the fluctuations in the enemy's councils, the states little imagined the United Provinces were in danger, and had accordingly neglected the precautions necessary to their security.

As soon as the forts at Keifers-waert were finished, Spinola laid his plan of operations before the council, which met with universal approbation. He could not avoid traversing the dominions of the duke of Cleves, and of other neutral princes: but he determined that his army should maintain such strict discipline, as should afford no just cause of complaint; he sent the count de Serle to assure the magistrates of the towns, that no violence should be offered to the privileges of the inhabitants; leaving the count de Buquoi with a strong detachment, to proceed with the rest of the army through Cleves and Westphalia, and maintaining such regularity and order, as even forces praise from the Dutch writers. Having penetrated into Overysfel, he first presented himself before Oldenzeel, at a little distance from Linguen, which was the principal object of his attention. In one day he reduced the former town, which was poorly fortified, ill provided, and weakly garrisoned. At the same time Trivulcio was detached to occupy all the posts around Linguen, and take the proper measures for forming the siege. The garrison of Linguen consisted of five hundred German soldiers, under the conduct of Cobbin, who had just begun to repair the fortifications, suffered from penurious motives to fall into ruins. The states had even neglected to lay in the necessary stores, because they hoped prince Maurice could return soon enough from Flanders, to frustrate all the schemes laid by Spinola; but they suffered the just punishment of that frugality which had more than once endangered the supply of the provinces. The town was invested, and the approaches were so vigorously carried on, that Cobbin capitulated ten days after the trenches were opened. It was perhaps an error in Spinola, to check the ardour of his troops, and the rapidity of conquest, by losing time in repairing the fortifications of Linguen; but his design was to secure a retreat, and maintain a footing in the province, should he be forced to retire on the arrival of Maurice. He knew that a strong garrison would be able to employ the prince's strength, while the Spanish forces might leisurely quit Overysfel, and carry their conquests into another province.

PRINCE Maurice was no sooner acquainted with the intention of the Italian general, than he issued the necessary orders for preserving his conquests in Flanders, and proceeded with his army to oppose the enemy in Overysfel. His first design was to relieve Linguen; but the garrison having surrendered before his arrival, he made dispositions for covering all the other towns that lay exposed. William of Nassau, governor of Friseland and Groningen, likewise began his march for the provinces, to remove the apprehensions of the people, and secure their fidelity to the states, in which he proved successful. The great object was to prevent Spinola from crossing the Yssel; to effect which, Maurice strictly watched his motions. After he was joined by William, the army amounted to nine thousand infantry, and three thousand cavalry, and was considerably augmented by a number of Spanish mutineers, who now wholly deserted that service, and proved extremely faithful to the states general. Villar, the chief officer among the deserters, attacked and defeated a detachment commanded by the baron de la Chaus, who was killed in the engagement. The vigilance of Maurice, and the advanced season, obliged Spinola to retire, after he had left strong garrisons in Linguen and Oldenzeel. He cantoned his troops round Malheim, at such distances as furnished the prince with the idea of surprising the Spaniards. A scheme for this purpose was drawn out; and had the execution been equal to the design projected, the Spaniards would have sustained an irretrievable blow. Prince Frederic and general Bux were appointed to conduct this difficult and important enterprize, which failed through some misunderstanding. The attack was made by the cavalry, who were astonished to find the enemy drawn up, when they expected to have caught them unprepared; however, the onset was pushed with such impetuosity, as would have produced the desired effect, had not Spinola arrived with fresh forces, renewed the engagement, and after an obstinate conflict turned the fortune of the day, when a body of Dutch infantry appeared in support of their countrymen. The action was now a second time renewed with redoubled fury, and the combatants were continually augmented, with troops powering in from all quarters. In the end, the Spaniards would have obtained a complete victory, had not two battalions of French, commanded by the count de Chatiller, secured a retreat to the Dutch, by keeping up a brisk unremitting fire on the enemy's flank, extended towards the river.

SUCH was the issue of a manœuvre upon which Maurice placed great dependance, as it was planned with so much prudence, as seemed to insure success. The loss was considerable on both sides, but writers are divided with respect to the number. Bentivoglio alleges that Spinola left three hundred dead in the field; but that the loss of the Dutch exceeded five hundred men, besides Emmerville, the best officer among the French auxiliaries<sup>a</sup>. Meteren, on the contrary, affirms that Maurice had two hundred men killed, and the enemy near three times that number; whereas Grotius reckons the loss pretty equal, but the victory clearly in favour of Spinola, the Dutch being not only disappointed in the intention of the attack, but forced to leave the field of battle. Upon the whole, prince Henry Frederic is blamed universally by all historians, for delaying the attack, and giving the enemy time to recover their surprize, draw up their forces, and acquaint Spinola with their situation. What beyond doubt determines the event of this engagement so much disputed, is, that the enemy immediately afterwards laid siege to Wachtendock, and reduced this strong fortress, without the prince's having it in his power to relieve the garrison. While this siege employed the count de Buquai, to keep up the credit of his arms, Maurice made an attempt on Gueldres, which proved unsuccessful, and rather contributed to augment the disgrace he endeavoured to avoid. These misfortunes, however unjustly, affected the reputation of this great commander, who was often under the necessity of acting agreeable to the instructions of the states, contrary to his own sentiments; frequently he entrusted the execution of delicate enterprizes to his officers, and was always curbed by a faction which now arrived at great strength, and openly professed themselves enemies to the aspiring ambition of this prince, and the growth of the house of Orange. With this Maurice ended a campaign, which on the whole proved honourable to Spinola, though it detracted nothing from the great merit of prince Maurice.

Naval affairs.

WE shall conclude the transactions of the year, with observing the rapid progress of the infant India company, which not only received the joyful news of vast conquests made in Asia, of several rich captures of Portuguese Indiamen, but of the safe arrival of thirteen large ships, loaded with spices, and the most valuable merchandise of India. About the same time, a Dutch squadron equipped for that purpose, had the good fortune to fall in with a fleet of transports, which was carrying a battalion of Spanish forces to recruit Spinola's army. The transports were chiefly English, except a few Hamburgers: they hoisted the English flag; notwithstanding which the Dutch admiral attacked them with great fury, sunk some, took others, and pursued the rest to Dover, where he fired warmly upon them within reach of the English cannon. Five companies of soldiers were taken or destroyed, the seven remaining companies were blocked up for several weeks, and James was forced to put up with this violation of the neutrality he declared, contenting himself with fruitless, disregarded remonstrances. His cautious, timid disposition could not long escape the discernment of the Dutch (A), and they seemed willing to revenge upon him the haughty usage they were compelled to bear from the spirited Elizabeth. This year was likewise successful in cruizes upon the Dunkirk privateers, many of which were taken, and their crews immediately hanged; with which they were so terrified, as to keep close in port, and suffer the Dutch commerce to proceed unmolested.

A. D. 1606.
Difficulties
about raising the supplies in Holland.

THE year was ushered in with demands from the council of state of the United Provinces, for supplies to support the expences of the ensuing campaign. It appeared that the public charges were considerably augmented, without the armies being proportionably increased. Twelve hundred thousand florins were assigned for the extraordinary expences of the land-forces; besides which, the council proposed that the provinces should liquidate all the sums due since the year 1599, which amounted to twelve millions of florins. The former demand was readily granted; but all the provinces exclaimed violently against an exaction, which would entirely impoverish the people, though it was no more than they had subscribed for the public service, and which, if performed, would have enabled prince Maurice to ruin Spinola, and terminate the war in a single campaign. Still however a faction exclaimed against the prince, and attributed the prolongation of the war to his ambition and avarice; although it was demonstrable, that, unable to keep the field, he was forced to act defensively, and was even too weak to succour Rhimberg, when besieged in the month of August.

* BENTIVOG. p. iii. lib. vii. p. 187. METEREN. lib. xxvii. p. 574. GROT. lib. xiv. p. 470.

(A) It must however be confessed, that the states general had reason to resent the conduct of king James, who, according to their writers, took every opportunity of favouring the archduke and the Spaniards. He had not only withdrawn the English forces, but suffered them to be employed in the Spanish service, and recruited in England. Besides, the transports on this occasion were almost all English, which could not fail of being deemed a violation of the neutrality he professed.

a SPINOLA's circumstances were altogether different. That general set out, when the campaign was finished, to Brussels, to concert the plan of future operations with the archduke, and was so fortunate as to have all his proposals approved; but the concurrence of the court of Spain was necessary for the carrying them into execution, and it was presumed the lively representations of Spinola would greatly influence his catholic majesty. Accordingly he set out for Madrid, and was received by the king with the utmost cordiality. His proposals were immediately applauded, but the difficulty was to raise the sufficient supplies. Three hundred thousand doubloons a month, besides the revenues of Flanders, were demanded for the vigorous prosecution of the war, which was a sum too vast even for the Spanish monarchy, assisted with the treasures of Mexico and Peru, but already drained by continual wars of near forty years standing. The best measures possible were however taken to answer Spinola's expectation; and with such alacrity did the whole court embrace the scheme presented, that an advanced sum of money was immediately remitted to Brussels, to make fresh levies. But the plan of operations was in some respects disconcerted by the tediousness of the negotiations at Madrid, and a fever which Spinola afterwards contracted, that prevented his return to the Netherlands, until the summer-season was pretty far advanced.

b This delay probably saved the United Provinces. The states spent the whole winter in deliberating the means of supporting the expences of the campaign, and the troops that would be necessary. In the spring the levies were not begun, and even then made under a variety of disappointments. The French king, embroiled with the duke de Bouillon, forbid troops to be raised in his country, and a war kindled in the territory of Brunswick obstructed the levies made in Germany; above all, the narrow parsimony, and unseasonable frugality of the Dutch, had almost ruined their affairs. At last the business of recruiting was undertaken, and Henry permitted a small body of French to pass into the Netherlands, before the end of the campaign<sup>1</sup>.

c SPINOLA did not hesitate about seizing the advantage gained by his superiority. He had two armies in the field; one composed of twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, he led in person; the other, amounting to ten thousand infantry, and twelve hundred cavalry, was under the direction of the count de Buquoy. Both were provided with every necessary, and constantly attended by two thousand waggons loaded with provision. Advancing to the country of Twente, Spinola ordered the count de Buquoy to pass the Vaal, and enter the enemy's country; but in this he was frustrated by the vigilance of Maurice, who raised such a variety of obstructions, as it was impossible to surmount. Baffled in his principal design, Spinola resolved not to lose the whole fruits of his superiority, and accordingly invested Grol, which obliged Maurice to march to the relief of the garrison. He met with numberless difficulties in succouring the place; but was on the point of succeeding, and had wrote to the governor an assurance of speedy assistance, when the letter being intercepted by Spinola, and the siege vigorously pushed, compelled the garrison to surrender in despair. This obliged the prince to retire, and so animated the Spanish troops, that Spinola undertook the siege of Rhimberg. The prince de Soubise, and several volunteers of distinction, immediately threw themselves into the town, with a view of displaying their courage; the defence was obstinate, but colonel Utenhove was at length under the necessity of capitulating. Maurice in vain practised every method to save Rhimberg; he would even have ventured a battle, had the states approved of so desperate a remedy; but all was in vain, the activity of Spinola rendered his utmost endeavours fruitless.

d SCARCE had the Spanish general compleated the reduction of this strong town, when the troops mutinied. At first he endeavoured to prevail on them by arguments to return to their duty, and finding reason useless, he employed force. This augmented the evil, and more enflamed the passions of the mutineers, who thought themselves hardly enough used in being deprived of their pay. They even encreased to two thousand horse and foot, retreating towards Breda, where they could insure quarters. Maurice took advantage of the spirit of rebellion, and the sickness that prevailed in the Spanish army. He marched towards Overyssel, with intention to recover the late losses sustained by the provinces. He begun with Lochem, which he reduced in three days, and then proceeded to Grol; but he had scarce formed the siege of this place, when he foresaw numberless difficulties in the prosecution. Still however he pursued his design, in expectation that the confusion in Spinola's army would prevent his giving him any annoyance. Owing to this confidence, he neglected pursuing his course with the usual precaution. Spinola's intelligence was good; he assembled eight thousand infantry, and twelve hundred horse, and set out with the utmost secrecy and expedition to attack the prince's quarters, while the garrison, informed of his intention, kept up a brisk fire on the besiegers. Maurice however had advice of Spinola's march; he consulted the deputies what should be done, and had their consent to hazard a battle, if necessary. But he did not chuse to risque the safety of the provinces on the issue of an engagement; though the French auxiliaries, and even the Dutch troops, loudly demanded battle. In this he certainly acted with prudence, though it afforded a handle to his enemies, to censure his courage, and at the same time his desire to prolong the war. Maurice had too much fortitude and true magnanimity to enter upon dangerous measures for mere popular applause. He had already exhibited too many proofs of courage, to be justly taxed with cowardice, and he left his general conduct to speak for his fidelity. In a word, he resolved to retire, and executed his purpose in so masterly a manner, that Spinola did not think proper to pursue, and contented himself with reinforcing the garrison<sup>m</sup>.

He relieves Grol.

AFTER Spinola had accomplished the relief of Grol, he returned to Brussels, to remedy the disorders which threatened destruction to the archduke's affairs. Every method was tried to appease the mutineers, and in some measure with success. Such was the confidence they reposed in Spinola, that they returned, upon his promise that their arrears would soon be advanced; but the remittances from Spain falling short of expectation, he failed in his engagements, and yet still had the good fortune to retain the affections of the soldiers, who shifted the blame from him upon the shoulders of the archduke. In fact, Spinola and his friends had advanced large sums to the crown of Spain, of which they began now to dread the loss, together with the blighting of those laurels acquired in the two last campaigns. But the difficulty consisted in extricating himself. To throw up his command would but lessen all his prospects of being reimbursed, and to continue his commission would be hazarding the reputation he had gained with so much toil and labour. In these circumstances his only hope was, that the United Provinces would not take advantage of the situation of the Spanish army; but would, from their usual principle of frugality, involve Maurice in the same difficulties that attended him from the necessities of the court of Spain. Such was the situation of affairs at the close of the campaign. We shall see how the efforts of the provinces succeeded on the ocean<sup>n</sup>.

Naval affairs.

THE states general perceiving that little progress was made in the land-operations, thought the most effectual method of distressing Spain, and of concluding the war at a small expence, would be to harraß the Spanish shipping, and destroy the commerce of that kingdom. In pursuing this design, not only the expences of a fleet would probably be reimbursed by captures, but the Dutch trade greatly promoted, and new colonies erected on the ruins of the Portuguese establishments. One grand fleet was accordingly equipped to cruize on the Spanish coast, to watch the arrival of the plate flota, and protect the commerce of the provinces. This armament was preparing, when advice was received that a Dutch squadron of seven ships had fallen in with eight galleons from Peru. The Spaniards attacked the Dutch with great vigour, but met with so warm a reception, that two of the galleons were burnt, and the rest so roughly handled, that three foundered at sea and were lost. This misfortune was severely felt by the king of Spain, though it produced no immediate advantage to the Hollanders. It raised his indignation to such a height, that he fitted out a squadron to intercept the Dutch, met them in their return, took the whole fleet, and sent orders to the admiral to treat the prisoners in the same manner as the Dutch had used the Dunkirk pirates; upon which the crews were immediately hanged. To revenge this cruelty, the states gave orders to admiral Hautain, who commanded their grand fleet, to attack the Carracca flota in the river Tagus, and burn and destroy the whole without mercy; but he was frustrated in this attempt, and forced to satisfy himself with some unsuccessful descents on the coasts of Spain and Portugal. As he was ready to quit his station, eight galleons homeward-bound were discovered. Hautain immediately gave chase, and drove two of the galleons on the rocks, where they perished; the rest entered the Tagus and escaped. Soon after he was overtaken in a terrible storm, in which the whole fleet was dispersed, and several ships lost. His squadron was now reduced to thirteen sail, including frigates and brigantines, when the flota of don Faisardo, composed of nine men of war, and eighteen galleons, was descried. The immensity of the booty in view determined the Dutch admiral to attack the enemy, though greatly inferior in strength. He endeavoured to gain the weather-gage, and was disappointed. Vice-admiral Classen was separated in this tack from the rest of the Dutch fleet, attacked by five ships of the enemy, and engaged with the utmost fury. He defended himself for several hours with great ina trepidity; but his main-mast being shot away, and his ship otherwise greatly shattered, he resolved to blow himself and crew into the air, rather than strike to an enemy who had lately so cruelly treated his countrymen. This he executed with admirable constancy, and perished with a hundred and fifty brave soldiers and skilful mariners. The engagement was warm between Hautain and the Spanish admiral, but night separated the combatants, and prevented the destruction of both parties, who were each resolved to die or conquer. Such were the transactions of this year, towards the close of which the richest India fleet ever seen from India arrived, with the agreeable news of further advantages gained in Asia, and the prosperous situation of the company's affairs.

b THE infinite losses sustained by the Spaniards, by sea and land, in Europe, Asia, and America; the immense expences of the war; the little probability of reducing the provinces; the exhausted state of the treasury; the vast debts contracted by the crown; and the mutic nous disposition of the troops, all suggested the first idea of the necessity of a truce with the obstinate Hollanders. It was now seriously deliberated in council, and the motion supported by the persons most attached to the interests of their king and country. The Portuguese, who were the greatest sufferers in their East India traffic, made strong remonstrances to Philip III. on the damages sustained from a ruinous war, in which they were no way concerned. They had lost an infinity of rich ships, were deprived of their best establishments in the Indies, stripped of their commerce, and in the open way to destruction, if a speedy issue was not put to the disturbances in the Low Countries, which had already cost Spain and Portugal above double the intrinsic value of the Seven Provinces. They asserted, that the difficulty of the war would every year increase, with the inability of Spain to support it; that the enemy were growing rich and powerful upon the ruins of their trade and navigation, and would every year prove more formidable. They added, that the natural situation of the provinces, surrounded by deep rivers and the ocean, rendered them impregnable; and if Spain could not succeed through the spirited conduct of such generals as the duke of Parma and the marquis Spinola, while she exerted her utmost force, how could she expect a fortunate issue under any other generals, when her strength was spent and exhausted? Philip, wholly occupied with the pursuit of pleasure, was naturally pacific, and had prosecuted the war by the advice of his council, rather than from inclination. His ministers insinuated to him that the French king was labouring to unite the provinces to his own crown, in order to extend his dominion over the Netherlands. It was, beyond doubt, less disadvantageous and dishonourable to Spain, to suffer the provinces to enjoy their liberty, and become a free state, than to fall into the hands of a powerful and ambitious rival, who was mounting by large strides to an equality with the house of Austria. The success of the infant India company, afterwards established upon a larger basis, made the king apprehensive, not only of the loss of his colonies in the East, but of that vast empire he possessed in the West Indies. It was at the same time whispered, that the Dutch would afford the Mozers shipping to transport vast armies into Spain; and indeed it is astonishing that the provinces, amidst all their distresses, never attempted making this diversion. These considerations, joined to the inclinations of the archduke and Isabella, quite wearied out with the perpetual complaints of their subjects, determined Spain to make overtures for a truce. Even Spinola, for the reasons we have before mentioned, was of opinion that it was better to enjoy the Ten Provinces in security and peace, than risque the whole Netherlands, and ruin Spain, in the fruitless attempt to conquer rebel subjects, who had too long tasted the sweets of liberty, ever again to bear with ease the shackles of monarchy and absolute dominion. He said, that if to their growing empire in Asia, they should add establishments in America, Spain would be reduced to its primitive poverty.

f THESE sentiments of the Spanish court transpired before any formal proposals had been made. In Holland some alledged, that the report of pacific designs was industriously propagated, only to lull the provinces into security, and catch them napping and unprepared. Numbers of people pretended to discredit the rumour, because they lived, and had raised fortunes, by the war. Others found out, that a peace would dissolve the union of Utrecht, and bring the trade of Holland and Zealand back again to Antwerp. On the other hand, the provinces most exposed wished for an equitable peace, and all moderate persons desired to see the public tranquillity re-established on such a footing as should secure the liberty of the provinces. These were the general sentiments of both parties, when the commissioners Walrave and Wittenborst arrived, from the archduke, at the Hague, to make some proposals touching a congress. Prince Maurice was then in Overyssel; and the deputies to whom the ambassadors addressed themselves, gave such discouragement, that they g returned to Brussels, without having publicly communicated their instructions. They were again sent to the Hague, in the month of December, with orders to acquaint the states, that they had instructions from the archduke to assure them of the sincerity of his pacific views, and readiness to grant any reasonable terms, and to demand such conditions as the United Provinces were determined to accept. They were further impowered to offer the states either a peace or truce, and the choice of time and place for fixing a congress, where the articles might be adjusted. To these assurances and demands the states general refused to give an answer, because the ambassadors had brought no letters expressly addressed to the states. This difficulty was not foreseen; but, to remove it, one of the ambassadors set out for Brussels, obtained the letter required, and returned to the Hague. Now the ambassador demanded a public audience of the states general, and obtained it on the third of January. They read publickly the archduke's letter, professing his hearty desire to heal up those wounds which had so long afflicted the Netherlands; they commented upon the letter, set forth the uncertain event of war, the misery of the people, the duty of conciliating fellow-subjects unhappily divided by civil discord; with a variety of other topics; to which the states general answered: That while the archduke formed any right to the United Provinces, it was impossible they could ever consent to a treaty; that all the world allowed they were born a free people (A), and their highnesses could never make out their pretensions to dominion over them but by force; that it was incumbent on the states to recover what had been insidiously and oppressively wrested from them; that they could not consent in conscience, in honour, or safety, to treat with princes who formed pretensions to their undoubted liberties, until such pretensions were solemnly abjured; as for the rest, they declared they would be no ways accessary to the evil consequences which might ensue, since their resolutions were all formed in self-defence, and founded on justice and the natural rights of mankind, all of which dictated, that subjects might lawfully oppose the ambitious encroachments of their sovereigns, and draw their swords against princes in defence of liberty. With this answer the ambassadors returned, promising that they would soon acquaint the states with the archduke's sentiments.

It must be acknowledged that the general sentiments of the United Provinces were averse to peace; that the states treated the archduke cavalierly, and raised all possible obstructions in the way of a negotiation; but such were the circumstances of the courts of Madrid and Brussels, that they now waved punctilio, and were contented to effect at least a suspension of hostilities, upon any tolerable conditions. With this view John Neyen, an ecclesiastic, extremely conversant in politics, insinuating in his address, able, penetrating, subtle, and eloquent, was again dispatched to the Hague. Neyen was acquainted personally with the principal men in Holland; he had a great number of friends in that country, and, though a catholic, was exceedingly beloved by the reformed, because he had the art to make his opinions seem moderate. On his arrival he found the states immoveably fixed in their resolution to listen to no terms, unless they were treated and addressed as a free people. To this the archduke had strong objections; because it was in fact acknowledging that he had hitherto maintained an unjust war; that he was in no condition to continue it; and that he had really no just pretensions to the sovereignty of the United Provinces. He apprehended that such a concession would be injurious to Philip's and his own reputation; and he was sensible of the danger of rewarding rebellion with liberty. However, necessity overcame his scruples, and he determined to grant the demands of the states general, hoping that if the negotiation should turn out to his advantage, the event would plead his apology, and excuse the means he had practised of restoring peace to his subjects; but he first gave instructions to Neyen to endeavour to procure some mitigation of this hard preliminary condition. Neyen expatiated to the states on the archduke's pious intentions to spare the effusion of christian blood, and of treating with the provinces upon the most equitable footing; he eloquently explained the mutual obligations of sovereigns and subjects, and enumerated with admirable address all the arguments in favour of indefeasible right, a topic since that time so hackneyed in other countries; he launched out upon the blessings of peace, and the advantages which the commerce of the United Provinces, in particular, would deduce from the establishment

(A) This assertion would seem to allude to the solemn declaration, published in 1581, by the states assembled at the Hague, whereby they deprived Philip II. of all right, dominion, and sovereignty over the United Provinces, which they henceforward declared to be a free state; because his majesty had first dissolved the original contract, by divers infractions and violations of the engagements subsisting between him and his subjects (1).

- a of public tranquillity ; but he artfully avoided touching the liberty of the states general, and the preliminary demanded. Finding all his arguments to induce them to relax in this particular fruitless, he returned to Brussels, and was in a few days sent back with full powers to negotiate with the United Provinces, as a free state, over which neither the catholic king or the archduke had any just claim of sovereignty. He was directed to conclude either a truce or perpetual peace, according as he found the states general disposed ; to offer them the choice of their own deputies, and the time and place for fixing the congress ; and, to facilitate the treaty, to demand a suspension of arms for the space of eight months, during which no hostilities of any kind should be permitted ; provided however, that the proposals should in eight days be accepted. These overtures were contained in a writing,
- b signed by the archduke on the thirteenth day of March 1607, and accepted by a similar writing signed by the states on the twenty-fourth of April. At the same time, an order to suspend hostilities was reciprocally sent to all the governors of towns, generals, and commanders in either service. The articles of truce were exchanged at Lillo ; and the archduke left the farther explication of the agreement of suspension to his envoy Neyen, who desired leave to repair for this purpose to the Hague. As Neyen received no immediate answer to his request, he construed the silence of the states into consent, set out for the Hague, and on the first day of June published an edict, whereby he declared that the suspension took place at sea as well as land, limiting it however to the Northern ocean and the British channel. In this edict the frontiers were adjusted, and several other particulars,
- c which had before been omitted. Foreign ministers, particularly the French ambassador at the Hague, were made acquainted with the determination of the states, and invited to send plenipotentiaries to assist at the congress. In consequence, the French king sent the president Jeannin, and the sieurs Roijsi and Busenval to Holland, where, on their first arrival, they gently expostulated with the states, for having come to a resolution so important to the tranquillity of Europe, without having previously acquainted their master with their intention, and received the advice of so constant and necessary an ally<sup>1</sup>. James, king of England, likewise promised that his ambassadors, Spencer and Winwood, should attend the congress.

- Now the chief difficulty that remained regarded the manner of opening the negotiation.
- d The deputies of the states foresaw the great revolution in affairs which so sudden a change from war to peace would produce, especially should prince Maurice disapprove of the treaty. The reputation acquired by the prince, in the long course of his services, rendered him very powerful and very popular. His reputation was a vast structure raised on a firm foundation laid by his father ; a building erected by courage, virtue, and public spirit, on the basis of patriotism. Maurice was not only at the head of the army, but he held the stadtholdership of four out of the seven provinces, and the rest were under his direction, as his two cousins were governors. Several of the states became jealous of his authority and ambition ; they united into a faction, pretended to fear that Maurice's popularity would aspire at absolute dominion, and gave themselves up to the direction of Barneveldt, pensioner of
- e Holland, a minister equally able and faithful. The continuance of the war would certainly encrease the prince's authority, and a truce proportionably diminish it, and open the way to the exertion of the functions of civil power : this disposed the whole party to wish for the treaty, and to advance its progress and issue with all their weight and influence. It was further necessary, they alledged, to shew their allies that the states had it in their power to conclude peace when they pleased, which would render them more independent on their allies, oblige France to declare more openly, and induce all their allies to afford real, instead of imaginary, assistance and large promises. On the other side, the Orange party threw all possible obstructions in the way of the treaty, receiving every proposal with great coldness and arrogance, starting punctilious difficulties upon every expression, and obliging
- f the archduke upon every trifling occasion to send expresses into Spain, and wait their return, without advancing a step in the negotiation. In this interest may be included the bulk of the people, as well as the whole body of militia by land and sea. The former, by long habit, contracted invincible prejudices against Spain, and the latter proposed the improvement of their fortunes. But there was one consideration which weighed strongly in favour of the opposite faction. This was the decline of the vast Spanish monarchy, so formidable under Charles V. and Philip II. owing to extensive projects, ambitious councils, and unfortunate events. On the contrary, France was rising to a great degree of power, conducted by a prince enterprizing, constant, and intrepid. This king put an end to all domestic discord and misfortune, by a peace with the house of Austria. It was obvious, however, that the temper of the nation, long accustomed to constant heats and commo-

motions, would not long remain quiet without exercise; and to prevent the people from finding employment at home, it might be necessary for the king to contrive work for them abroad, which might at the same time promote the views of his own ambition. Flanders had anciently formed a part of the Gallic monarchy, and its princes derived and held their power of the kings of France. An enterprize to recover the ancient demesnes of the crown lay extremely convenient, and seemed perfectly congenial to the disposition of Henry, who was at this very time making great preparations, which might very probably fall on this side, if invited by any greater decay of the Spanish power in the Netherlands. It was further observed, that the authority of Spain in the Low Countries was supported by treasures, which came by long and perilous voyages from Spain; and by troops drawn from thence, from Italy or Germany, at a great hazard and expence. The territory of the Ten Provinces was inconsiderable, and awed by the neighbourhood and jealousies both of France and England; but if Henry were once master of Flanders, the body of the French monarchy would be so great, so entire, so populous, and flourishing, as would make an attempt on the liberty of the United Provinces fatal, and completely decisive. Then would they have laboured in vain against Philip, and fought out that long and glorious struggle, not for absolute freedom, but for a change of masters. It was this idea of a political balance, as well as a dread of the ambition of Maurice, that actuated that able minister Barneveldt, though many of his party were excited by personal resentment to the prince, and drawn over by the presents and promises of Spain.

BESIDES the contending interests of the two parties, the negotiation met with another obstruction. The archduke had indeed given his solemn assurance, that he would obtain a declaration from king Philip, ratifying the means he proposed, and the terms he should stipulate in the treaty; but hitherto no declaration of the Spanish court had appeared to confirm the preliminary steps to the negotiation. Such a declaration was necessary, because the Netherlands reverted to the crown of Spain at the decease of the archduke without issue; in which case, all treaties with him would prove void, unless they were concluded with Philip's consent. At last the declaration, couched in form of two acts, was obtained; of which Spinola gave notice to the states, desiring a passport for Lewis Verreiken, the archduke's ambassador. When Verreiken presented the declaration to the states general assembled at the Hague, it was objected, that the king had approved in general terms of all that had been done, and promised strictly to observe the armistice; but that he had designedly flurred over the clause where it was specified, that the archduke treated with the provinces on the footing of a free state, over which he had no jurisdiction. Not only this, but several other particulars in the manner and stile of the act, were displeasing to the states general. They resented the title given the archduke of sovereign of all the Netherlands; the acts being written on paper instead of parchment; the king's subscription, We the king; the seal affixed, which was not the great seal of Spain; and the demand, that the Dutch squadrons should be immediately recalled from the Spanish coasts. In the end, the ambassador was informed, that the states could not accept the declaration without considerable amendments. Verreiken laboured to remove the objections. He insisted that the catholic king would never have ratified the preliminaries stipulated by the archduke, had not his intentions been wholly pacific; that procuring the amendments required would only retard the negotiation; but that if the states would, in the mean time, proceed to business, he would engage to obtain the declaration wanted as soon as in course it could be expected. But this was positively refused; and the states, for their own security, gave the ambassador copies of such a declaration as would quiet their scruples, in the Latin, French, and Spanish; that no mistake, through the equivocal sense of words, might arise. In these, several articles, relative to religion, were inserted, which, it was apprehended, the court of Spain would not grant; and indeed the writing would seem to be calculated with that design, and dictated by the partizans of the house of Orange.

WHEN the second ratification arrived at Brussels, the first observation which occurred, was, that the great seal was not affixed: but this difficulty the archduke engaged he should be able to surmount, should the contents prove otherwise agreeable to the sentiments of the United Provinces. The article with respect to religion, it was foreseen, would occasion more trouble. Verreiken and Neyen were dispatched to the Hague with this new ratification; and though it was supported with all their eloquence and address, could not gain the approbation of the states. They objected, that, like the former, it was written in a loose stile, upon paper, and sealed with a private signature. However, to preserve the appearance of candour, they said they would communicate the ratification to the provincial states, and report their opinion in six weeks; adding, that if the archduke thought proper to

- a appoint plenipotentiaries in ten days, they would follow his example, and send deputies to the congress. Before the ambassador's departure, the states desired that the original ratification might be left in their hands; but this was refused, though Verreiken, to oblige them all in his power, remained at the Hague, kept the ratification, and sent his colleague to attend the archduke's commands. By the fourteenth of November, Neyen returned from Brussels, with orders to deliver the ratification to the states, upon receiving their written promises to restore it, in case the negotiation should prove abortive. Even this was denied, and Neyen again forced to set out for Brussels, where he obtained the archduke's leave to surrender the ratification, without any promise or written acknowledgement. From such punctilious conduct and fastidious cavilling, it was obvious that the Orange party prevailed;
- b that the general sentiments of the people were not pacific, and that the negotiation would at last prove fruitless.

WHILE the treaty went on in this channel, letters addressed to the states were received from the emperor, in which he expressed his astonishment at their not acquainting the imperial court with their intentions, reminded them that the Netherlands were formerly a part of the empire, and that consequently they could not claim the privileges of a free state, without his consent; nor would any grants made by the archduke and the king of Spain prove valid, without the full approbation of the Aulic council. To these letters the states returned a civil answer, excusing themselves by affirming, that they imagined the king of Spain and the archduke had given his imperial majesty timely information; otherwise they

c should not be wanting in this mark of respect. They represented the cause which induced them to throw off the sovereignty of Philip, and now insist on the privileges of a free people; they alledged their having already been acknowledged independent by several states and sovereigns; and lastly, that they apprehended it properly belonged to Philip, to enquire whether he had a power to make the grants he proposed; that as for themselves, they had long taken the resolution of being free, or of perishing in the defence of liberty.

SCARCE had the states-general returned this answer, and received the compliments of several foreign princes, when the provinces reported their opinion, that the ratification was a sufficient basis for negotiating a peace or truce. This resolution had been carried in all the provincial states, in despite of the objections raised by the Orange faction. Never did a the talents of Barneveldt appear more conspicuous than on this occasion; on which he equally displayed the orator, the statesman, and the patriot. After deliberating with the ambassadors of France and Great Britain, the states acquainted the archduke by letter, that they were ready to enter upon the negotiation, provided that nothing should be demanded repugnant to their privileges, or obliquely directed against their liberties; and that if he would nominate plenipotentiaries, they would appoint an equal number of deputies (A). Towards the close of the year the armistice was expired, of which the archduke gave the states-general notice, and of his desire to prolong it for a month. He likewise acquainted them by letter, that he had nominated plenipotentiaries, and expressed his inclination that the congress might sit with the utmost expedition. The marquis de Spinola, Ricardot, Mancidor, the archduke's secretary, Neyen, and Verreiken, were appointed ambassadors. It

e gave umbrage, that not one native of the Netherlands should be chosen to adjust the articles of a treaty, that wholly respected this country, but the power was in the hands of the Spaniards, and by exerting it they proposed to gain some advantages to themselves<sup>u</sup>.

IN the beginning of the following year, Spinola and the other ambassadors set out for the congress; and as soon as they arrived in the territories of the states, they were received by Justin Nassau, and conducted to the Hague, without any expence. In all the towns the

(A) It was at this very time, when the attention of all Europe was fixed on the approaching congress, which was to determine the fate of the United Provinces, that the Hollanders planned the scheme of a West-India company, which should likewise trade to Africa, upon the model of the East India company. The project met with obstructions, on account of the peace now negotiating; as it was apprehended the king of Spain would dispute any grants which could be made out to the company. However, though the states chose to avoid raising difficulties in the way of the treaty, which the whole world must attribute to their desire of prolonging the war, they permitted their grand armament to set sail in quest of the Caracca fleet, soon expected. Admiral Hemskirk accordingly steered for the coast of Spain, received information that a Spanish squadron of six men of war lay in the bay of Gibraltar, and made dispositions for attacking the enemy. Juan Alvares d'Avila commanded the Spanish fleet. He was attacked by Hemskirk with the utmost resolution, and the engagement continued with great fury, until the Dutch admiral lost his arm by a cannon-ball. The death of so brave an officer caused some confusion in the fleet; but the spirits of the Dutchmen were soon roused, by the gallant conduct of Verhoef, who succeeded to the command. After an obstinate fight, d'Avila was killed, his ship run a-ground, and burnt by the garrison of Gibraltar, to prevent his being taken: the rest of the Spanish fleet was burnt, sunk, or destroyed, and the victory indisputably in favour of the Hollanders, though they received no other benefit from it, than the destruction of the Spanish armament (1).

people flocked to see Spinola, whose reputation was as great in Holland, as in the other provinces of the Netherlands; and at Dordrecht, prince Maurice met that general, who seemed to regard the prince with astonishment and admiration. Maurice expressed sentiments no less favourable to Spinola, and they both paid those compliments which were certainly due to each other's merit. Various were the sentiments of the people on the arrival of Spinola in Holland. Some alledged, it was wrong to suffer so popular an enemy to enter the heart of the country, and thereby afford him the opportunity of seducing the minds of the people. To this it was answered that the people were inveterate enemies of the Spanish dominion, and Spinola himself a promoter of the peace. Before the arrival of the plenipotentiaries, the states had prevailed, on the French ambassadors, that their master should become guarantee of the treaty intended; and they ventured to engage, that his majesty should assist the states with 10,000 men, in case it was broke thro' the fault of the king of Spain or the archduke. By the 4th of February, the states-general thinking it was time to open the negotiation, sent compliments to the ambassadors, and demanded their instructions. Then they appointed William of Nassau and the sieur Broderode, with a deputy from each province, to confer with them. John Barneveldt was chosen to represent Holland. All were assembled in a great hall provided for that purpose, and the first day was spent in examining their reciprocal powers, in which a variety of difficulties occurred. We shall only mention, that the Dutch deputies demanded whether the ambassadors proposed treating with them, as the representatives of a free state? To which they were answered in the affirmative. They next enquired by what right the archduke retained the arms of the provinces, if he proposed resigning the sovereignty? To which it was replied, that he was directed in this particular by the practice of other princes, by the king of Spain retaining the arms and title of king of Jerusalem, the French king those of Bavaria, and the king of England, the arms and title of sovereign of France, though they possessed not a foot of land in those countries. A few days after the Dutch deputies produced a schedule of the particular privileges they demanded, and the form of resignation required. The Flemish ambassadors declined giving an answer, but sent the writing to Brussels; and received the archduke's consent, that this article should be granted, agreeable to the desire of the states-general, in hopes that an equivalent might be obtained relative to the commerce of the Indies. The facility with which an article of such importance was given up, created suspicions in the states, that either the archduke was not sincere, or that the congress would prove fruitless, on account of extraordinary demands touching some other points; though in fact it proceeded from an extreme desire of terminating a war which had equally exhausted Spain and the ten provinces.

THE next object was a general armistice, restitution and compensation of losses; articles which were without difficulty adjusted, by leaving matters to their present situation; but it was more delicate and dubious with respect to commerce. Both equally affected the extensive trade of the East-Indies; they had too long experienced the advantages of this commerce, to resign any part of it without reluctance. The directors of the East-India company were deeply concerned in the issue of this article, and they made the strongest remonstrances to the states-general and the deputies. Four days were taken up with the single article of commerce; the debates were warm and spirited, but nothing was determined. At length the Dutch deputies declared, that only the acceptance of one of three proposals they had to make, could terminate the dispute. The first was, that the provinces, in consequence of a peace, should ever have free leave to trade to the Indies; the second, that they should have liberty, in consequence of a truce, for a certain number of years; or that at least there should be peace on this side the tropics, and both nations left to promote their several interests by arms on the other side the line. This last proposition was made, because the Hollanders knew themselves greatly superior by sea, and the Indian princes in general disgusted at the Portuguese government. Two of these propositions were immediately rejected; the one being directly contrary to an express instruction, that the commerce with the Indies should on no account be allowed to the provinces; and the other to the inclinations of the archduke, which determined him to have the peace general, or the congress dissolved. As to the second proposal, the ambassadors declared they would accept it with this restriction, that the states should agree to renounce the India trade at the expiration of the truce. But this was refused, and the ambassadors desired that the article of commerce might be deferred until others were adjusted.

NEXT the Dutch deputies demanded a list of the articles of which the ambassadors proposed treating; but this was denied, until they consented that no advantage would be taken of omissions, and that whatever should happen to be forgot, might not be excluded. The deputies set the example, and gave in a list of their propositions, contained in twenty-eight distinct articles. They were followed by a similar catalogue exhibited by the ambassadors in seven articles, the principal of which turned upon religion; but they were expressed a pressed so equivocally, and arranged with so little method, as afforded a large field for cavilling. With this writing they presented a request, that the states would draw out a scheme of the European and Indian commerce, which they would transmit to the courts of Brussels and Madrid, provided it contained nothing which appeared too severe to the catholic king and the archduke. The proposal was accepted, the writing prepared, and a demand made, that both parties should reciprocally deposit a certain sum in Spain and Holland, as security for the performance of their engagements. The articles were first examined at the congress, and debated with much warmth. Ricardot in particular was so affected with the insolence of the deputies, that he shed tears, and lamented the unhappy situation of Spain, which reduced a great monarchy to the necessity of temporizing with a set of b burghers and merchants. Spinola managed his temper with more address, and to his conduct it was owing that the congress had not broke up long before. Neyen was dispatched to Brabant and Spain, with the scheme of commerce, which now received considerable amendment; but still the bill was too harsh, and long rejected by the proud stomachs of the Spaniards, who could not make concessions with any grace, to those whom they used to command. These proposals met with a variety of obstructions at the court of Madrid, and Neyen's long stay rendered it necessary to prolong the armistice to the end of the year.

ABOUT this time the states-general received advice of negotiations carried on at the court of France, which almost determined them to break off the conferences precipitately.
c While Neyen continued at Madrid, don Pedro de Toledo was sent to Paris, to engage Henry in the interest of Spain, and thereby destroy the fruits of the whole negotiation at the Hague. Philip could not be prevailed on to acknowledge the freedom of the provinces, unless they previously renounced the commerce of the Indies; but finding that the French monarch was deaf to all his proposals, he concealed his sentiments, in hopes of obtaining his ends by dint of address and refined policy. At last, the ambassadors declared on the twentieth of August, that their final instructions respecting the three great points of religion, liberty, and commerce, were arrived: that his catholic majesty was resolved to acknowledge the freedom of the provinces, upon no other condition, than that they should re-establish the catholic religion, and renounce the India commerce. Upon this declaration they retired, leaving the deputies to deliberate upon an answer with the states-general, the council of state, prince Maurice, and William of Nassau. Having communicated the proposal to the foreign ambassadors at the Hague, it was resolved that the negotiation was at an end; and a manifesto was published on the twenty-third, in which, after enumerating all the transactions of the congress, the whole blame of the consequences that might ensue from a rupture of the treaty, was thrown upon Philip and the archduke. The manifesto was delivered to the Spanish ministers, who complained loudly of the manner in which they were treated. They then demanded an audience of the states-general, and obtained it on the twenty-seventh. Here they proposed a truce for a certain number of years; and the states-general accepted the offer, on condition, however, that the sovereignty d and freedom of the province should be acknowledged during and at the expiration of the truce. This exceeded the powers of the ambassadors; but they remitted the proposal to Brussels, and received for answer, that what the states demanded could only be granted on their renouncing the commerce of India, and establishing the catholic religion in all the provinces; that, however, the archduke had forwarded their propositions to the court of Spain, expected an answer in a few days, and hoped the ambassadors might in the mean while be permitted to reside at the Hague. In this manner the truce was spun out to the end of September.

IN the mean time prince Maurice, who never approved of the negotiation, apprehending that a truce at least would ensue, should the Spaniards relax in their conditions, sent e a circular letter to all the magistrates of the cities. This letter was dated the twenty-first of September, and tended to alienate the minds of the people from the truce in agitation. In the arguments urged on this occasion, it was easy to discern the politician, the patriot, and at the same time the aspiring prince. His reasoning was calculated to the good of his country. He strenuously opposed the restoration of popery, and asserted the sovereignty of the provinces; but he at the same time artfully enflamed the minds of the people, and rendered them averse to peace, possibly with a view to his own interest. Certain it is, that the truce proposed was necessary to both parties, and would have proved beneficial, could it be obtained on equitable conditions. Maurice, however, seemed averse to it upon any terms; and it was perhaps more the interest of the Spaniards to have concluded a perpetual f treaty of peace.

ON the twenty-fourth of September, the ambassadors gave notice to the states, that they were now impowered to treat with the provinces as a free republic, and conclude a truce
MOD. HIST. VOL. XI. 6 G for

for seven years, during which, both parties should freely trade to each other's dominions in Europe, retain what they now possessed, and cease from all acts of hostility. They acknowledged, however, that the archduke was not authorised by the catholic king to grant these conditions; but that he hoped to get them ratified. The proposal was communicated through the channel of the French, English, and Brandenburg ambassadors; but it was rejected, unless the sovereignty of the states was absolutely acknowledged without restriction, and free leave granted to trade to the Indies. As such concessions exceeded the powers of Spinola and his colleagues, the conferences broke up, and the ambassadors took their leave, their time being expired. At parting, Ricardot assured the states, that the archduke had acted with the utmost sincerity throughout the negotiation; he blamed their obstinacy, exhorted the states to reflect seriously on the conditions they rejected, which they might probably hereafter not be able to obtain by intreaty and solicitations; and he concluded with saying, that they must be responsible for all the consequent effusion of christian blood, should the war be resumed. The ambassador was answered by the pensioner Barneveldt, who instanced, as a proof of the sincerity of the states-general, their refusal to enter upon the conferences, until their sovereignty was acknowledged. He concluded with retorting the allegation, that they would be responsible for the future effusion of blood, since the severity of the Spanish councils first kindled the war. The tyranny of Philip II. furnished the fuel, and the pride and inflexibility of Philip III. prevented its being extinguished, at a time when all the combustible materials were already consumed<sup>a</sup>.

The negotiation of peace broke off.

Soon after the departure of the ambassadors, it was discovered that Ricardot had either forgot or designedly left at his lodgings, the original instructions given to the Spanish ministers. This the states published, with a long comment in their own vindication, though posterity have justly construed the instructions to their prejudice. In every line the archduke's pacific intentions were apparent, and nothing but the fastidious and insolent demands of the states, their cavilling humour, and punctilious conduct, would have prevented the establishment of a truce, on the same terms it was afterwards obtained. All the foreign ministers would seem to be of this opinion. They concurred in pressing the states at least to conclude a truce; and the president Jeannin, in particular, enforced his advice with a variety of arguments. When the states objected that no dependence could be placed in the promises of the Spaniards, who had so often violated their engagements, he replied, that his master, the king of France, would guarantee the treaty, attack the violators with all his forces, and support with all his might that prudence and perseverance which enabled an oppressed people to treat with their sovereign on the footing of a free republic.

The republic divided into parties.

It has already been frequently intimated that the provinces were divided into two factions, one of which totally rejected the truce, and every proposal that did not immediately contribute to the establishment of a solid and lasting peace. At the head of this party was prince Maurice; whose interest and aspiring views made him, it is alledged, prefer war to the most advantageous terms of accommodation. It was, however, dangerous to profess himself an enemy to the tranquility of his country; he therefore chose the safer method of obtaining his ends, by arguing against the consequences of the truce, sensible that Spain and the archduke were not yet sufficiently humbled to grant peace on the terms the states would demand. Barneveldt was the oracle of the other faction; he entered warmly into the opinion of the French ambassador, and thought a truce ought not to be rejected, because perpetual peace could not be obtained; it would, at least, afford the provinces a breathing, to enable them to renew the war with redoubled vigour. He penetrated into all Maurice's views, and represented in the strongest colours the danger of servitude to a family, whose patriotism was only a cloak to their ambition. Libels and pasquinades, calculated to blow up the sparks of civil dissension, were every day published; nor did the Orange party scruple to tax the kings of France and England with selfish views, in recommending a truce which could not be rigidly observed; which in consequence would involve the provinces in numberless calamities, and prove beneficial to the commerce of France and England. A number of anonymous letters, thereby threatening an attempt on his life, were received by Barneveldt, all of which he laid before the states, saying, that though he despised the anger of the great, and the resentment of the deluded vulgar, while he was conscious of faithfully performing the duty he owed to his country; yet he could wish to resign an employment which he found rendered him odious. With these words he quitted the assembly, and was soon followed by deputies, sent to exhort him not to abandon the state at this critical juncture, when his ability and integrity were most wanted. Upon resuming the functions of pensionary, he represented in the most lively terms the advantages deducible from the succours offered by the two kings, and the regard which ought to be shewn to their sentiments; he gave in an exact a calculation of the supplies necessary for the prosecution of the war; he refuted all the objections made to the truce; and by the weight of his influence, the spirit and strength of his arguments, brought over the province of Holland to the opinion of the five other provinces, which had declared in favour of the truce. Zealand alone, swayed by private motives, on account of the rich captures made during the war, and the influence of Maurice, remained deaf to all terms of accommodation. The dispute grew high, the Zealanders insisting that to conclude a truce without their consent would be a direct infraction of the union of Utrecht; and the others remonstrating upon the injustice of one province's giving law to all the others *.

In these disputes the year was spun out, without any progress made, either in the prosecution of the war, or of a temporary pacification. However, Barneveldt and the foreign ministers laboured with so much zeal and assiduity, that they prevailed on the archduke to prolong the armistice, and send deputies to confer with the French and English ambassadors at Antwerp. Here it was the great point was gained, of again renewing the conferences with the states-general of the United Provinces, then assembled at Bergen-op-zoom. In the end, the conferences were removed to the Hague; and, after subduing infinite obstructions, a truce for twelve years was concluded on the ninth of April, ratified on the fourteenth, then published in all the towns of the Netherlands, and joyfully received by the majority of the people, especially of the Spanish provinces. In the first article of the treaty, the archduke, in his own, and the king of Spain's name, acknowledged the United Provinces, renounced all claim to sovereignty over them, but in such general terms as would admit of altercation. In the second a truce for twelve years, by sea and land, through all the dominions of both parties, was concluded. By the third article the parties were to remain in possession of what they now held, without cession or exchange. In the fourth a general amnesty was stipulated, and full freedom of trade by sea and land to each others dominions granted. This necessarily implied a cessation of hostilities in the Indies; however, great debates afterwards arose upon this account. Spain observing the rapid progress of the Hollanders in the India trade, apprehended they would soon become too powerful in that quarter; and the Dutch were willing to maintain the advantage of their superiority. Both, for this reason, disputed the article; yet it could not be set aside without destroying the whole treaty, and the fruits of all their laboured conferences. The fifth article regulated the imports, and duties to be paid by the subjects of the archduke and the states, trading to each others dominions, which were to be on the same footing with those of other nations. The archduke used his utmost endeavours to have the duties at Lillo, on the Scheld, abolished, and the commerce of Antwerp restored to its former grandeur; but this was so diametrically opposite to the interest of the Hollanders, that it was impossible it should ever take place. The sixth and seventh articles likewise regarded commercial affairs; but it would be unnecessary to dwell on particulars; sufficient it is, that the truce was mutually beneficial, Spain being no longer in condition to support the war, and the Hollanders having obtained the end of all their desperate resistance and invincible perseverance in the cause of liberty. Philip of Nassau was of all men the greatest gainer by the truce; as, in consequence, he entered into possession of all his paternal estates in the Spanish Netherlands and Burgundy; while the states rewarded the faithful services of Maurice with a pension of twenty-five thousand florins, to be paid annually out of the public treasury, besides an appointment of sixty-thousand francs as governor-general. Pensions were likewise settled on the other princes of the house of Nassau: all were gratified in a manner that demonstrated the high sense the republic had of their merit, though they might possibly be disappointed in their great design of raising prince Maurice to sovereign authority. In this manner was a bloody, tedious war terminated, which had more than once almost totally extinguished every spark of freedom and the protestant religion in the Seven United Provinces †. The fortune of the states on this occasion admirably displays how courage, conduct, and perseverance, however baffled and disappointed, will, in the end, rise superior to misfortune, and triumph over every adversary.

Containing the religious disputes among the protestants of the United Provinces ; the treaty with the Moorish prince of Tetuan ; the disputes about the succession to the duchy of Cleves : in a word, all the civil and political transactions of the new republic, to the expiration of the truce in the year 1621.

SCARCE had the United Provinces tasted the sweets of liberty and peace, when religious disputes arose, to blight the felicity procured by obstinate valour and invincible resolution. James Arminius of Oudewater, in the province of Holland, first a minister of the gospel at Amsterdam, and afterwards at Leyden, gave birth to a new sect, called after his own name, whose principles were founded upon doctrines as old as the belief of a supreme being. The sect was, however, in his time first distinguished, and his disciples stigmatized as deserters from the followers of Calvin. They asserted free-agency ; they spoke ambiguously of God's prescience ; they deemed the doctrine of the Trinity not essential to salvation ; many of them affirmed that the scripture requires no adoration of the Holy Ghost ; and all, that Jesus is not equal to God the father : in a word, they regarded the creed of St. Albanasius as the unintelligible, unmeaning comment on an incomprehensible mystery. These tenets were adopted by great numbers of the learned in Holland, the other protestant provinces, and in Germany ; but they had not been publicly taught from the professorial chair before the elevation of Arminius to that office. Most divines who had received their education at Geneva, or in the Palatinate, brought with them from thence the doctrine of predestination ; a violent contest arose between the parties ; synods and religious conferences were held in divers places ; the states interposed, and the chief persons of the republic espoused either Arminius or Gomarus, who were the leaders of these factions ; for such in reality they ought to be esteemed. Religion was only the pretext, policy was the source of those impure and bitter invectives poured out on both sides. The prince of Orange and Barneveldt seized this opportunity of venting their mutual animosity, which now was greatly augmented by the credit which the pensioner acquired from accomplishing the truce with the archduke, in despite of all the endeavours of the house of Nassau. In all controversies it is difficult to adhere to the original point in dispute ; it is particularly so in religious contests, where probably both parties are reasoning upon what exceeds the limits of their understanding. The smallest deviation leads into a greater, and at last the disputants end in something which has not the smallest relation to the first subject of debate. Thus it was that a quarrel among obscure divines, about points which neither could determine, became the bone of contention among the leading personages in the provinces, and laid the first conception of a humour that has ever since remained lurking in the constitution of the state, breaking out upon all revolutions, and laying the foundation of that disunion and discord, which will probably terminate one day in the total subversion of the republic. It would be impossible to exhibit a just idea of these disputes, without running into theological disquisitions, equally fruitless to a reader, and inconsistent with historical narration. Sufficient it is, that neither party was convinced, though the necessities of the state made them for some time silent ; and that the Arminians, though least numerous, were, however, extremely formidable, on account of the weight, influence, and ability of their leaders<sup>a</sup>.

Treaty with the emperor of Morocco.

WITH respect to civil affairs, the object of greatest consequence was, to push with all imaginable vigour the advantage which the provinces in general might deduce from this interval of tranquillity ; for, during the war, trade was altogether confined to Holland and Zealand. With this view the states ordered that one hundred and fifty Moors, taken on board Spanish captures, should be returned without ransom, and presented to the emperor of Morocco, in consideration of the civilities shewn by that prince to Hemskirk's fleet some years before ; and to obtain certain commercial privileges in his dominions. Two ships of war were accordingly sent under captain Hermansen to the coasts of Africa, having on board the Moorish prisoners, and a present of some black cattle from prince Maurice to the emperor. The presents were well received ; all the immunities required, granted ; and a proposition made of declaring war jointly against the king of Spain, which the Dutch civilly declined, urging in excuse the late truce. This proposal was made by an alcaide, who returned with the fleet to Holland. The Moorish envoy, perceiving the states were averse to war, offered to take part of their fleet into pay ; but this was likewise refused, and, to qualify his disappointment, the ambassador was loaded with presents, and dismissed with the strongest protestations of respect and veneration for his master.

THE next year was ushered in by an event which had almost frustrated the intention of the late treaty with Spain and the archduke, and involved in a fresh war all the provinces of the Netherlands. Prince John William duke of Cleves and Juliers, dying without issue-male, his dominions devolved upon his sisters, in whose right the elector of Brandenburgh, and duke of Newburgh, demanded the succession. Several other competitors likewise appeared; but these were the chief. The elector applied to the French king and the Dutch, to support his pretensions; the duke of Newburgh to the king of Spain and the archduke. At first the contention lay between the house of Saxony on the one side; and the houses of Brandenburgh and Newburgh on the other. Divers conferences were held to adjust the claims of the candidates amicably, but they proved fruitless. The archduke, newly respiring after a tedious war, had no inclination to involve himself in fresh disputes, in which he was properly no party; but it was his interest to provide that the Dutch should take no advantage of his pacific inclinations, and, under pretence of assisting the elector of Brandenburgh, seize upon those places in the disputed territory which lay most convenient to the provinces. The emperor claimed the right of deciding the dispute, but Henry IV. did not chuse that the house of Austria should have any accession of dominion or power. However, the former adjudged the duchies, under certain limitations, to the house of Saxony; and the assassination of Henry, by Ravaillac, happened before that monarch had taken any measures to oppose the imperial verdict. Still the court of France espoused the princes, and encouraged the states general to undertake the siege of Juliers, to which they were solicited by the elector of Brandenburgh. Dutch writers alledge, that the states determined upon this measure with reluctance, apprehending it might be deemed an infraction of the truce; but they were compelled to it by Maurice, whose warlike, ambitious mind eagerly sought a rupture, or at least a war, in which his talents shone with such lustre. Accordingly, with fourteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, he traversed Spanish Guelderland without offering the smallest violence to the inhabitants, the subjects of the archduke; and sat down before Juliers. After a vigorous defence, the city capitulated by the second day of September, and was garrisoned by Dutch forces, under the pretext it should be sequestered in the hands of the states until the dispute might be finally decided. Albert regarded this transaction as an infraction of the truce. He perceived that the states, actuated by ambition, relied too much on his pacific intentions. He therefore determined to venture the whole state of Flanders rather than suffer such an encroachment on right, and addition to the power and dominion of rebel provinces, not yet declared free, but treated with as free and sovereign; a middle distinction made in the late treaty, by way of salvo to the pride of the court of Spain. He first demanded solemn restitution of the town of Juliers, in the name of the duke of Newburgh; but obtaining only shuffling dilatory answers, an army was assembled under Spinola. As the states had strongly garrisoned their late acquisition, they were under no apprehensions about the destination of this army, not doubting but it was intended against Juliers; in which the archduke would find himself disappointed. The masterly conduct, however, of Spinola threw the provinces into the utmost consternation. After approaching within sight of Juliers, he wheeled round suddenly, marched to Wesel, and took it before the Dutch army could come to its relief. This town was strong by nature and art; it was claimed by the duke of Brandenburgh, as a dependency on the duchy of Cleves, but was held by the inhabitants under the protection of the states general. Not less astonished than awed by the success of a bold attempt, which opened a way to the invasion of the provinces, the Dutch applied to the mediation of England and France, and at last accommodated matters with the archduke by more abject concessions than they had ever before made in their most adverse circumstances. By this one spirited stroke, Albert regained the reputation lost from the terms granted in the late treaty, and the states were justly chastised and mortified for that insolent carriage shewn towards sovereign princes, and crowned heads, once their masters<sup>b</sup>.

The truce broke by the death of the duke of Cleves.

The archduke and republic again reconciled.

The religious disputes again renewed.

THE appearance of a rupture with the archduke cooled for a while the ardor of faction and religious controversy in the United Provinces. No sooner was the truce re-established, than the civil divisions broke out with redoubled strength and vehemence. The Gomarists renewed their persecution of the Arminian dissenters; they were pushed on by the house of Orange, sometimes protected by the states, and opposed chiefly by Barneveldt, Grotius, Vossius, the learned in general, and the magistrates of cities in which their influence prevailed. Arminius, on his first elevation to the professorship, behaved with the utmost moderation; he scrupulously avoided giving offence, but was, in course of lecturing, forced to advance opinions which roused the indignation of the Gomarists, who watched the opportunity of resuming the disputes. His doctrines were opposed, and he defended them with great temper and ability. The best pens in Holland, or indeed in Europe, were employed in his vindication. Grotius and Vossius both embarked deeply in the cause; and the Leyden professor became the head of a faction of which he was but an inconsiderable member. In some towns the Arminian clergy were imprisoned or expelled, in others the Gomarists. Synods met in all the provinces, public disputations were maintained, and both parties rather confirmed in their opinions than convinced of their errors. The suspension of the clergy naturally led to an enquiry into the rights and powers of the magistrates, this into the prerogatives of the lieutenants or stadtholders of the several provinces, and that into the sovereign right of the provincial states and states general. A question purely speculative became now a matter of the utmost consequence to liberty. The Arminians were represented as secret friends to Spain, and enemies to the privileges of their country; the people were inflamed, prince Maurice was raised to a greater height of popularity than he ever before obtained, and being at the head of the army, and supported by the multitude, he ventured upon some bold and dangerous alterations in the civil government; changing the magistrates of cities at pleasure, so as to obtain a majority in the provincial states, and consequently in the states general. The first contested election of magistrates was at Lewarde in Friesland, where the magistrates, legally chosen, were deposed, and supplanted by others nominated by the populace. The next was at Utrecht, where the divisions ran high in proportion to the number of the people. The burgomasters were disliked, and complaints were made of their assuming an authority inconsistent with the laws; promises of speedy redress were given; but the populace wanted more. They demanded the authority, and by a violent election of burgomasters usurped the right of civil government. So general was this tumult, that even the Roman catholics took up arms, and insisted upon the free exercise of their religion, though expressly prohibited by the union of Utrecht, in which all other opinions besides are licensed. As the violence of faction ran to a dangerous height, prince Maurice, attended by deputies from the states general, repaired to Utrecht, in order to restore the tranquillity of the city; but, instead of meeting with the respect his quality, his office, and his merit, demanded, he was grossly insulted, and forced to retire precipitately. This determined the states general to assemble at Woerde, and to summon the provincial states of Utrecht and prince Maurice before them. After long deliberation, no remedies adequate to the disease, could be found; the states of Utrecht were therefore dismissed, with a serious exhortation to apply themselves vigorously to the suppression of riots and tumults, which might probably terminate in anarchy, and the destruction of all government, unless seasonably prevented. It is difficult to find the cause of the commotions in Utrecht; they would seem to be a consequence of the original dispute between Arminius and Gomarus; but then the parties, in the heat and zeal of controversy, had changed opinions; and Maurice was insulted by the very populace by whom he was adored.

A. D. 1612.
Commutations at Utrecht.

WHEN the provincial states of Utrecht returned, they reported the censures passed on their conduct by the states general; which so enraged the populace, that, flying to arms, they committed a thousand disorders, rioted about, and raised such tumults as the new magistrates could not appease. Upon this the burghers were ordered to send four deputies to attend the states at the Hague, with the submission of the inhabitants of Utrecht. It was added, that if they preferred the states should sit rather at Utrecht than the Hague, their inclination should be gratified, provided the garrison was reinforced with four more companies of soldiers, to suppress disorders, and protect the assembly against insults. All these admonitions and concessions produced no effect. The Utrechters remained obstinate, and the states talked of laying siege to the city. Previous, however, to violent measures, they published a circular letter, addressed to all the provincial states of the union, acquainting them of the transactions at Utrecht, and requiring their advice and assistance. Meantime a body of forces had orders to file off towards Utrecht. At first the magistrates laughed at the motion of the army; they imagined the states would never push matters to extremities; but they no sooner beheld the city almost completely invested, than they changed their tone, and besought the magistrates of Amsterdam to interpose as mediators. In consequence, a kind of reconciliation was effected, and the Utrechters were punished, by deposing the new magistrates, and restoring those who had been expelled by the people. Thus ended, without effusion of blood, a tumult which might have endangered the safety of the commonwealth, had not the government acted with great spirit and resolution.

WITH respect to the clergy, their disputes became purely political. It was debated, How far the sovereign authority might interpose in ecclesiastical affairs? Whether the clergy might not, in conscience, be under the necessity of preaching doctrines contrary to the legislative power? Whether the sovereign authority has power to assemble the clergy, and to chuse the members of the assembly? Whether the ecclesiastical synods are subject to the sovereign power? and, admitting they are, Whether by that means the sovereign is not made arbitrary over the consciences of the subject? The parties came to be distinguished by the appellations of Remonstrants; and Contra-Remonstrants. Libels, pasquinades, and violent invectives, mutually enflamed their spirits. At Utrecht factions were renewed; and it was visible the people only watched an opportunity to subvert the government, and restore their own favourites to the magistracy. This induced the states general to invest the council of state with authority to exact a fresh oath of fidelity from the magistrates, burghers, and other inhabitants. The populace were now exasperated to the highest pitch. They knew themselves guilty of sedition; by the oath required they became guilty of perjury. They formed the project of gaining possession of the garrison commanded by the chevalier Ogle, appointed to that trust by prince Ernest of Nassau: Canter and Helsdingen; the persons raised to the magistracy in the late tumults, entered into the conspiracy; and all bound themselves by an oath to secrecy and fidelity to their engagements. By some means, however, their design transpired; some of the conspirators were seized, put to the torture, and an ample discovery obtained. The two chiefs were banished for life, and forbid, at the peril of their lives, ever setting foot in the United Provinces. Several of the conspirators were condemned to death; but afterwards reprieved, and pardoned.

As the controversy could never be decided by arguments; where each party built upon the authority of the sacred writings, the contra-remonstrants solicited the states general for a national synod to sit under the direction of the states; they granted the request, as the most probable method of terminating disputes; but were opposed by the provincial states of Holland and Utrecht. Thus, not only the ecclesiastical, but the civil government was divided. Barneveldt saw the ruin that impended, and he endeavoured to divert it, by proposing certain ecclesiastical laws to be confirmed by the states. This scheme was projected several years before, but never carried into execution. It was now approved by a variety of members of the states of Holland, but rejected by others, until the religious controversy should be first decided. Whatever was done before this event; would, it was urged, be premature, and the laws would have the approbation only of one party. Barneveldt, however, meant to silence all disputation by the force of laws; but this was contrary to the interest and views of the Orange faction, who made a handle of the proposal, to the prejudice of that great statesman and patriot. He was accused of dangerous designs upon religion; notwithstanding which he carried his point in the province of Utrecht, and was in a fair way of subduing the rage of faction<sup>a</sup>. At Rotterdam matters went otherwise. One Gisellius, a violent contra-remonstrant, stirred up the people by his seditious harangues. He preached that it was unlawful to communicate with the remonstrants; he was admonished to moderation by the magistrates, but in vain. He was exhorted to hold a conference with his opponents, and to compromise their differences amicably, but to no purpose; he refused to appear, and continued his inflammatory harangues from the pulpit. The magistrates published a proclamation, declaring, that neither they nor the remonstrants were the authors of those factions which disturbed the public tranquillity, and forbidding the people to credit the calumnies published against the clergy. At last it became necessary to suspend Gisellius. He was accordingly forbid to preach within the jurisdiction of Rotterdam. This was called persecution, the notion of which is attended with the worst consequences in a free government. His partizans caballed in private, became dangerous, and obliged the magistrates to order Gisellius immediately to quit the city. He refused to obey, but was compelled, and ignominiously led through the public streets by a bailiff. The Orange party made an excellent handle of this circumstance. They exclaimed, that liberty was at an end; that the magistrates usurped a power altogether unconstitutional; and asserted, that the remonstrants were in the interest of the Jesuits, and conspiring again to subjugate their country to the Spanish tyranny. However absurd the accusation might appear to all judicious persons, it was so artfully propagated as to gain credit. Maurier, a French writer of credit, then resident in Holland, relates, that so convinced was the princess dowager of Orange of the ambitious designs entertained by prince Maurice, that she seriously remonstrated with him upon the subject. He even alledges, that the prince endeavoured to prevail on her to gain Barneveldt to his purposes, assured that the consent of this honest patriot would easily pave the way to sovereignty. He further relates, that the princess closeted Barneveldt, used all her influence with him, and received for answer, that nothing could be more consonant to his wishes than the glory and elevation of the house of Orange, could this be obtained consistently with the liberty of his country. Barneveldt then expatiated upon the hazard of the project, which must necessarily terminate in the ruin of the family, and possibly of the commonwealth. In a word, he spoke with so much strength, energy, and pathos, that he entirely overcame the princess, converted her to his own opinion, made her a rigid stickler for liberty, and persuaded her to exert all her influence to induce Maurice to lay aside his purpose, and heal up those divisions in church and state, which could never produce any other effect than the destruction of all parties <sup>a</sup>.

MAURICE, notwithstanding, affected to abstract himself entirely from the ecclesiastical disputes. When Barneveldt told him, that faction ran so high that the states of Holland must have recourse to him to assist their authority, he pretended astonishment, and declared his aversion to meddle in these matters. However, Barneveldt had too much discernment not to fathom his private sentiments; which the prince indeed inadvertently hinted in the conversation about the remonstrants. The pensioner proposed, that the states general should be moved to grant a general toleration, with respect to the disputed points; and that the clergy of each side, who were suspended, should be restored to their functions. To this proposition the prince, in appearance, consented; and it was accordingly decreed by the states, assembled at the Hague, in the year 1616, that every violation of such general toleration as contributed to the public tranquillity, should be punished in the most effectual manner by the civil and ecclesiastical powers. It was further decreed, that if any fresh disputes should arise upon points hitherto uncontroverted, they should be decided by a majority in the provincial or national synods. These resolutions were, however, opposed by the deputies of the cities; viz. Rotterdam, the Brille, the Hague, Benthuysen, and a variety of towns, where the people declared, they could not, with a safe conscience, hear doctrines openly preached, which must give offence to every sincere christian. It was not considered, that Jews, Armenians, and Mohammedans, were permitted the free exercise of their several religions in Holland. Still, however, the states pursued their first resolution, though they relaxed a little in favour of the deputies, on condition they would not suffer persons within their jurisdiction, who embraced the toleration, to be oppressed. In the end, the deputies were dismissed, with an exhortation to examine the affair coolly and deliberately, and to assist with all their influence in restoring public tranquillity, which could be no great difficulty, considering that both parties were of the same religion, had the same form of worship, the same public ceremonies, the same manner of exposing vice and cherishing virtue, and differed only in a few points of little consequence to salvation, or indeed to society.

*Barneveldt
proposes restraining the liberty of the press.*

THE excellent design of the states was, however, considerably obstructed by the pride and conceit of the theologians, who would not admit that any part of their system was capable of amendment; and by the secret endeavours of the Orange faction to lessen the influence, and blait the character of Barneveldt, as well as to diminish the authority of the provincial states of Holland. This purpose could not be accomplished but under the mask of liberty and religion, which ever work powerfully on the minds of the vulgar, who least understand them or enjoy their benefit. The nobles and magistrates of Holland were attacked in public writings; and Barneveldt, in particular, after forty years faithful service, was libelled as a traitor to his country. He had frequently represented this abuse of liberty to the states; but the point was delicate: laying any restraint on the press would enflame the minds of the people, and afford the fairest opportunity of declaiming against the government, to the fomenters of sedition. Barneveldt now gave in a draught of his plan for suppressing libels and inflammatory publications; but it was strongly opposed by the magistrates of Amsterdam, notwithstanding their conduct was the subject of the keenest satires and pasquinades which had yet appeared. They gave no reason for their opposition, only that they did not approve of renewing laws which had been repealed after mature deliberation. Nevertheless, in the following year, Barneveldt so far prevailed, that the ordonnance was published, though it was never put in force, or received by a variety of other towns <sup>f</sup>.

SUCH was the state of parties, that the remonstrants were obliged to meet privately in some towns, and the contra-remonstrants in others. Wherever the faction happened to

- a be most powerful, they seized on the churches, and excluded their opponents. At Amsterdam the remonstrants were weakest; but hearing that the states had in other cities granted the use of churches to the contra-remonstrants, upon their petitioning, they wrote to Leyden for a minister of their sect to preach the gospel in Amsterdam. One Rembert Bischoep was sent; and, on his arrival, the reformists met in a private house, to hear divine service, and perform their devotions. Finding the place too small for their numbers, they hired a large warehouse belonging to a merchant; their opponents complained to the magistrates of their illegal assemblies; but obtaining no redress, they assembled in a tumultuous manner, during public worship, broke the windows, forced the doors, abused the minister, and threatened the lives of the audience. The remonstrants now, in their turn, complained to the magistrates, and demanded justice and protection; but they were answered, that the best method to secure themselves would be to avoid such meetings as incurred the resentment of their fellow-citizens. What encouraged the populace in their tumults, and made the magistrates remiss in the discharge of their duty, was, that prince Maurice had, about this time, declared in favour of the contra-remonstrants, and desired that a clergyman of their principles might be sent to preach in the French chapel at the Hague. The remonstrants were now afraid to assemble; they petitioned the magistrates for the same protection granted to other sects; they pleaded the toleration-edict, but obtained no satisfactory answer, though the magistrates were too cautious absolutely to deny their petition. At last they had recourse to the states; but the apprehension of involving themselves in disputes with the magistrates, obliged the states to shift off the matter, by recommending the petitioners to the burgomasters of Amsterdam.

Prince Maurice declares himself head of a party.

- Not only the open declaration of prince Maurice, but the conduct of Dudley Carleton, the British ambassador, encouraged the contra-remonstrants to proceed in a higher strain. They now threw off all respect for the states of Holland, and Barneveldt was grossly insulted in the assembly, by a person greatly his inferior in birth, capacity, influence, and integrity. Every thing contributed to the public confusion, and all moderate persons dreaded that anarchy and the dissolution of the government must ensue. The states were reduced to the necessity of imploring the prince's protection, which he artfully withheld, under various pretexts. He even issued several orders to prevent the troops from assisting the magistrates in quelling tumults and suppressing seditions. This induced Barneveldt to labour diligently in keeping the states assembled, as the only means of preserving the constitution. At last the magistrates of the several towns, seeing they could expect no assistance from the military power to enforce the laws, resolved to augment the garrisons and guards of their own authority, agreeable to the original laws of the country, as Grotius demonstrates<sup>8</sup>. They communicated their intention to the prince; he was displeased, alledging it was an encroachment upon the prerogative of the governor of the province. Upon this pretence he quitted the Hague in the night, and set out for the Brille, where he introduced two companies of soldiers in despite of all the remonstrances of the magistrates. He had not acquainted the council of state with his resolution, which gave great offence to that assembly, as it was an established custom with the governors to take their leave in form. Maurice, however, disregarded their sentiments; he had now thrown off the masque, and resolution was necessary to obtain a majority in the states, by changing the magistrates in the cities.

He refuses to assist the states of Holland.

Seizes on Brille, &c.

- ADVICE of the transaction at Brille soon arrived at Leyden; and the magistrates, apprehending they might be favoured with a similar visit, assembled the chief burghers, and formed the resolution, that, in case the prince should approach the city, a deputation should meet him, to request he would offer no violence to their privileges, by forcing armed troops into the city. The same resolution was taken by the magistrates of Haerlem, Tergau, and Woerde; but Maurice had by this time gained possession of Delft and Scheidam. Thence he sent circular letters to the cities of the province of Holland, justifying his conduct; but they were so ill received by the magistrates in general, that he was, more than ever, convinced he could never effect his purposes while Barneveldt's interest was so considerable; nor could this be diminished but by obtaining a majority in the states, by placing his own creatures in the public offices of the cities. However, before he made an attempt on the cities of the province of Holland, he made trial of his authority at Nimeguen, where, during the war, he retained the power of changing the magistrates at pleasure. Here he deposed three of the chief magistrates, who espoused Barneveldt, and favoured the remonstrants. The disgraced magistrates threw themselves under the protection of the states of Holland, and implored their assistance. Their request was granted, and the states immediately wrote to the states of Guelderland; but the city of Amsterdam, and some other places, interposed, and refused to suffer the letter to pass in the name of the states of Holland, because their deputies had opposed the contents<sup>b</sup>.

Guelderland.*

AFTER this transaction Maurice went to the states of Guelderland, informed them of what he had done at Nimeguen, and received their thanks and applause. Here his influence carried every thing; he exhorted the states to assist him in supporting the authority of the states general against the encroachments of the provincial states, and curbing the insolence of the city-magistrates, who had the presumption to raise troops, and act in a military capacity, in defiance of the laws, and to the destruction of all liberty. Accordingly, the states of Guelderland charged their deputies to the states general, to represent the prince's resolution to support their authority; but it appears that neither Maurice, nor the states, entertained a just idea of the nature of the government, or understood the laws of their country. The power assumed, in quality of governor, was by no means consistent with the liberty of the cities, which, for time immemorial, had enjoyed the right of nominating their own magistrates, and levying guards for their defence; the deprivation of these privileges could not therefore but excite a ferment, and raise suspicions in the breast of every friend of liberty and his country. As to Barneveldt, he was so much affected with the public disturbances, so anxious and solicitous about the fate of the republic, and so diligent in opposing the ambitious purposes of prince Maurice, that he was seized with a fever, which had almost deprived Holland of her most faithful and able minister. On his return to the states, perceiving he could not stem the torrent, and that the prince would one day reek his whole vengeance upon his head, he desired leave to resign the office of pensionary, and retire into private life, where he might at least freely deplore the unhappy fate of a country, that, after foiling the whole power of the Spanish monarchy to enslave her, was now on the eve of falling a prey to civil faction, and the ambition of her own children.

A. D. 1614.

THE great point now in debate was, whether a national synod should be held? Maurice attended the states at Overyssel, and there strongly recommended a measure which alone, he said, could terminate the disputes of the clergy: his speech, however, was regarded as a snare; he now appeared in a military capacity, in which it is allowable to ruin your enemy either by stratagem or open force. Of this the deputies of Haerlem spoke freely, at the next assembly of the states of Holland. They were the first who ventured to declare their suspicions, and their resolution to support the states against all enemies. To this effect they delivered a memorial to the states of Holland, to which their deputies demanded an immediate answer. The only point about which any difficulty occurred, was, the adjusting the contingents for supporting the expence of the government for the current year. Haarlem demanded that all the cities in arrear should make up their accounts before demands were made on those who had already advanced their proportions. At length those new disputes were wholly terminated by the prudence, the equity, and ability of Barneveldt. Something was likewise due to the spirit and good sense of Maurier, the French ambassador, who, by order of the king, demanded an audience. Among a variety of other topics, Maurier told the states, that, in his opinion, there remained only three methods of re-establishing the public tranquillity of the provinces; either open force, a general decision of their differences, or a compromise, in which both sides must relax. As to the first, no man, he urged, of understanding and honesty would recommend it; the second was attended with a thousand difficulties, which must arise in course of debate, where both sides were too much heated and enflamed to reason dispassionately; the last, in his opinion, was the only probable measure: a general toleration, until some better expedient could be found, would in the mean time disarm faction, and frustrate the schemes of those men whose ambition would be gratified at the price of public felicity and liberty.

THOUGH the disputes in the states of Holland yielded to the remedies applied by Barneveldt and Maurier, it was otherwise with the provinces in general. Maurice remained firm in his sentiments, was too powerful to be openly charged, and too artful to disclose his purposes. He secured the English minister in his interest, and, with all the contra-monstrants, demanded a national synod, as the only effectual application to a disease which must soon destroy the constitution. Upon Barneveldt's opposing this measure, libels, more bitter than any of the former, were every day published; and that great man was forced to have recourse to the justification of a conduct which merited the highest applause and deepest gratitude from his country. He published a remonstrance, in which he recited the a particulars of his birth, services, and education; the cause of the present disorders, and the only means which appeared to him adequate to the removal of that malignity which affected the whole mass of humours. Corrosive applications, he said, were unadvisable; they irritated and enflamed the habit, without answering any of the indications, or touching the seat of the disease: such were the infamous libels, propagated to blight the fairest characters, and ruin those persons in the opinion of the people, who alone were capable of saving the commonwealth. He desired it might be considered, that the excessive malice and rancour contained in those writings could not be altogether levelled against him; they must have a deeper design; that of destroying the other faithful servants of the public, overthrowing the rights and privileges of the cities in particular, of the country in general, and annihilating the very shadow of liberty, and a republican government. The virulence, the calumny, and bare-faced falshood of the writers, evidently demonstrated by what religion they were animated. They did not even endeavour to conceal their sentiments, respecting the establishment, and made no scruple of avowing the violation offered to the liberties of certain cities, under pretence there was a necessity to use compulsion in choosing the magistrates. Were their professions of zeal for religion, and their country, sincere, they might have pursued methods more honourable, and consistent with the true spirit of devotion and patriotism; but it was much easier to propagate calumnies, than to prove facts; bold assertions were sufficient evidence to the vulgar; and, provided their passions were influenced, it was not necessary to convince their judgment. He concluded with again recommending christian toleration to all who remained attached to the reformed religion, and disputed only about speculative points unessential to religion. He laid before the states, an account of the public expence, besought them to contribute unanimously to the supplies wanted for the ensuing year; and then addressing himself to the deputies of certain provinces in arrear for their contingents, exhorted them to use their utmost efforts with their constituents, to remove every obstruction to the peace, and restore the unanimity and felicity of the commonwealth<sup>a</sup>. A. D. 1615?

AN air of simplicity and candour, of good sense, and public zeal, of deep penetration, profound judgment, and extensive knowledge, powerfully recommended this performance to every sincere patriot: it was, however, attacked with all possible marks of inveterate rancour, the author was loaded with abuse and obloquy, and even the states attacked with a degree of malignancy, which could not pass unnoticed. Accordingly they offered a reward for the discovery of the author, or printer of the libel, and took Berneveldt under their immediate protection. They were supported by the towns of Haerlem, Leyden, Rotterdam, the Brille, Schoonhoven, &c. By these instructions were given to their deputies, to represent at the next assembly of the states, the necessity of taking measures for preserving the freedom of electors, and the liberties of the cities, promising to indemnify the deputies, and support them with all their strength and influence. In consequence the states remonstrated with prince Maurice, on the present situation of affairs; they represented, that certain persons, meaning himself and the Orange faction, had, contrary to justice, and the mutual obligations into which they had entered, violated the rights and privileges of the province of Holland; that his highness was perfectly well acquainted with the duties of a stadtholder, which chiefly consisted in maintaining the sovereignty of the province, and protecting the general liberties of the cities and inhabitants; that the states were bound, in consequence of their oath, to preserve the government, and of their respect for the house of Orange, to support the magistrates and people, in the due exertion of their authority, against all oppression. They exhorted him therefore to assist their laudable endeavours; to use his influence with the other provinces; to protect and aid the authority of the states in ecclesiastical matters; to join with them in the most efficacious methods of terminating those obstacles, which occasioned so much grief to every sincere patriot; to protect in particular the province of Holland, against the encroachments of the other provinces, excited by the machinations of certain turbulent divines; to desist from demanding a national synod, so contrary to the express meaning of the treaty of Utrecht; to prevent the courts of justice from receiving orders and directions, contrary to the resolutions of the states; to oblige them to confine themselves within the limits of their instructions, without encroaching on the privileges of the states or cities; not to oppose the antient right of the cities, to provide for their own security by levying guards and garrisons, when the forces of the state were insufficient; to oblige the officers of the army to obey the orders of the states; the council of war, and the magistrates of those towns where they should happen to be quartered. They likewise requested that his highness would not attempt to garrison towns, or interfere in the elections of magistrates, without the consent of the states and council of war; that he would bestow no military preferments, and neither augment nor diminish the garrisons, without previously acquainting them; and lastly, they earnestly intreated, that he would give no ear to evil counsellors, who sought to aggrandize themselves at the expence of their country, and only regarded the republic and the Orange family, as the means of their own elevation; but always rely on the advice of the states, who regarded his honour and interest of their country. This method his father, the late prince of Orange of glorious memory, always followed, and he constantly met with the warmest returns of gratitude; secured the liberties of the provinces, and raised them from an oppressed, insulted, despicable people, to a powerful, formidable, and free republic. The measures here pointed out, were no less necessary, they said, to the good of the public, than for the security of individuals. They could not by any means allow the smallest violation of their liberties, which they were obliged by oath to defend with their lives and fortunes. Better it was, they said, to die honourably, than to survive the loss of those blessings which their ancestors and themselves purchased at the exorbitant price of their blood. In a word, they asserted, that if they were properly assisted by the influence and power of the stadtholder, they would undertake speedily to subdue all controversies which affected the public tranquillity, close up those wounds, which by habit would become incurable, restore order, discipline, and regularity to the state, and prevail on all the provinces to contribute their several proportions, for the support of the government and common cause<sup>b</sup>.

HISTORY does not inform us what reply Maurice made to this remonstrance; we are only told that he was greatly shocked, but not moved to the purposes of the states, or convinced by their arguments. On the contrary, he assembled a great number of divines of his own faction, at Amsterdam, to assist the magistrates in drawing up reasons, to convince the states of the necessity of a national synod. This with another writing were presented, and clearly refuted by Grotius, who was too close, clear, and learned for his antagonists. It was at length proposed by the council of state, that three theologians from each province, should meet to adjust the conditions of a mutual toleration; and that if they could come to no agreement in the space of a month, the protestant clergy of Germany, France, England, and Switzerland, should be invited to their assistance. The proposal was approved by a majority of voices in the states; but Amsterdam, and the deputies of some other cities, opposed the resolution, and started a variety of objections. They were eager for a national synod, in which they were strongly supported by the provinces of Zealand, Groningen, Friseland, the Ommelans, and prince Maurice. This division among the cities, the powerful faction in favour of the contra-remonstrants, and the terror of Maurice in his military capacity, entirely destroyed the authority of the states of Holland, and rendered them incapable of prosecuting their moderate designs. Still, however, the council of state continued to urge their propositions, declaring null and void all that had been transacted in favour of a national synod. The council became now more than ever affected to the states, from the affront given them by the prince's departure to the Brille, without their consent or knowledge. The breach with the council of state considerably diminished the interest of Maurice; but it did not retard any of his projects. Backed by four provinces, besides a variety of cities and towns, he expected to surmount all opposition, and to effect such alterations in the constitution, as would infallibly raise him to the sovereignty of the provinces. He made no scruple of declaring that augmenting the garrisons, suppressing tumults by a military force, in a word, levying troops for the protection of the cities, without the authority of the governor, were in themselves acts of rebellion. The truth was, this guard was an obstruction to his design of changing the magistrates. The city of Utrecht insisted upon an exertion of this privilege handed down for time immemorial; but to avoid altercation, the magistrates first sent deputies to confer with the prince and the states-general. Barneveldt, in the name of the states of Holland, had an audience upon the same subject; but all his arguments could not prevail with Maurice, to suffer the garrisons to be under the direction of the magistrates, or to relinquish his project for retrenching the privileges of the cities<sup>c</sup>.

Soon after these conferences, Maurice repaired to Utrecht, attended by three deputies from the states-general. He was received with great marks of distinction, and the burghers were ordered to appear under arms. The magistrates and clergy waited upon him with compliments; and to the latter he said, that his intention was to restore the public tranquillity, by assembling a national synod, when all the controverted points should be canvassed, and their disputes finally decided. The reply was, that nothing could be expected from such an ecclesiastical court, where the parties were to sit in judgment, but a altercation, debate, and confusion; they therefore intreated him to lay aside the project, as dangerous, and at all events inadequate. Notwithstanding this repulse from the clergy, Maurice proposed to the provincial states of Utrecht, the disbanding of the new levied garrisons, and the convocation of a general synod. The proposition being communicated to the deputies of Holland, they waited on the prince, and exhorted him to contribute to the repose of the provinces, to support the privileges of the towns, and to protect the public tranquillity, taking not the smallest notice of their suspicions, that he was labouring to overthrow the constitution, and execute designs very opposite to their request. Maurice was more sincere: he plainly gave the deputies to understand, that their arrival in Utrecht was by no means agreeable. However, they held conferences with the states; after which

b the prince was told, that the guards raised by the magistrates were perfectly constitutional; and with respect to religion, that a national synod could not be convoked without detriment to the privileges of the provincial states, who were supreme within the jurisdiction of a province. After several fruitless negotiations, held upon the supposition the prince c did not venture upon any alterations without authority, at last his design was discovered, and the states, unable to oppose, determined to connive at his measures. His authority was great in the army, and his influence general over the minds of the people, who regarded him as the bulwark of liberty, and the hero who had rescued the provinces from the tyranny of the Spaniards. Before the blow was struck, the members of the states, with Ledemberg the secretary, quitted the city, and repaired with all diligence to the d Hague, there to expect the issue. Already Maurice had occupied the principal avenues leading to Utrecht, which he lined with soldiers. When he had assembled a sufficient force, he ordered the new levies raised by the magistrates to appear, upon which he released them from the oath taken, obliged them to lay down their arms, and disbanded the whole garrison. Grotius affirms, he had no authority for this proceeding, that the power was entirely in the provincial states, and that Maurice had considered their silence, their inability to appease him, and their abrupt departure, into an assent of his measures. Afterwards he went to the town-house, where he loudly complained of the injury done to his honour by those new levies, which deeply reflected on his integrity and patriotism. This was all the apology he offered for the grossest violation of the privileges of the city and province. He would pass himself for the protector of the church and state; and indeed his conduct was so specious, that it gained the affections of the vulgar, who strenuously pressed him to assume the sovereignty.

e Next he procured a few of the burghers to accuse the present magistrates of abusing their office. This was sufficient reason for deposing them, and substituting in their room the friends of Maurice, and the contra-remonstrants. Accordingly the prince proceeded to the election, or rather nomination of new magistrates, and to appoint a perpetual, instead of an annual council. All the remonstrants were turned out of their places. Ledemberg, secretary to the states, was forced to resign, and his office was immediately filled up by a creature of the house of Orange, after he had for thirty years served the f public with unblemished integrity. A variety of alterations were besides made in the other several departments of the state; even the clergy were deprived of their stipends, and forced to evacuate the city, and many of them the province of Utrecht. The contra-remonstrants, encouraged by these favourable changes, demanded the cathedral church then possessed by the remonstrants. Taurin the minister, refused to comply: but he was soon obliged to take sanctuary under the wing of Ledemberg, with whom he retired to the Hague. Upon the secretary's being arrested a few days afterwards, Taurin escaped to Antwerp, to avoid the same fate <sup>a</sup>.

g ABOUT this time, by order of his master the French king, Maurier the French ambassador demanded an audience of the states-general. He represented in lively colours, the approaching dissolution of the government, owing to the violence of faction, at a time when the expiration of the truce with Spain ought to make every part of the state unanimous. He threw out some reflections on the violence offered to the liberties of the cities, and said, that the provinces had wantonly lavished seas of blood, in resisting the tyranny of the house of Austria, if they were now to be enslaved by a faction of their own subjects. He recommended harmony in church and state, and exhorted the states-general to exert with vigour the power lodged in their hands by the constitution. The states, conscious of their inability, but ashamed to acknowledge their weakness, seemed embarrassed for an answer. Having no other reply, they thanked the king, told the ambassador the danger was not so great as he apprehended, and that they would take the most effectual measures to restore peace, concord, and regularity.

A. D. 1618.

PRINCE Maurice having terminated matters to his wish at Utrecht, set out for the Hague, where he made report of the late transaction, and received the thanks of the deputies of the four provinces in his interest. The deputies of Holland were likewise exhorted to prevail on the cities to disband the new levied guards; but it was obvious from their answer, that they looked upon the prince's conduct as an infraction of the privileges of the provinces. They perceived that the least tumult would furnish a pretext for similar trespasses in the constitution, and the means of procuring a majority in the states-general, by rendering himself absolute in the cities, and of consequence in the provincial states. They concluded with saying, they would report the prince's request to their constituents, as the matter was of too great importance for them to determine of their own authority. They demanded, that, in the mean time, the cities of Holland might be left in the full exertion of their privileges; but they were served in a similar manner with those of Utrecht; and even the cities in the prince's interest were not exempted from a variety of changes, introduced probably to shew his impartiality. It was not possible indeed to ward off the blow, because the stadtholder had the army at command, and the states of Holland were wholly disarmed. Besides, he took his measures with such prudence and art, as seemed even to have deceived Barneveldt himself. At the very time Maurice was projecting this fall, he was loading his relations with favours, and preferring them to very considerable employments. The pensioner's son was created master of the dykes and forests, a lucrative and honourable office. To the younger son of Barneveldt, he gave the government of Bergen-op-zoom, by which he placed in his hands one of the keys of the United Provinces. At last, the artifice, the power, and address of Maurice, rendered his party every where superior. He gained over to his interest Francis Aersens, son of Cornelius Aersens secretary of state, and long ambassador at the court of France. The violence, the ability, and vigour of Aersens, quickened the measures of the prince. His aspiring ambition scrupled no action which could promote his interest; perniciously bold, and detestably eloquent, he converted the noblest qualities to the worst purposes, ruined his country, oppressed innocence, and sacrificed patriotism, at the shrine of those ill fated virtues, which might have proved the bulwark of liberty, and strongest barrier of the commonwealth. Aersens stimulated Maurice to what he was before inclined. To his counsel may be attributed the solemn synod assembled in the month of November at Dordrecht, to which the states general, the provincial states of the Seven Provinces, the kings of England and France, the elector palatine, the landgrave of Hesse, the cities of Bremen, Verden, Geneva, and the protestant cantons of Switzerland, dispatched their ambassadors and deputies. Thither the Arminian party was cited, to explain the principal points in which they dissented from the established church.

BARNEVELDT and the remonstrants had long avoided this blow, under pretence that a general synod was a trespass on the privileges of the provincial states. They knew the intention was to render them little in the opinion of the people if they appeared; and if they refused to obey the citations, to expose them as public incendiaries, the friends of Spain, popery and slavery. The remonstrants refused to attend the synod; at last they published a long writing, in which they explained the chief points of their doctrine, protested against the synod, and exhibited their reasons for refusing to appear in their own defence, before judges who were actually parties in the dispute. Accordingly their opinions were solemnly condemned, and the remonstrants were stigmatized as calumniators, who vilified the established religion, and attributed to the Belgian church other sentiments than those it really professed. Aersens wrote several pieces against Barneveldt, in which he boldly charged him with these designs. He was a spirited, artful, and fluent writer; his works were bought with avidity, they made a deep impression on the minds of the people, and so far influenced their passions, that Maurice resolved, before the public ardour cooled, to seize upon Barneveldt, Grotius, Hoogenberts, and other leaders of the Arminian party, whom he imprisoned in the castle of Louvestein, whence that faction has ever since borrowed the appellation (A). The advanced age, the long services, the moderation and patriotism of Barneveldt, now little availed him; even his writings, which clearly refuted all the allega-

(A) In this confinement the learned Grotius remained for several years, when at length he made his escape, through the courage, the affection, and address of his wife Reigersberg. This lady had obtained leave to send large boxes of books to her husband, and to visit him in prison, which furnished her with a hint for his escape. She persuaded him to lie in one of the boxes, to be returned to his house. He was carried out by the guards, without suspicion, though they complained of the uncommon weight of their burthen; he escaped to the Spanish Netherlands, passed from thence into France, where he was well received by the king. At last he was employed by Christina queen of Sweden, that liberal protectress of merit, and died at Rosbach, in the duchy of Mecklenburgh, in the year 1645 (1).

a tions of his enemies, were either neglected, or read with a partiality and prejudice injurious to his reputation. Maurice procured an order of the states-general for his imprisonment. His practices and intrigues had obtained a majority in the states; notwithstanding which, this order was signed only by eight members, particularly attached to the prince's interest. Barneveldt was accused of being the author of the disturbances at Utrecht, and of harbouring designs destructive of public liberty. He was tried by judges appointed by the states-general, condemned to death by the most iniquitous sentence, and deprived of his life on a public scaffold, by the same blow which ruined the character of prince Maurice, and withered with the ardour of ambition those laurels acquired by long and important services (B). He lost his popularity and the affections of the people, when he hoped to obtain the sovereignty. Instead of being adored as a hero, he was detested as a tyrant. As he passed through the cities, nothing but murmurs and the name of Barneveldt could be heard, where formerly Maurice was received as the guardian and protector of his country. In a word, the death of Barneveldt laid the foundation of a conspiracy against the life of the prince, which was discovered only a few hours before the time appointed for its execution. The design was projected by Stanlemburgh, governor of Bergen-op-zoom, who, with his accomplices, fell a sacrifice to patriotism and filial duty<sup>c</sup>.

(B) This terrible tragedy was acted in the castle of the Hague, on the 13th day of May, A. D. 1619, when Barneveldt was seventy-two years of age, fifty of which he had spent with equal integrity and ability, in the different employments of ambassador to the courts of France and England, and pensionary of the states of Holland. A medal was struck in honour of his memory.

All his virtues now, when too late, were approved in their full lustre. He was called a martyr to his country, the protector of liberty, the father, the friend, and the advocate of the provinces; in a word, his memory is held in veneration to this day, and his death regarded as the deepest stain upon the house of Orange.

S E C T. VIII.

Containing the commercial affairs of the republic during the truce, the renewal of the war with Albert, the death of prince Maurice, the proposals of peace made by Isabella frustrated by the French ministry, the treaty with France against Spain, &c.

The state of commerce at the expiration of the truce.

DURING the truce with the archduke, the United Provinces had paid the most assiduous attention to trade and navigation, which were astonishingly improved and extended by voyages to Asia, Africa, and America, in all of which this indefatigable people had erected colonies, and founded settlements. The returns made by the East-India company alone were sufficient to aggrandize the state, and raise this infant republic to a degree of naval power, scarcely to be paralleled in history. Vast fleets, equal in strength to hostile armaments, returned with the richest treasures and spices of the Indies, the Baltic swarmed with Dutch ships, the flag of the republic became even well known in the Levant, and her shipping traded to the Spanish West-Indies, with as much security as if the provinces were still under the protection of the Spanish monarchy. Venice, a republic the first in opulence and power in the world, gladly solicited the friendship of this new commonwealth, and was forced to make court to a people, whose industry was the ruin of her commerce, and the chief cause of her decline. The foundation was laid of an empire at Batavia, infinitely superior in wealth, power, and grandeur, to the republic of the United Provinces, where the providence of the Dutch seemed to secure a retreat, in case by any fatal accident their liberties should be destroyed in Europe<sup>a</sup>.

SUCH was the situation of this republic at the expiration of the truce with Albert, a prince who, from his pacific and moderate sentiments, justly merited the appellation of Pious. It was the archduke's sincere intention to have passed his life in tranquillity, and end his days in perfect harmony with the United Provinces. He admired the spirit of liberty, the independency, and the industry of men, whom he otherways regarded as rebels and heretics; experience convinced him of the impossibility of subduing them, and he was taught by the dictates of sound policy, to put up with the loss of seven provinces, rather than hazard the ruin of the remaining ten; which formed all his dominions. But the court of Spain entertained different sentiments. Losses, defeats, and mortifications, had not yet subdued the haughty spirit of the house of Austria; and Philip could not support the thoughts of seeing so precious a jewel torn from his diadem. Thus the long cessation of hostilities which it was hoped would calm passion, compose resentment, and open the way to a durable solid pacification, had no other effect, than enabling the parties to resume the war with redoubled vigour.

A. D. 1621. Renewal of the war.

PREVIOUS, however, to the renewal of hostilities, Albert sent Peckius, chancellor of Brabant, to the Hague, either to conclude a new treaty, or procure an audience of the prince. The superb equipage in which he appeared, gave offence to the frugal Dutchmen; it prejudiced them against whatever he could offer: but the extravagance of his propositions, which were dictated by the court of Madrid, were not even deemed worthy of a reply by the states-general. The populace insulted the ambassador, and he returned highly irritated to Brussels. Albert beheld with uneasiness the obstinacy of the Spanish ministry; he endeavoured to palliate their demands, and grant a truce upon the same footing as the preceding. For this purpose secret agents were employed in Holland; but as Philip publicly insisted, that the provinces should enter into their former subjection, all the negotiations vanished in smoke. Spinola took the field with an army of fifteen thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with which he penetrated into the country of Juliers, ordering the count de Berg, with a strong detachment, to invest the city of Juliers, garrisoned by Dutch forces since the death of the duke of Cleves. He was well acquainted with the divisions in the provinces, and weak condition of the army under prince Maurice. Berg invested Juliers; but finding the garrison numerous and resolute, he converted the siege to a blockade, by which he reduced the place to the necessity of surrendering, in despite of the utmost efforts of the prince to throw in succours<sup>b</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING this advantage, and the great superiority of his forces, the archduke was still desirous of an accommodation: he was on the point of renewing the negotiations, when he was seized with a disorder which carried him off, and deprived the Netherlands of all hope of an issue to their calamities. It was expected that the death of a Philip III. which fell out about this time, and the minority that ensued, would have accelerated a peace; but the Spanish ministry, as well as the counsellors about the arch-duchess, found their advantage in the continuance of the war. It is likewise said, that Spinola, animated with his success before Juliers, with the distraction of the provinces, and the strength of his army, promised to force the Dutch in a few campaigns to absolute subjection. In pursuance of this design, he assembled his whole army with intention to invest Bergen-op-zoom, the strongest fortress in Dutch Brabant. Maurice penetrated his meaning, and took care to provide the garrison with liberal reinforcements of men, ammunition, and provisions. The prince had his head-quarters at Emmeric, whence he detached colonel Henderson, a Scotchman, with seven hundred men, who threw themselves into the town, b in defiance of the vigilance of Spinola. Soon after the colonel sallied out with a numerous party, on the quarter of the besiegers camp, commanded by Baglioni, general of the Italian forces. Here, after an obstinate conflict, he was wounded, just as he was on the point of grasping victory; his party, finding themselves unsupported, retired with some precipitation, and the colonel died the day following, deeply regretted by prince Maurice. Now the siege was pushed with great vigour, and the resistance was such as might be expected from a brave garrison, animated in defence of liberty, and assisted by strong fortifications. However, the prince, who was too weak to offer battle to Spinola, formed an enterprize on Boisleduc, which, he thought, would necessarily draw off the attention of the enemy, and interrupt, if it could not wholly suspend, the operations against Bergen-op-zoom. c But he was soon obliged to abandon the design from a variety of untoward accidents. As yet he was not reinforced by the German protestants under count Mansveldt, and the duke of Brunswic. These auxiliaries were arrived at Sedan; but before they could proceed, it was necessary to fight Gonzales with a strong detachment. Upon this the count determined, and accordingly attacked the Spaniard, who received his charge with great intrepidity. After an obstinate and bloody action, in which the duke of Brunswic was dangerously wounded, victory declared for Mansveldt; the enemy retreated, and he was left to pursue his march unmolested.

A. D. 1622:

SPINOLA had prosecuted the siege with the utmost vigour, and performed every thing which could be expected from an officer of experience and ability. All those expedients d which he had practised with success at Ostend were now repeated, and every stratagem of the military art exhausted; but the length of the siege occasioned great desertion in his camp; his army was exceedingly diminished, and the besieged encouraged to a more spirited defence by the late advantage gained by Mansveldt, which they hoped would enable prince Maurice to give battle to the Spaniards. Mansveldt had brought a reinforcement of four thousand horse and three thousand foot; and the prince had besides ordered his brother prince Henry to join him with his whole army. He was now at Emmeric with a body of eight thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, opposing the designs of the count de Berg. Upon the union of all the different corps, the main army exceeded twenty thousand infantry and seven thousand cavalry, a force more than sufficient to compel the exhausted, e dispirited Spaniards to relinquish the siege of Bergen-op-zoom. Accordingly Spinola broke up his camp on the approach of the prince of Orange, and retired in so good order, that Maurice, who well knew his capacity, apprehended that this motion was a feint, only to lull him and the garrison into security. It proved otherwise, and Spinola had the mortification to see himself baffled, for the first time, in a siege which had cost him the lives of ten thousand soldiers, of the flower of his army. On the fourth day of October prince Maurice entered Bergen-op-zoom with thirty troops of horse, and next day he was followed by prince Henry, count Ernest de Nassau, and other officers, with whom he concerted the plan of their future operations.

Spinola raises the siege of Bergen-op-zoom.

SOMETIME before Bergen-op-zoom was invested, the governor of Antwerp laid siege to f Sluys with ten thousand men, by express order of the arch-duchess; but the strength of the place, the valour of the garrison, and the dreadful inundation in which they overwhelmed the country, by breaking their dykes, and opening the sluices, rendered the enterprize fruitless, and obliged Ignatio de Borgia to decamp with great loss and precipitation. Nor was this the only attempt in which the Spaniards failed, during the tedious siege of Bergen-op-zoom. They laid siege to Hasselt, an inconsiderable town in Overysse, and would have reduced the place but for the vigorous and gallant conduct of the burghers of Haerlem, led on by the captains Olican and Vander Camer, who pierced through the enemy's camp, entered the town, made a brisk sally, and obliged the Spaniards to retreat with great slaughter, and the loss of their artillery.

PRINCE Maurice, having accomplished his purpose at Bergen-op-zoom, retired to Rosendal, and sent a detachment to invest Steenberg, which capitulated before the batteries were erected.

erected. Spinola too had retreated towards Antwerp, where he was joined by six thousand men just arrived from Spain, and the corps under the count de Berg. With this reinforcement he was superior to the Hollanders; accordingly he advanced within three leagues of the prince's camp, and offered battle, which the prince declined, saying, He had come to relieve Bergen-op-zoom, and reduce Steenberg; he had accomplished both designs, and was satisfied. Upon receiving this answer, Spinola turned off towards Brussels, and Maurice marched to Breda. The enemy resumed their operations, and the count de Berg was detached to lay siege to Pfaffenmütz, while prince Maurice was contriving the means of getting rid of his troublesome ally, count Mansveldt, who with his undisciplined troops, accustomed to violence and rapine, was desolating the provinces with all the fury of a barbarous enemy. At last the Germans crossed the Rhine, and passed into Westphalia; when Maurice was in hopes that Mansveldt would have attempted the relief of Pfaffenmütz, the brave garrison of which, after a most gallant defence, and suffering extreme hardships, was forced to capitulate. The count de Berg repaired the fortifications, put a strong garrison into the place, and changed the name to that of Fort Isabella; but the works were soon after destroyed, in consequence of a petition presented to the emperor and diet at Ratisbon, by the magistrates of Cologne.

Maurice is disappointed in his designs on Antwerp.

A.D. 1623.

A conspiracy against his life discovered.

At the time prince Maurice declined the challenge sent by Spinola, he was meditating an attempt upon the most considerable city in the Netherlands. Antwerp was the great object of his designs, and he took every precaution to draw off the enemy's attention from this city. The scheme was so well laid, that, on taking leave of the states at the Hague, he said, That God only could prevent the success of the enterprize. However, it miscarried, through a train of unavoidable accidents, which human sagacity could not foresee. The fleet assembled at the Brille was locked up by a sudden frost; some of the vessels which had put to sea were lost in a storm; two regiments were shipwrecked; and thus the finest project that had been concerted during the war vanished into smoke. Flanders and Brabant must have followed the fate of Antwerp, the loss of which would have been a mortal blow to the Spanish affairs. Disappointed in a scheme upon which he had set his heart, Maurice returned, greatly chagrined, to Ryswic, where a conspiracy against his life was discovered. The author was William Barneveldt, grandson of the pensioner, who determined to revenge the ignominious death of that celebrated patriot. He communicated his design of assassinating the prince to his elder brother, the sieur Barneveldt of Groenveldt, exhorting him to join in his resentment, to assist in avenging the indignity done the family, and in ridding the provinces of a tyrant, whose sole aim was to acquire the sovereignty of the country, and subject the United Provinces to a more cruel slavery than they had suffered under the dominion of Spain. But Groenveldt received the proposal with horror, and used every argument in his power to prevail upon William to drop an attempt which must terminate in the ruin and disgrace of the conspirators. His remonstrance produced no effect; William was obstinate and implacable; his violent spirit knew no bounds, and he resolved to pursue his vengeance at the hazard of his own destruction. He engaged in the plot a number of Arminians, actuated by the same aversion to Maurice, and desire of rescuing their country from bondage, as himself. It was determined to shoot the prince on his way from Ryswic to the Hague, and the conspirators had all their proper parts assigned them, the arms were purchased, and the day for execution fixed. Two of his associates, struck with remorse, discovered the conspiracy; the prince returned to the Hague, doubled his guards, and Barneveldt escaped to Antwerp, where he died some years after. Four of the conspirators were seized, tried, condemned, and solemnly executed. Groenveldt likewise was taken into custody, and condemned as a party, because he had not discovered his brother's intentions. It was not sufficient that he had endeavoured to dissuade him from the attempt; he was beheaded, and considered by the people as a martyr to fraternal affection, and an innocent victim offered to appease the resentment of prince Maurice.

The persecution renewed against the Arminians.

This opportunity was favourable to the Gomarists, and they did not fail to embrace it to renew their persecutions against the Arminian party. They gave out that the whole sect was engaged in the conspiracy; notwithstanding the edict of the states, which had forbid the revival of all religious disputes, they began publishing bitter invectives against the Arminians; and even accused a little society, formed for the support of poor sectarists, of a design against the government. It was affirmed, that the Arminian ministers, banished the provinces, had returned in disguise, and were exerting their utmost influence to excite the people to rebellion. In a word, they carried their violences to so great a length, and were so powerfully supported by the prince of Orange, that, by an ordonnance published a in the month of February, in the name of Maurice and the states of Utrecht, the Arminians were declared rebels and enemies to their country; they were proscribed afresh, and a reward of six hundred livres offered to whoever should accuse any of them of crimes and misdemeanors against the government, or designs upon the prince of Orange; nor was the reward limited to conviction: the accuser had his pay upon lodging the heads of his accusation in some public court; and by this a door was opened for corruption, perjury, and persecution. Armed with legislative power, the Gomarists kept no bounds; they not only abused the Arminians from the pulpit, reviling them with opprobrious names of traitors and parricides, but they proceeded to persecute individuals, and to establish courts as iniquitous and oppressive as those inquisitions which had originally occasioned the deb fection of the Seven Provinces. The Arminians presented a petition, craving the protection of the states general against such unprecedented cruelty. They solemnly disavowed all knowledge of the horrid conspiracy with which they were charged; they remonstrated on the injustice of persecuting a whole body of people for the crimes of certain guilty members; they declared their having no relation, connection, or interest in the fate of the conspirators, whom they detested and abhorred; they urged their services to the states, and pressed that they might be tried by the laws of their country in the usual form, and not dragged before courts determined upon finding them criminal. The famous Grotius supported this petition with an apology for the Arminians, founded on the common rights of humanity, and the laws of the provinces; but this masterly piece, instead of convincing, served only to irritate the minds of the Gomarists. The states did not care to interpose, as the prince of Orange, and the province of Utrecht, had given sanction to the persecution. And thus the unfortunate Arminians were left a prey to the most implacable of all enemies, as they were actuated by the spirit of political and theological rancour.

c It must indeed be confessed that the Gomarists had some appearance of reason for their persecutions; and that the prince of Orange, in particular, had cause for that implacable hatred he bore to the Arminian faction, who had long wished to see the influence of his family retrenched. All the accomplices in the late conspiracy were of this party; and Status an Arminian preacher of Bliswick, now in custody, and actually engaged in the plot, had d confessed on the rack, that all the principal persons of his persuasion were accessaries to the design of assassinating Maurice, and subverting the government. This evidence was extorted from him by the violence of the torture, and the hope given him of pardon; however, it left suspicions injurious to the Arminians in the minds of several men extremely moderate in their sentiments; though, when his declaration came to be read, it appeared a mere tissue of malevolence and calumny. He was therefore condemned to death; and a libel he had published the preceding year against the prince of Orange, ordered to be burned by the ignominious hands of the executioner<sup>d</sup>. Several other persons were beheaded at the Hague and Leyden, only because they were Arminians, and consequently supposed favourers of the violent measures upon which some turbulent, headstrong, and bigotted persons of the same faction had entered. The rigour of these proceedings was e generally condemned; it was thought injurious to liberty, that attempts against the life of the prince of Orange should be deemed equivalent to designs formed against the government, which was actually acknowledging that he was the head of the republic, and in a manner the sovereign of the United Provinces.

f In this manner was Holland torn with civil faction, while at the same time oppressed with an expensive, bloody war, against the whole power of the Spanish monarchy; and her commerce disturbed by the piracies of the Barbary corsairs, especially those of Tunis and Algiers. The states complained, by their ambassadors, to the courts of Fez and Constantinople, under whose protection the Barbary states screen themselves; but they could obtain no redress, because several of these claim a kind of independency, under the dominion of their deys, and prove extremely useful auxiliaries to the grand signior, and the emperor of Morocco. In order, therefore, to get rid of such troublesome foes, the states entered into a kind of composition with the maritime cities of Barbary, whereby it was declared, that the enemies of either should be regarded as the enemies of both. This agreement was purchased by a sum of money; and, to render it more valid, a treaty was struck up between the United Provinces, and the joint empire of Fez and Morocco. In consequence, they committed hostilities against the Spaniards, in which they were assisted by the Dutch and Germans; although the latter were waging an actual land-war with the states; for the emperor, without declaring openly against the Hollanders, maintained two formidable armies to assist their enemies, and, if possible, to reduce the Netherlands once more under the dominion of the house of Austria. One was distinguished by the name of the German catholics; it had been employed against the protestants of Bohemia, commanded by count Tilly, and was now ordered to advance into Friseland. The other, conducted by Gonzales de Cordova, acted along the Lower Rhine in the duchies of Juliers and Gueldres, and was composed chiefly of Spaniards, under the direction of the emperor. It was proposed to join these to Spinola's army, in order to form such a body of forces as should, at one blow, crush the rebellious Hollanders.

A. D. 1624. SENSIBLE of what was transacting among the enemy, the states endeavoured to ward off the impending stroke, by an artifice that succeeded. They again employed Mansveldt, and the bishop of Halberstadt, to make a diversion; furnishing them with money to begin new levies. With these auxiliaries it was resolved to carry the war into Liege, Cologne, and the catholic part of Westphalia, in order to draw the attention of Tilly and Gonzales from the United Provinces. They likewise entered into an alliance with Betlem Gabor, prince of Transylvania, in open rebellion against the emperor, with a view to employ the imperial army in Hungary; and by attacking the court of Vienna in so many parts, distract her councils, and divide her forces. Mansveldt began his expeditions, or rather his depredations, in East Friseland and Westphalia. He ravaged, pillaged, and desolated with the cruelty of a barbarian; respecting neither age nor sex, and robbing without distinction the indigent and wealthy. Encouraged by his success, the Dutch garrison in the little town of Lippe made irruptions into Westphalia, levied prodigious contributions, and inspired the states with a high opinion of the scheme concerted to divert the enemy, and an inclination to augment the irregular auxiliaries. With respect to the bishop of Halberstadt, the Spaniards opposed his crossing the Weser, and placed strong garrisons in Hoxter, Hamelen, Rintelen Wecht; but count Stirum, a few days after, took this last place by assault, and put the whole garrison to the sword. These hostilities, and others, committed in Lower Saxony, produced an assembly of the princes, where a league was concluded for the defence of the circle. The bishop of Halberstadt was chosen captain-general of the forces of the circle, by which the powers in alliance thought to detach him from the interest of Mansveldt and the United Provinces. His brother, the duke of Brunswic, engaged to the emperor for his honour; and, in consequence, Tilly had instructions not to penetrate into Lower Saxony. To these promises made by the duke the ambitious prelate paid little regard. He saw himself at the head of a fine army of nineteen thousand foot, and five thousand six hundred horse; he despised the emperor's pardon, and drew upon himself the indignation of the court of Vienna, the allied powers of Lower Saxony, and the whole weight of count Tilly's forces. In consequence, he was defeated at Statlo, and his army entirely destroyed, except six thousand of the scattered remains, picked up, and retained in their service, by the Hollanders.

Victory obtained by count Tilly.

UPON the bishop's defeat, Mansveldt retired to East Friseland, a province at that time disturbed by civil dissensions. In the city of Embsen alone were no less than three parties; one declared for the natural sovereign, one for the emperor, and a third for the United Provinces. Tilly, who knew the ill treatment which the inhabitants received from Mansveldt, thought to profit by the aversion they entertained for that general and the friends of the bishop of Halberstadt, and for that purpose to enter the territory of Embsen in conjunction with Gonzales. The United Provinces were apprised of his design soon enough to prevent it, by sending prince Henry and count Ernest Casimir of Nassau, with a body of forces, towards the city. A garrison of twelve complete companies was left in the town and citadel; the harbour was put into a state of defence, and the whole party for the emperor banished. This precaution destroyed all Tilly's schemes, and obliged him to retire to Westphalia, where he revenged the disappointment on the towns held in that country by the Hollanders. Sparemberg, and several places of less consideration, felt the effects of his resentment; after which he marched to invest Lippe, or Lipstat, the only remaining town the Hollanders possessed in Westphalia, and a place of the utmost consequence. The garrison, composed of French and Dutch soldiers, was numerous, and well provided. Tilly made regular approaches, battered the walls with great fury, gave the assault, and was vigorously repulsed; but finding that Mansveldt did not care to hazard a battle, the garrison at last surrendered the place upon honourable conditions. As the winter approached, the armies of both sides retired into quarters; and fruitless negotiations were renewed in this, as in every other preceding season. Before we resume the military operations by land, it will be necessary to give a short view of the naval transactions of the United Provinces.

* Id. ibid.

Soon

a Soon after the treaty with the states of Barbary, the provinces experienced how little Naval trans- confidence ought to be placed in the faith of pirates, who judge of right by power and the actions.
 sword. Four Dutch ships were attacked on the coast of Genoa by the corsairs of Algiers, and three were taken after a long and bloody engagement. The fourth, determined not to fall into the hands of so cruel and perfidious an enemy, fought desperately; and the crew, finding all endeavours vain, set fire to the powder-room, and blew themselves up, with seventy of the barbarians, who had boarded the vessel. Nor was this the only loss sustained this year; another of more importance happened, in consequence of a well concerted plan of the court of Madrid, whereby upwards of an hundred sail of Dutch ships were seized in the harbours of Spain and Portugal (A).

b But those losses, considerable as they appeared, were amply recompensed by the prodigious success of the East India company. The trade was extended, the settlements established on the most secure footing, the enemy's colonies miserably harassed, and their shipping entirely destroyed. Above sixty rich vessels were taken or sunk, and the booty amounted to upwards of two millions sterling, a remittance now made to Europe, to enable the provinces to support the war with vigour, and extricate themselves with honour out of a quarrel of which Spain grew heartily tired<sup>f</sup>.

The naval operations of Holland were not confined to Europe and Asia, a strong fleet Successes of the was sent to America under admiral Hermit, with instructions to penetrate to the source of Dutch in those vast treasures, which the Spaniards drew from Peru, and their settlements on the sou- South Ame- c thern continent of America. Willekens had been detached with a squadron to Brasil about rica.
 four months before. When the viceroy of Lima understood that a Dutch fleet was upon the coast, he immediately equipped a powerful armament, which he drew up in the port of Callao, on which he doubted not the Hollanders would make their first attack. Hermit was not discouraged by the superiority of the enemy; they were more than double his force, but he boldly crowded sail for the harbour, and greatly astonished the Spaniards at his boldness, who were then preparing to give him chase, not expecting he would presume to offer battle. The engagement was begun by the two admirals, whose example was followed by the vice-admirals, and the conflict maintained with great obstinacy, until the Spanish admiral's ship, with eight hundred men on board, was sunk, and the vice admiral's burned.
 d The loss of these two ships was succeeded by the destruction of nine more, six of which were sunk, and three burned. The enemy retired under the cannon of the town; Hermit pursued, and the action was renewed with redoubled fury. In the space of an hour eleven Spanish men of war were sunk, taken, and destroyed; and the consternation was so great in Lima, that had the admiral pursued his blow he must infallibly have taken the town, and gained possession of the immense treasures lodged in the citadel. But he wanted to refresh his men, in order to attack the place with more vigour next day; by which time the viceroy had assembled a numerous army that rendered an attempt impracticable.

ADMIRAL Willekens arrived in All-Saints bay on the eighth day of May, next day cast e anchor before the town of St. Salvador, the capital of the country, and the residence of the Portuguese viceroy. His squadron consisted of nine large ships, manned with fifteen hundred sailors and two thousand marines. All the soldiers were put on board the four ships that composed the van, in order to persuade the enemy that the other ships were equally crowded. Willekens landed with all his forces, drove the enemy from the shore, and obliged them to hide themselves behind the walls of the city; the vice-admiral, in the mean time, gaining possession of a strong battery that formed a kind of out-work, on a projecting rock. Next day they found the town abandoned by the inhabitants, and the gates set open; however, the garrison still continued in the castle, until finding that all resistance would prove fruitless, they surrendered. The town was pillaged, and vast quan-
 f tities of rich merchandize sent on board, for the use of the West India company; nor did

(A) It must be remembered, that, through the whole course of this war, the Dutch traded to the Spanish ports, as if they had been in entire friendship with the crown; than which nothing can furnish a stronger idea of the attachment of the Hollanders to gain and commerce. It was no uncommon practice with them to supply towns, with provision, that were besieged by their own armies; and to furnish the enemy with ammunition, and other necessaries; without which they could not continue the war. Their motive and their apology was, that they, by this means, kept in their own hands the profits with which other nations would be enriched.

the soldiers even spare the churches, from whence they carried vast quantities of plate, and other valuable moveables. Colonel Van Dort was appointed governor of the town, and a strong garrison left to support his government. His first act was, to publish a manifesto, in the name of the states, allowing liberty of conscience to all who would take an oath of fidelity to the republic of the United Provinces. He then hoisted the Spanish flag, in order to deceive the Spanish and Portuguese shipping, and had the good fortune to seize eight rich merchantmen by the stratagem. Willekens dispatched three men of war to Europe, with an account of the success of the expedition. On their voyage they took several valuable prizes, and their arrival in Holland gave the greatest satisfaction, as it was not doubted but the entire conquest of the *Brasil*s would be the consequence <sup>a</sup>.

The Spaniards miscarry in an expedition to the provinces.

WHILE the United Provinces were thus victorious in America, the court of Spain was making great preparations to oppress them in Europe, and bring to an end a war which had hitherto served only to draw the treasures of Peru and Mexico into Holland. The designs of the Spaniards, however, created less uneasiness to the states, than the conduct of their allies, whose rapacity became more troublesome than their services were useful. Mansveldt, destitute of money and provisions, in East Friseland, kept possession of several fortresses, which he offered to sell to the states general for three hundred thousand florins; a proposal that was accepted, though extremely unjust, because his troops were expressly hired for that service. By this means the Dutch, who were already in possession of Embsen, <sup>b</sup> formed a good barrier on that side against the incursions of the Germans and Spaniards. Mansveldt now resolved to penetrate into the bishopric of Munster; but, being defeated in several enterprizes he had formed, his troops deserted so fast, that he returned to Holland with a number of officers, who professed themselves entirely at his devotion, rivetted to his fortune. The severity and duration of the frost encouraged the Spaniards quartered in Cleves to undertake two expeditions upon the ice. They crossed the Yssel, entered Velau, and penetrated to the province of Holland, in which they had not before set foot for a number of years. By the other expedition it was proposed to invade the territory of Drente, and the province of Groningen. Prince Maurice, hearing of the preparations at Antwerp, frustrated the design, put the fortresses into the best posture of defence, and employed <sup>c</sup> several thousand men in breaking the ice at all the passages; yet could not all his vigilance prevent the count de Berg from crossing the Yssel, with forty troops of horse and ten thousand infantry, overwhelming Dutch Guelderland with consternation, and advancing to Arnhem, a place to which he laid siege. The garrison had been seasonably reinforced; it made a vigorous resistance; but the excessive inclemency of the weather gave greater obstruction to the count's progress, than the fire and sallies of the besieged. He therefore dropped the enterprize, and pushed forward to Eede, where he received advice that the prince of Orange was arrived at Utrecht, with all his forces, and forty pieces of cannon. This intelligence broke all his measures, and he began to think of an expeditious retreat, from an apprehension he should be shut up by the breaking of the frost, and exposed to <sup>d</sup> famine, and the hazard of a defeat. He retired with precipitation, and repassed the Yssel, abandoning all the great designs he had formed, with the loss of near half his army, which perished by cold, hunger, or the sword; the Dutch garrisons in Arnhem, Zutphen, and Deventer, sallying out upon his rear, and making prodigious slaughter. Nor was the other expedition very successful, though it bore the most promising aspect; it ended in burning some villages, and taking prisoners a number of peasants; the prince of Orange's diligence entirely confounded the Spaniards, who thought to find the provinces defenceless, and lulled in profound security.

STILL the old quarrel continued between the elector of Brandenburgh, assisted by the Dutch and German protestants; and the duke of Newburgh, supported by the Spaniards <sup>e</sup> and catholic powers, about the succession to the duchy of Juliers. The wretched inhabitants of Cleves, Juliers, la Marc, Ravensberg, and Ravestein, were equally oppressed by both parties; each of which endeavoured to support their claims at the expence of the country. This gave birth to a negotiation between the elector and duke, whereby it was proposed to compromise a difference, that tended only to desolate the people whom both called their subjects. A treaty was signed, and the parties sent the articles to the Hague and Brussels, to receive the sanction of the states, and the archduchess. But neither the Spaniards nor the Dutch chose to resign the towns they possessed in the countries disputed; and thus the whole negotiation was rendered fruitless, and the inhabitants kept in a state <sup>g</sup> of grievous oppression.

a A STRICT regard to the several interests, was the only particular in which the archduchess and the states of the United Provinces agreed. While that princess joined issue with the Dutch, in rejecting a treaty which would have restored peace to the territories of Juliers and Cleves, she was taking measures to repair the losses lately sustained on the ocean, and recompense the miscarriage of the late expeditions into the provinces. With this view she had collected a considerable naval force at Dunkirk, consisting of nine large men of war, and a great number of small privateers, with which incredible damage was done to the Dutch commerce. Besides a variety of other vessels, fifty fishing busses, and an English man of war of fifty guns, were taken by the enemy; in a word, so formidable was this squadron, that the states offered a reward of ten thousand florins, and the benefit of the prize, to whoever should equip a force sufficient to take one of the larger vessels; the same reward was offered for each of the nine men of war, and a proportionable gratuity for single privateers. Excited by these promises, a number of adventurers soon appeared; and, among the rest, general Lambert; who, with a considerable force, gave chase to six men of war, as they quitted Dunkirk, came up with them, and maintained a bloody engagement for several hours. He was killed by a musket-ball in the heat of the action, a great number of his people perished, and the whole Dutch fleet was extremely shattered: but the enemy did not fare better; one of their ships, with the whole crew, went to the bottom; another was driven ashore, and destroyed; and the four remaining men of war sheered off in a wretched plight to the English coast. Though this engagement did not prove decisive, it however checked the ardour of the Spaniards, who now slackened greatly in their cruizes, and appeared with more caution out of their harbours. The Dutch, however, fully ballanced the losses sustained here, by other more fortunate cruizes on the coasts of Spain, Portugal, and Barbary. Among other valuable prizes, they took a ship laden with the plate, rich furniture, and money, of the count de Lemos, viceroy of Sicily, estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling<sup>a</sup>.

THESE, and other misfortunes obliged the Spaniards to have recourse to extraordinary methods to repair their marine; for which purpose several French ships were detained in their ports, and the crews and shipping employed in the king's service. France remonstrated upon this violence offered to the rights of nations, but could obtain no redress; and this furnished a pretext for a closer alliance between the French king and the provinces. Ambassadors were sent to Paris, and a treaty was concluded; whereby the states agreed, on their part, not to enter upon any negotiations of peace, or even a truce, without the consent of his most christian majesty; to associate the king's subjects in the trade to the East Indies; to allow the free exercise of their religion to the French ambassador, his domestics, and the king's troops serving in the provinces, provided this was done in so private a manner as to give no umbrage to the professors of the established religion of the provinces; and to revoke their treaties with the corsairs of Barbary. At the same time the states contracted an alliance with the crown of England, which never proved of any service, unless we except the opportunity with which it furnished the Hollanders, of gaining possession of some English settlements in the East Indies, by the most insidious and barbarous conduct, which James was too indolent and pusillanimous to resent<sup>b</sup>.

Treaty with France.

WHAT rendered the Dutch more eager to fortify themselves by alliances, were the vast preparations making by the Spaniards and the archduchess in the Netherlands, where it was reported an army of fifty thousand men would open the campaign. One division of this extraordinary force, was destined to act in Brabant, and to lay siege to Breda, under the conduct of Spinola. It consisted of twenty-six thousand infantry and five thousand cavalry. A second corps of nine thousand foot, and three thousand horse, under the count de Berg, it was proposed, should attack the places held by the Dutch and the elector of Brandenburgh, in the duchies of Juliers and Cleves; while a third body was to form a flying camp, and make inroads into the provinces, by means of the Vaal and Meuse. The command of this camp was assigned to Juan Bravo de Lagunas. All that the states could oppose to so formidable an army, was a corps consisting of thirteen thousand infantry and four thousand horse, under the immediate command of the prince of Orange, and another of six thousand foot, and eighteen troops of dragoons, conducted by prince Henry, but subject to the orders of Maurice. The former was destined to oppose Spinola, and the latter to cover the countries which the count de Berg was directed to invade. On the sixteenth day of July, Spinola quitted Brussels, and advanced with his whole army towards Heusden, which alarmed Breda, though he had taken every measure to conceal his real design upon that city. Justin Nassau, the natural son of William prince of Orange, was governor of Breda; he supplied the garrison in the most plentiful manner with provisions and ammunition, broke down the bridges and avenues to the city, ruined the surrounding mills, laid the adjacent country waste, and destroyed whatever could prove useful to the enemy, or any way assist their approaches. Prince Henry used the same precautions for the security of Rees and Emmeric, and armed the peasants to defend the passes. In the month of August, the count de Berg laid siege to Mundeberg, garrisoned by Brandenburghers, and obliged it to surrender. Thence he marched to Cleves, which so alarmed the garrison, that, retiring to the citadel, they left the city open to the Spaniards, upon which the magistrates presented the keys to the Spanish general, and put themselves under the protection of the archduchess. Soon after the citadel surrendered, after a feeble resistance; and the victorious Spaniards without regarding their promises to the magistrates, obliged the townsmen to purchase an exemption from being pillaged, at an enormous price. After taking an oath of fidelity to the archduchess from the inhabitants, the count formed several unsuccessful enterprises against Ravestein, leaving a strong garrison in Cleves. However he found means to reduce Griet and Genep, before he marched to join Spinola, who had by this time invested Breda.

Siege of Breda.

THIS city was among the strongest and most considerable places in the Netherlands, being fortified with the utmost caution and ability, by the late and present princes of Orange. The citadel, which formed the residence of the princes of that family, was surrounded by a ditch of prodigious depth and height filled with water, and a strong wall, defended by three great bastions. The arsenal was celebrated for its extent, and the vast quantities of arms and military stores it contained. As to Spinola, he was perfectly acquainted with the strength of the place, and thought he should expose his whole army to immediate destruction, should he attempt an assault, before he had regularly carried on his approaches. He even resolved upon reducing the city by famine, as the method attended with least danger to his army; and accordingly begun with drawing trenches round for the space of four miles, erecting forts and redoubts at certain distances. He established his head-quarters at Ginneken, count Iffemberg was posted at Haggen, the baron de Balançon at Teteringen and Terbaden, while Baglioni had his head-quarters at Conniberg, extending along the descent of the river Marck, over which he had formed a bridge of boats. The redoubts situated between the quarters of Spinola and Iffemberg, lying betwixt the rivers of Marck and Aa, were defended by the Italians and the Lasquenets; from thence to Baglioni's quarters, by the German and Irish auxiliaries; along to the quarters of Balançon, by the Flemmings and Walloons, and the remainder of the trenches quite to that of Spinola, were defended by the Spaniards. Such was the disposition of the besiegers; every thing was conducted with the utmost regularity, and the court of Brussels entertained the most sanguine hope of success.

A. D. 1625.

ON the other hand, the garrison, consisting of seven thousand infantry, and several troops of horse, composed of English, French, and Dutch soldiers, took the most vigorous measures for their own defence. The English were under the command of colonel Morgan, who had frequently distinguished his valour in the service of the states; the French directed by colonel de Hauterive, and the Dutch troops were subject to the immediate orders of colonel Lobre, though the whole received their instructions from Justin Nassau, the governor. The French were opposed to the quarters of Spinola, the English to those of Baglioni and Balançon, and the Dutch troops were posted in that part of the city which was fronted by the quarters of the count de Iffemberg. In this manner did this memorable siege commence. The first advantage was gained by Baglioni, who seized a large convoy of provisions and stores coming up the river, converting the boats into a bridge. This loss dispirited the besieged, and reduced them to a stated allowance of bread; however, they were encouraged by the return of the prince of Orange to the Hague, after having retaken Cleves, and obliged the Spanish garrison to surrender at discretion. He now advanced to Werkam, and was contriving the means of diverting Spinola's attention from the siege of Breda, by a second attempt on Antwerp, which likewise miscarried, just as it was on the point of execution, though planned with the utmost caution and ability. Already the Dutch cavalry had gained possession of all the avenues to the city, the ditch was filled with boats, and several ladders applied to the walls in the night, when a Spanish centinel discovered the design. Immediately the alarm spread, the garrison was under arms, and the governor had the address to order a number of trumpets and warlike instruments to be sounded in different parts of the city, to apprise the Hollanders that he stood on his defence. By this the prince's troops were seized with a panic, they conceived a whole army enclosed within, they abandoned their posts with great precipitation, and were deaf to a all Maurice's intreaties and menaces, until they got beyond the reach of danger. About ten days after, the prince prevailed upon his troops to resume the enterprize; but it was then too late, and he perceived before he could approach the city, that the garrison was prepared. This obliged him to withdraw his army, after which he retired to the Hague, where care, chagrin, and disappointment, brought on a disorder that ended with his life, in the eighty-eighth year of his age, forty of which had been constantly employed in the service of his country. He was buried at Delft, in the tomb erected for his father, regretted as the preserver of his country, and admired as the greatest statesman and warrior of his age. Vigilant, indefatigable, penetrating, cautious, enterprizing and sagacious, he united all the virtues of a general and hero, with the knowledge of a scholar. Particularly learned b in the arts belonging to the cabinet and the field, he had also made great proficiency in those more properly within the sphere of the gentleman and the philosopher. He had also a taste for the fine arts, especially drawing and architecture; but his principal study was engineering, fortification, and those branches of the mathematics which relate to the military art. In these he was a master, having proved the speculative knowledge by long and assiduous practice. His camp was the school of great officers, where persons of the highest distinction, and the best soldiers in France, received the first principles of education. Ambition was his prevailing foible. This had led him into some violences inconsistent with the general tenor of his conduct, displeasing to his countrymen, and almost destructive of liberty. He gave birth to a faction, which had more than once endangered his life, that, to this day, c continues to divide the republic, and will probably, in the result, hasten the dissolution of the government, the subjection of the provinces to some foreign power, the total loss of freedom, and that natural liberty for which the Hollanders had so long and so strenuously struggled. His ambition, however, was the weakness of a great mind; it sometimes shaded, but never concealed his extraordinary merit, his generosity, and patriotism; like a cloud before the sun, it damped the ardour, but could not obscure the whole radiance of his glory (A).

Prince Maurice's death and character.

WHILE prince Maurice was busied before Antwerp, while he lay sick at the Hague, and during the general despondency that succeeded his death, Spinola prosecuted the siege of Breda with the utmost diligence and vigour. On his pushing his trenches near the bastions, the besieged began a terrible fire to retard his approaches, and sustained it with such vehemence and obstinacy, that Spinola was in hopes they must soon surrender for want of ammunition. But here he formed a false judgment of the prudence of Justin Nassau, who finding he could not accomplish his purpose, by the most terrible firing that ever was kept up, resolved to try the effect of water. With this view, he stopped up the course of the river Marck, and having formed a large basin of water, opened the sluices, swept away men, horses, and houses in an inundation, and overflowed the whole country. The chief force of the torrent fell upon Spinola's quarters, and he exerted his utmost ability to remove the consequences. He dug up large pits, and cut out ditches and canals to receive the water; but these being filled, and the whole ground covered over, so as to appear one uniform mass of water, served only to entrap his cavalry. The inundation was augmented by the rains which happened to fall, only the count of Iffemberg's quarters remained sufficiently dry for the infantry to encamp in; a mortality among the soldiers and horses ensued, and of his whole army Spinola had scarce twelve thousand men fit for service by the month of December. With these inconsiderable remains, lines of vast extent were to be defended, the works were to be advanced, the sallies from the garrison repulsed, provisions to be conveyed into the camp, and all this to be effected, while Spinola, who was the very soul of action, was confined to a sick-bed.

Operations of the siege of Breda.

IN the garrison, an epidemical disease and scarcity likewise prevailed; but the excellent regulations made, and strictly observed, enabled the town to hold out three or four months beyond the time expected. The magistrates bought corn, sold it to the bakers at a certain price, obliging them to sell the bread to the inhabitants and garrison at a price affixed,

(A) When prince Maurice returned to the Hague, he left his army at Rosendal, with orders that prince Henry should join it with his corps and auxiliaries expected from France. The instructions to Henry were to attempt raising the siege of Breda, on the junction of all his forces; but this he did not live to see accomplished, and the apprehensions he was under for this city, which composed a part of the family-estate, increased his malady, and accelerated his death. There were only three particulars respecting his military conduct, which he wished on his death-bed had been otherwise. He repent of having fought the battle of Newport, which though it added to his glory, produced no advantage to the republic. He blamed himself for not following the counsel offered him when he reduced Sluys, of laying under water the towns possessed by the Spaniards, on the Rhine and Meuse; and he taxed himself severely, for not taking possession of Spinola's quarters before Breda, at the time the siege was forming. History cannot instance so few errors in the conduct of any man, who acted at the head of an army for the space of forty years.

and returning the overplus of their pay to the soldiers. A variety of other prudent regulations were established by the magistrates and governor, such as we do not find equalled by any instances recorded in history, upon a similar occasion, and all evincing the steadiness, sagacity, courage, and ability of Justin Nassau. A kind of rivalry appeared between him and Spinola, which should best fulfil their several duties. The Spanish general had himself carried about the works in a litter, he inspected and directed every thing, and displayed the activity of full health, at the time his life was in imminent danger from an acute malady. He ordered several breaches in the lines to be repaired, which the Hollanders had made by sap, with a view of introducing succours to the besieged, and drove piles into all the ditches and canals through which their boats could pass. He made drains to clear off the waters of the river Marck, succeeded in a great measure, and, by dint of perseverance, vigilance, and conduct, surmounted the greatest obstructions. He was now reinforced with a body of eight thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, many of the sick were perfectly recovered by his extreme care, and his army again was formidable, amounting to twenty five thousand infantry and eight thousand cavalry. Nor was prince Henry idle, who now succeeded to the titles and dominions of his brother, and was elected governor of Holland, Zealand, Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overyssel. He pressed France for assistance, and was joined by a body of cavalry under the conduct of the count de Rouffi and the marquis de Rambures. With this reinforcement, and a body of German infantry, he attacked the enemy's lines, and after an obstinate conflict was repulsed. He advanced a second time; but Spinola, who entertained a high opinion of his valour and conduct, did not chuse to wait for him in his lines; he marched out with the greater part of his army, seized upon a convenient post, and obliged the prince a second time to retire towards Boisleduc. Finding no prospect of being able to relieve the garrison, he sent a permission to the governor, to surrender on the best conditions he could obtain. This plan, which was signed with no name, fell into the hands of the besiegers, and Spinola sent it open, by a trumpet, to Justin Nassau, offering him an honourable capitulation; but that intrepid governor suspecting the letter was forged, because it was anonymous, replied civilly, that a permission was not an order to surrender; and that he should better follow the prince of Orange's intention, and shew his respect for Spinola, by continuing to defend to the last extremity.

By this time the garrison was diminished, by disease, fatigue, want, hardship, to half the number; but Justin put on such a countenance, as concealed his situation from Spinola. He frequently sallied out on Baglioni's quarters, where the Italians were perishing with cold and hunger, the whole subsistence of the besiegers depending on the contributions raised in the neighbouring territories. This produced a mutiny in the camp, that could not be appeased without applying violent remedies, and executing within sight of the whole army the chief ringleaders. One of the mutineers blew up Spinola's chief magazine, valued at two hundred thousand livres. Urged more by necessity than compassion for the besieged, Spinola sent a message to the governor, exhorting him not to force him to extremities, which might be attended with fatal consequences to a brave garrison; but Justin with equal art and dissimulation, answered, that Spinola was certainly ill served by his spies, as he appeared wholly unacquainted with the state of affairs in Breda, which which was fully provided for a siege of several months, and defended by soldiers who preferred death to the necessity of surrendering. At that time the besieged were not informed of the death of the prince of Orange, they flattered themselves with the hopes of speedy succour, and were entirely ignorant of prince Henry's late disappointment. They wrote to the army an account of their miserable condition; and Henry returned an answer, written with his own hand, and signed with his name, apprising them with the death of Maurice, the unsuccessful attempts made to raise the siege, and throw in succours, the great inferiority of his troops in point of numbers, the death of king James, whereby he was disappointed of a strong reinforcement: concluding, that he left the city entirely at the discretion of the governor, and other principal officers. The contents of this letter struck Justin like a thunder-clap. He had hitherto artfully concealed the total want of provision and ammunition from the enemy, and his own garrison, except a few officers, and other persons in whom he reposed confidence. The colonels Hauterive and Morgan would listen to no propositions, saying, that the honour of their several counties were concerned, and that they were responsible for the conduct of the English and French forces. They therefore required an express order from the prince of Orange to surrender, notwithstanding they pined under the united pressure of fatigue, scarcity, and disease. Justin acquainted the prince with their resolution, and he sent back an order to surrender, threatening with capital punishment whoever should disobey; but he requested that the garrison a son would first acquaint him by a certain number of fires, lighted up in different parts of the city, how many days they should be able to hold out. Upon receipt of this order, eleven fires were kindled; but as the prince had sent a duplicate of the order by the other messenger, and this fell into the hands of the enemy, Spinola was now acquainted with the desperate circumstances of the besieged. By this he likewise discovered the mystery of the eleven fires: a council of war was assembled to deliberate whether they should stay the eleven days, and then oblige the garrison to surrender at discretion, or immediately offer conditions worthy of so brave a corps. The Spanish officers were of the former opinion; the count de Berg and Spinola supported the latter. At last the marquis, determined to pursue the dictates of his noble generosity, sent such terms as could not be refused. The count de Berg conducted the negotiation. Two separate capitulations were drawn up, one for the garrison, and the other for the city, and both the most honourable and advantageous that could be devised. They were accepted, and the garrison marched out on the sixth of June, after sustaining a siege for ten months, whereby they were diminished two-thirds of the number of troops with which they began the siege; nor was the loss inferior on the part of the inhabitants. Spinola drew up his army to salute them, and surrounded by his field-officers, paid particular compliments to the governor, the colonels Morgan, Hauterive, and Lohre. He distributed money among the soldiers, ordered the sick and wounded to be treated with the utmost tenderness, conveyed the rest in the manner most commodious for them to Gertruydenburgh, and displayed all the sentiments of a hero in the regard paid to the valour and merit of his enemies. In honour to the memory of prince Maurice, he resigned the command after this memorable siege, sufficiently contented with having set bounds to the conquests of that great general, upon whom fortune seemed to frown for the two last years of his life<sup>k</sup>.

THE surrender of Breda was matter of the highest satisfaction to the courts of Madrid and Brussels, rejoicings were made all over the Spanish Netherlands, and the archduchess, with her whole court, set out for the new conquest, into which she made her public entrance. She confirmed the privileges granted by Spinola to the inhabitants; and appointing Balançon, surnamed Timber Leg, because he had lost that limb at the siege of Ostend, governor, she returned to Brussels. Such a profusion of civilities were poured out on the inhabitants of Breda by Spinola, that the states general began to be alarmed at his conduct, suspecting he meant by his kindness to seduce other towns from their allegiance; but Spinola was actuated merely by motives of generosity. He admired and rewarded their constancy and fidelity, and simply followed the impulse of humanity, without a view to policy. However the states prohibited their subjects from all intercourse and commerce with Breda, which obliged the archduchess to renew former edicts, whereby all the Spanish Netherlands were strictly enjoined to maintain no correspondence, commerce, or connection with the United Provinces. The present edict differed only in one circumstance. In all former ordonnances, the Dutch were termed rebels and traitors; here they were simply called enemies.

WITH this siege ended the campaign in the Netherlands. The year was no less successful in naval transactions, than in military operations by land. Here the Dutch were more successful. After the affair of Lima, admiral Hermit pursued his course to the coast of Chili, with intention to amuse the enemy, to persuade them that he had dropt all further designs on Peru, and likewise to cruise for the plate-fleet, which he expected would set sail by the month of December. Being disappointed in this last project by the false information of a Spanish pilot, he returned to Callao, manned eighteen boats, entered the harbour, burned nineteen Caracca ships, a great number of frigates, and was on the point of taking a galleon, valued at two millions of pieces of eight, when he was discovered by the light of the fire from the ships. Above an hundred pieces of cannon were pointed against him, and plied with such fury that he was forced to retreat. A second attempt was made next day; but the strong reinforcement sent by the governor of Lima rendered it fruitless; and Hermit directed his course to Guayaquil, the most commodious harbour in Peru; where an immense treasure is always lodged, ready to be shipped on board the galleons. Here he embarked his troops, defeated the Spanish army, took the town, and seized the treasure; but, on his departure, unfortunately set fire to the place, which so incensed the inhabitants, that, in despair, they took arms, pursued the admiral, killed five hundred of his men, and obliged him to retreat with precipitation, the loss of his nephew, and great part of his booty. Determined, if possible, to revenge this disgrace, Hermit returned a third time to Callao, and planned such a scheme as must have inevitably destroyed the great galleon, which lay, like a floating castle, in the harbour; but his project was betrayed to the viceroy by two Greeks, who deserted to the enemy. Thus disappointed of the main object of his pursuit, though upon the whole extremely successful, the brave admiral fell into a fit of melancholy, and died with chagrin; upon which the command devolved on his vice-admiral John Hugues, who contented himself with cruising for the plate-ships between Lima and Panama, in which he proved extremely fortunate.

MATTERS went more untowardly in Brazil, where the Dutch fleet had been lately so successful. The reduction of St. Salvador was esteemed in Holland the most important acquisition made during the war, as it paved the way to the conquest of all Brazil; but as the Spaniards placed an equal value upon this town, they omitted nothing that could re-establish them in the possession. At the very time when admiral Willekens returned to Europe, imagining he had fully provided for the security of St. Salvador, by leaving a strong garrison of two thousand men, six men of war, several frigates, and great store of provision and ammunition; the Spaniards were equipping a squadron of fifty-six sail, under Frederic de Toledo, to drive the Hollanders out of Brazil. This fleet, manned with twelve thousand soldiers and mariners, arrived before the town about the close of the year, and laid siege in form; Toledo, debarking with the land-forces, while Juan Faxardo was left with the fleet to block up the harbour. The garrison made several brisk sallies to obstruct his approaches, but Toledo sustained them with vigour, watched every motion and opportunity diligently, plied his cannon with great spirit and ability; and at last effected a breach, just as Faxardo had destroyed several ships, and reduced the marine to such distress, that the sailors mutinied. In these circumstances Van Dort died of a fever, contracted from the excessive fatigue of the siege, and the heat of the climate. This increased the disorder in the fleet and the army. The Dutch sailors marched in a body to lay siege to the new governor, because he refused to surrender; which obliged him to capitulate, and march out of the town, without being allowed the honours of war; for Toledo had no idea of displaying the gallantry of Spinola. The garrison were transported to Holland, loaded with infamy, and the execrations of their countrymen, for having, by their own misconduct, occasioned the miscarriage of the most considerable enterprize formed by the West India company. All the soldiers and mariners were dismissed the service, and whipped out of the army; several of the officers were cashiered, rendered incapable of service, and suffered to live in disgrace and obscurity; and the new governor alone was promoted, for the perseverance and steadiness with which he adhered to his duty, under such embarrassing circumstances; but his name is not recorded<sup>1</sup>.

The states assist in oppressing
protestants.

MEAN TIME the states concluded a treaty with the French king, whereby they agreed to assist him with a fleet to oppress his protestant subjects, and block up the sea-ports held by the Hugonots. The prince de Soubize, and his brother the duke of Roban, remonstrated to them on the iniquity of assisting a tyrant to oppress subjects of the same religion professed in the United Provinces, whose sole crime was, that that they would not sign articles against their conscience, and profess a mode of faith, which they deemed little better than idolatrous. The cities of Roban, the towns of Montauban, Castres, and a variety of other places, sent deputies to Holland, exhorting the states not to enter upon a measure so inconsistent with conscience, honour, charity, and every principal of humanity; they protested they would use their utmost endeavours to accommodate matters, and only requested that the states would refrain from hostilities, until the issue of the negotiations now on foot was decided. The catholic writers accuse the protestants of tergiversation; they allege, that the prince de Soubize, while the treaty was depending, and after the states general had consented to defer hostilities, set sail to attack the combined fleet of France and Holland. According to them, he pushed thro' the French line, and attacked the Dutch admiral in the rear; who, after defending himself with great valour, had the misfortune to be blown up<sup>m</sup>. The truth is, the states general were determined to gain the French king to their interest, by the most dishonourable concessions. He had consented to augment his army in the Netherlands; and they, in return, stipulated to employ their fleet against the Hugonots. They promised the protestant deputies every thing required, and had, at the same time, dispatched secret orders to their admiral to join the sieur de Manty, the king's admiral<sup>n</sup>. It was this junction, and certain motions made by the combined fleet, that alarmed the prince de Soubize, and occasioned the breach of the armistice of which he is accused. The states laboured to vindicate themselves, by throwing the blame on the Robellers; but time has not been able to wash out this stain on the reputation of a protestant republic, then waging a bloody war on account of religion.

NOR did this disgraceful treaty end in the single misfortune of a defeat. It was al- A. D. 1622, ways disliked by the populace in Holland, who generally push their notions of religion, honour, and friendship, to a greater degree of enthusiasm than their superiors. The clergy in general, too, favoured the Hugonots. Some divines were so bold as to declaim from the pulpit, against the late treaty with France. In particular, the minister of the French church at Amsterdam distinguished his zeal, and so animated the people, that they ran in a tumultuous manner from church to the house of Hautein, the admiral, which they pillaged and destroyed. They next pointed their resentment against the friends of admiral Bruck, a commander in the late engagement; many of whom they insulted and beat in the streets.
These disorders were not opposed by the states, who were therefore suspected by the French of conniving at them; though, in fact, they were prevented from exerting their authority, from an apprehension of a general insurrection.

THE loss of Breda, and the powerful army maintained by the Spaniards in the Nether- lands, rendered it necessary to divide their forces, and support Manfveldt, notwithstanding he proved so troublesome and expensive an ally. Perceiving that his forces were daily decreasing by numerous desertion, the states sent commissioners to Emmeric to review the remaining troops. They were found to amount to five thousand foot and twelve hundred irregular horse, which were to be augmented to a corps of eight thousand strong, to act, in conjunction with the troops of Denmark, against the imperial army in Lower Saxony. While Manfveldt was employed in making levies, the bishop of Halberstadt, with a detachment of four troops of horse and six hundred musketeers, made a feint motion towards Brabant, and, wheeling suddenly round, surprised the town of Ordinguen, which he sacked and pillaged. Soon after Manfveldt, having completed his corps, and received a reinforcement of two thousand Hollanders, traversed Westphalia, ravaged the bishopric of Osnaburg, and desolated the territories of the duke of Lunenburgh, because that prince had declined acceding to the league formed by the princes of Lower Saxony. Afterwards, in conjunction with Halberstadt, he cut in pieces a detachment of five hundred Croats. From this time, to the eve of the succeeding year, Manfveldt acted separate from the Dutch forces.
He found means, however, by the remittances of the states, to augment his army to twelve thousand men, with a train of thirty pieces of cannon; with which force he penetrated into Upper Saxony, took Zerbst by escalade, and put the garrison to the sword. He then spread terror to the very heart of Silesia; but his infantry being cut in pieces by Wal- lestein, in an action near the bridge of Dessau, he marched with his cavalry to the marche of Brandenburgh, where he began to recruit his army. All this while the bishop of Halberstadt was making a powerful diversion on the Wefer, and harrassing count Tilly, the Bavarian general's army, that great general being himself confined by sickness. The bishop profited by the opportunity; he hovered continually on the skirts of the imperial army, destroyed their forage, cut off their convoys, skirmished with their detachments, and proved a very troublesome enemy; when he was seized with an ardent fever, of which he died at Wol- fembuttel, to the excessive joy of all the inhabitants of the surrounding countries, who regarded the prelate as the scourge of the catholic religion, and a very Anti-Christ.

Manfveldt's
incursions,

THE states were forced to act defensively during this whole year, which produced nothing memorable. The civil divisions which again appeared in the provinces, obliged them to rely chiefly on the vigour of their partizan allies. Notwithstanding the people already tasted the sweets of prince Henry's gentle, moderate, and prudent government, the Arminian party, animated by the death of Maurice, formed a design of revenging their late sufferings; and by the exhortations of their banished brethren, began again to revive, and shew their implacable hatred to the house of Orange. The more moderate among them, however, endeavoured to prevail on the party to try the effects of more gentle measures, by soothing the prince, and requesting that they might experience that favour which they had reason to expect from his repeated intimations. Henry, out of respect to his brother's memory, and from an apprehension of disobliging the states, paid little regard to their remonstrances. He contented himself with general testimonies of esteem for Hugo Grotius, then at Paris, and with releasing from confinement Hoogerbert, pensionary of Ley- den. It is even supposed that he connived at the fresh persecution commenced in Am- sterdam and Leyden against this unhappy party. Here some persons of consideration in the government proposed, wholly to suppress Arminianism, and by prohibiting even the private exercise of the worship professed by the sect, and obliging them to subscribe to certain articles drawn up by the national church, at one blow to crush a faction which had caused so much trouble to the republic. These measures were pushed with violence;

they were opposed by all men of understanding, as equally unjust and impolitic; yet a possibly the debate might have given birth to a civil war, had not the general attention been seasonably diverted by a more important object.

THE great preparations of the Spaniards rendered it necessary, that the states should act with the utmost vigour and unanimity. The departure of Spinola from the Netherlands, gave the prince of Orange great hopes he should be able to retrieve the losses of the last campaign. He laboured diligently to put the army on the best footing, and had actually formed a corps of sixteen thousand foot and four thousand cavalry, which he commanded in person; together with another body of forces under the conduct of count Ernest Casimir, of twelve thousand soldiers. With this force the count invested Oldenzeel, which he reduced in the space of eight days, though defended by the famous Monel , a native of Franche Comt , in whom the archduchess had the utmost confidence, as he was the particular favourite of Spinola. On his side, the prince of Orange encamped near Cronenburgh, made a motion as if he proposed laying siege to Wessel, and erected a fort near Iffselburgh, to obstruct the works carried on by the Spaniards, to cut a canal from Rhimberg to Venlo. His great design was, to reduce fort Rieldrecht, on the frontiers of Flanders; for which purpose, leaving the main army under the direction of count Stirum, he embarked a considerable detachment in four hundred boats, collected on the Vaal, and set out on the enterprise, which was frustrated by the shallowness of the river, in consequence of a great drought. This expedition was succeeded by another against Linghen, in Westphalia, which likewise proved unfortunate. He now prepared to oppose with his whole army, the attempt to open a passage between the Meuse and the Rhine. During his absence, however, Stirum was attacked, defeated, and taken prisoner, by the count de Berg, who with an army covered the works. The conflict was bloody, and the chief advantage the enemy could boast was, that they made the Dutch general prisoner; and retired from the Dutch camp without being pursued, with about four pieces of cannon. So unexpected a blow could not fail of disconcerting the prince's measures; it likewise encouraged the Spaniards to form another project, little less important than the surprising count Stirum's camp. Spinola, who had not yet quitted the Netherlands, advised an attempt upon Sluys. Count Horn, with a choice body of troops, was detached upon this business, with orders to seize upon the harbour, the fate of which must determine that of the town; as cutting off all communication would effectually reduce the garrison to the necessity of surrendering; but the vigilance of the centinels disconcerted the whole scheme, just on the point of execution. The soldier, firing his piece on the approach of the Spaniards, alarmed the garrison; all flew to the ramparts; the count perceived he was discovered; but, determining to push his way, he approached quite to the draw-bridge, and was there saluted with such a volley of grape-shot as put his party in disorder, and obliged him to retreat with precipitation, his loss amounting to four hundred men, killed on the spot.

The Spaniards defeated in an attempt on Sluys.

AT this time Spinola was at Dunkirk, waiting the issue of the attempt on Sluys. He was greatly mortified to find it had miscarried, and spoke with resentment of the rashness of the count in exposing his men to certain death, after he was discovered. This made him advise the Spaniards to moderate their joy on account of the prince of Orange's late disappointments, which had miscarried through mere accident; their losses, he said, arose from misconduct<sup>p</sup>. It was here the court of Spain had erected an admiralty, of which Spinola was president. The new college, eager to distinguish its zeal, equipped a squadron, on occasion of the rupture with England, attacked the combined fleets of England and Holland destroyed four ships of war, and carried a great number of prizes into Dunkirk; but the Dutch soon repaired the loss and disgrace, by the defeat and capture of the large galleons, fitted out as men of war; and several advantages obtained over count Philip de Mansveldt.

THE more effectually to stop the courses of the Dunkirkers, the states provided a fleet of fifty cruisers in Holland and Zealand, to which Lewis XIII. joined seven large men of war, the finest ever built in France. Spinola endeavoured to provide for the security of all the ports which he feared might be insulted; and carefully concealing from the prince of Orange the scarcity of money, made such efforts as greatly exceeded expectation, and increased the reputation he already acquired for activity and address in the most difficult conjunctures. The troops which he ordered to file to the frontiers of the provinces, alarmed the states-general for Bergen-op-zoom, Grave, and Flushing, into which they put strong garrisons, supplying them with abundance of provision and military stores.

A. D. 1627.

As soon as the rigour of the season would permit, the prince of Orange advanced with his army between Nimeguen and Arnheim. This obliged the Spaniards to recal the prince of Iffselburgh, after he had been detached with two thousand men to join count Tilly, in a Lower Saxony, against the forces of Denmark and the circle. It was supposed the prince would undertake the siege of Wessel; to prevent which the count de Berg approached to Gueldres. Henry, however, either had no design upon Wessel, or he dropped it, in order to invest Groll, a town the most conveniently situated for the obtaining a clear, undisputable frontier. Success in the enterprise would likewise deprive the Spaniards of a place extremely conveniently situated for laying the adjacent territories of Overijssel, Drent, Twent, Groningen, and Friseland, under contribution. Thirty years before Groll had been reduced by prince Maurice; was retaken by Spinola ten years after; and now was besieged by prince Henry, with an army composed of one hundred and sixty-eight companies of infantry, fifty-five troops of cavalry, and a fine train of artillery. All the passes were immediately blocked up, and the trenches were formed with the utmost vigour. The garrison consisted only of twelve hundred men; but it was augmented by a number of the inhabitants, who formed themselves into companies, and performed excellent service. Old Dulken, a soldier of great valour and experience, was governor; but age and infirmity confining him to his chamber, he devolved the chief care upon Verreiken, an officer who had already distinguished his capacity. The count de Berg hovered round with his army, greatly incommoded the besiegers, and closely watched every opportunity of succouring the garrison, who shewed they were determined to act with the utmost spirit, by a sharp sally made on the quarter of Ernest of Nassau, which he repulsed after an obstinate conflict, though supported only by fifteen companies of infantry. The trenches were opened on the twentieth of July; the siege continued to the eighteenth of August, when the garrison, perceiving that their repeated sallies answered no purpose but to weaken themselves, and that they could expect no assistance from the count de Berg, began to relax in their vigour. A wound which the governor received in the shoulder, the demolition of the principal works, the dismounting of almost all the artillery, and the great strength of prince Henry's lines, which were incapable of being forced, greatly disheartened the garrison. They saw the English and French auxiliaries pushing their operations to the foot of the wall, and colonel Hauterive ready to spring a mine, which would open a vast breach; this determined them to send a trumpet to the prince, requesting leave to give the count de Berg notice of their situation: this being refused, the brave garrison renewed hostilities, made a vigorous sally, and filled the trenches with carnage. Their attack was exceedingly brisk, and nothing but the great superiority of the besiegers, and the prodigious strength of prince Henry's works, could have prevented this little garrison from cutting their way through to the army. At last they capitulated upon the same honourable conditions that Spinola granted to the city of Breda. Henry indeed rivalled the humanity of that great commander, and poured out civilities on the soldiers and inhabitants. Count Stirum was appointed governor, the old fortifications were repaired, and a variety of new works added.

Prince Henry reduces Groll.

SEVERAL enterprises which the Spaniards formed against Zealand miscarried; Groll was reduced, and Berg now appeared as unfortunate as Maurice and Henry had been the three preceding years. The prince of Orange pursued his advantages, and by several spirited attacks, and judicious operations, dislodged the enemy from all the posts they had to secure the navigation of the Scheld. He likewise harrassed them in Westphalia, in Brabant, and on the Wessel. But in the midst of these successes a rupture with England was apprehended. The English, on account of the depredations of the Dutch in the East-Indies, had detained three Dutch Indiamen, which had put in by stress of weather into Portsmouth. To demand restitution, the states sent an ambassador to the court of London; and, to give weight to their negotiations, ordered a strong fleet to be speedily equipped, under the conduct of admiral Orbel. This produced the effect; a promise was given of making immediate restitution; and a plan projected for uniting the two nations by a more close and intimate connection. The intention was to secure themselves against the depredations of the Dunkirkers, who incredibly annoyed the commerce of the Channel. The allies agreed to fit out a joint fleet of an hundred cruisers; but the terrible storms that came on in the month of October, and continued for several weeks, prevented the fleet from putting to sea, damaged them in the harbours, and dissipated the whole scheme, from which so much was expected. The French king laboured to dissolve this union between the crown of England and the United Provinces, for he was then busied in reducing his protestant subjects, powerfully assisted by Great-Britain. The most expeditious method of effecting his purpose was, to renew the treaty whereby the states engaged not to unite themselves with the enemies of France; nor was it difficult to procure this point, as the Dutch had now effectually answered the intention of uniting with England, having had restitution made of the East Indiamen, and relinquished the project against the Dunkirkers. The king readily allowed that the states should not commit hostilities against the English, notwithstanding they were his enemies; and they, in return, engaged not to afford them any assistance, and even to refrain from supplying the protestants of France with military stores. Soon after, however, the states-general, finding that their being restricted to conclude no peace, truce, or alliance, without the concurrence of Lewis, was injurious to their sovereignty, sent an embassy to procure an extensive and more honourable construction of that article of the treaty; which, after some difficulty, was granted.

Count Tilly
advances towards the frontiers of the provinces.

WHILE Spinola remained at Dunkirk, he continued to direct the operations in the Netherlands. Already the Dutch had found the happy effects of his not executing his schemes in person; and now they entertained the most sanguine hope of a fortunate issue to the war, as that celebrated officer was recalled to Spain, and his authority distributed among a variety of persons, all unequal to him in point of genius and application. The government, and civil affairs, were entrusted to the cardinal de Cueva and don Carlos Colonna; the count de Berg had the command of the army. But while the states were felicitating themselves on the prospect this change presented, they were alarmed by disturbances from another quarter, and the approach of count Tilly to East Friseland, Oldenburgh, and the bishopric of Munster. Sensible of the inconveniencies that would result from the vicinity of so troublesome an enemy, the states directed that the chief posts on the frontiers should be well secured. To ward off the impending blow with greater certainty, a new army of twelve thousand foot and five thousand horse, was raised; with which count Ernest was sent to oppose the count of Anhalt, lieutenant-general of the imperial army, and commander in chief of the troops of Cologne; but all this diligence and vigour could not prevent the enemy from gaining some considerable advantages. The young count of East Friseland, in order to pay his court to the emperor, found means to introduce an imperial garrison into Shikufen, and some other places, where the states had formed considerable magazines. This success elated Anhalt to such a pitch, that he summoned all the towns of West Friseland to submit; he levied contributions in Groningen, and exhorted the people to receive the imperial army; he made an attempt to surprise Emden, in which the states kept a strong garrison, but was disappointed. Still more to alarm the states, Tilly marched another body of troops towards Westphalia, and the duchies of Berg and Juliers. The count de Berg availed himself of this favourable conjuncture, and threw in a strong reinforcement into Linghen, threatened with a siege by prince Henry.

THE states imagining that the imperial army had some other object than renewing the disputes about the duchies of Juliers and Cleves, ordered a part of the army to file towards the Rhine, for the security of Rees and Emmeric. While the count de Berg was employed in Westphalia, they likewise made an attempt to surprise Strasburg fort, built for the defence of the new canal at Venlo; but they met with so warm a reception from the Spaniards, that they retreated with precipitation. This enterprise, though unsuccessful, hurried the return of the count de Berg to Guelderland, where he applied with diligence to put the canal in such a posture of defence, by redoubts and forts, as would deter the enemy from any future attempts. He also began two other canals towards the extremities of Brabant and Flanders, in order to prevent the incursions of the Hollanders, and particularly of the garrison of Bergen-op-zoom, whose perpetual attacks greatly retarded the fortifications which the archduchess was erecting at Saint Vliet. But what chiefly incommoded the Spaniards, was the presence of the prince of Orange, who continually passed from Lillo to Bergen-op-zoom, to cut off the communication betwixt Saint Vliet and Antwerp. With this view Henry constructed three considerable forts beyond Lillo, whence he often set fire to the new fortifications, and destroyed several valuable convoys of provision coming by water from Antwerp.

The various fortune of war.

IN all these expeditions and operations the Hollanders were successful; but fortune seemed to abandon them in Marstrand, where their forces were defeated by the count de Berg; nor did they succeed better by sea, the Dunkirk cruisers having taken above forty rich prizes since the commencement of the season. At the Hague these losses were attributed to the wretched situation of the finances, which prevented the states from keeping on foot a sufficient land-force, and equipping the necessary number of cruisers. This obliged them to make certain exactions in Juliers and Cleves, under pretence of procuring payment of a sum of money due to them from the elector of Brandenburgh. On the other hand, the Spaniards, who supported the claim of the duke of Newburgh, oppressed the miserable inhabitants with heavy contributions, under the name of taxes and the usual revenue, which they had a right to receive, while the war was supported at their expence. The people, equally oppressed by their friends and enemies, had recourse to the emperor's protection; and the court of Vienna was delighted with this fair opportunity of keeping the whole succession in sequestration, and of using Cleves and Juliers as their own a property, until one of the claimants should be reduced to cede his pretensions. Mandates were immediately published, declaring his imperial majesty's intention, forbidding all hostilities in the duchies, and requiring all foreign troops to quit the duchies of Cleves, Juliers, and Berg, with all their dependencies. This declaration was followed by instructions to count Tilly to advance with his army to support the emperor's intention. The first act of imperial authority exerted, was the banishing the Dutch protestant ministers out of Dortmonde, and restoring the catholic religion. The same was done in all the other places possessed by the states, in trust for the elector of Brandenburgh, where the imperialists found themselves superior in power. Ravensberg alone held out against the imperial commissaries, and protested against their authority, the magistrates declaring they would stand the consequences of a siege rather than submit. Tilly, perceiving their resolution, retired without attempting any thing against a little place which had shewn so obstinate an attachment to liberty. Emmeric and Rees were summoned, Tilly threatening them with all the horrors of war unless the catholic religion was immediately restored; but the garrison set him at defiance, and laughed at his menaces, perceiving that the prince of Orange and Stirum were both ready to succour them on the first motion of the imperialists. To shew the equity of their proceedings, the commissaries did not exempt the places in possession of the Spaniards from their visitations. Wherever there were protestant magistrates they were deposed, without regard to the capitulation with Spinola; the catholic schools and preachers were restored; and the utmost violences committed in Wessel before the people could be brought to submission. The duke of Newburgh lent his authority to those measures; but he perceived they were pushed too far, and that the people were more oppressed by the imperialists than they before were by the Hollanders and Brandenburghers. He complained to the court of Vienna, but obtained no satisfaction; and protestants and papists were left to bleed under the scourge of the most cruel tyranny.

THE elector of Brandenburgh equally suspected the designs of the court of Vienna, and represented her proceedings. To prevent therefore the troublesome and dangerous consequences of a sequestration in the hands of an ambitious grasping power, the competitors entered into a provisional agreement for twenty-one years; whereby they stipulated jointly to oppose all who, under the mask of friendship, violated their rights; and to stand by the partition that was made at the last negotiation. But, sensible that they could not force the Dutch and Spanish garrisons out of the towns they possessed, ambassadors were sent by both princes to Brussels and the Hague, requesting that the archduchess and the states would withdraw their troops, which would cut off all shadow of excuse from the emperor for continuing his oppressions. The states and the archduchess had too long tasted the sweets of those possessions, to renounce them merely from a principle of equity; they therefore returned equivocal answers, and thus, a second time, frustrated the effects of a treaty between the candidates, and deprived the inhabitants of the felicity they had reason to expect from so reasonable a partition.

A. D. 1628.

WHILE this affair was in agitation, the governors of Groll, Breford, Rees, Emmeric, and Soest, entered la Mark with a body of troops, to oppose the joint forces of the emperor and the king of Spain. Having thrown succours into Ravensberg, they attempted to surprise Ham, relying upon a correspondence which they maintained with some of the inhabitants; but a reinforcement expected from Stirum not arriving at the place of rendezvous, the scheme fell to the ground, and their friends in the town a prey to the enemy, who put them to the torture, and, on their confession, had them hanged, drawn, and quartered, as traitors. The garrison of Groll had better fortune; they surprised Rattingen, pillaged the town, and carried off some prisoners of distinction, and considerable booty. The garrison of Grave likewise seized upon a large convoy going from Brussels to Maastricht, in which were rich presents from the archduchess to the duke of Modena. Several other garrisons, encouraged by the example and success of Groll and Grave, made inroads into the Spanish territories, levied heavy contributions, and returned laden with plunder. A detachment from Emmeric fell into an ambuscade laid by the count de Berg; but determined to perish rather than surrender, the soldiers fought with the utmost fury, and, after an obstinate conflict, totally defeated and dispersed the Spaniards. The states had licensed these depredations; the scarcity of money obliging them to declare all the plunder the legal property of the captors; yet they could not avoid giving ear to the duke of Modena's complaints for the loss of his valuable presents. It was ordered that all which belonged to the duke should be restored; and to gratify the garrison, the sum of twenty-seven thousand florins was given them, as an equivalent.

Several advantages obtained by the Dutch garrisons.

* NUVILLE, lib. vi. cap. 12.

Dunkirk
blocked up.

MEAN TIME the new admiralty at Dunkirk, strictly observing the directions given by Spinola, became every day more formidable to Holland. The harbour was filled with rich prizes, and every day produced bankruptcies in Amsterdam. Their losses drove the Dutch merchants and seamen to despair; which made them enter into a league never to strike, but, if they found themselves overpowered, to blow up their vessels. To oppose the descents of the Dunkirkers, the states ordered all the coasts of Zealand and Holland to be carefully defended, for which purpose the boors were armed. Four thousand seamen were taken into the service, and all the natives of the provinces prohibited, under severe penalties, to enter into foreign fleets. A squadron of thirty ships was equipped, with orders to cruise along the French coast, and block up the harbour, while general Van Dort laid siege to the town of Dunkirk. A division of eight ships from this fleet having fallen in with a squadron of six Dunkirkers, a bloody engagement began; and, after an obstinate conflict, the Hollanders obtained a complete victory. One ship of the enemy was taken, and the rest so miserably shattered, that with the utmost difficulty they escaped. This success cleared the way for a fleet of rich homeward-bound Indiamen, which otherwise would probably have been taken. The siege of Dunkirk, however, went on but slowly; and it was at last proposed to block up the harbour by a chain of vessels faced with stone, and thereby made as strong as a wall; but, on trial, the project failed, and the projector was rewarded with ridicule. The East India company, however, lent their assistance to the government, to check the presumption of the Dunkirkers; and joined to the fleet already stationed before that harbour, a squadron of twelve fine men of war, which did not diminish the number of ships sent the following year to Asia; from whence we may judge of the great opulence of the company at this period.

Naval affairs.

THE measures of the West India company were not less vigorous, and they proved more fortunate. They had taken a great number of rich Spanish and Portuguese single merchantmen; they had destroyed whole fleets in the ports of Lisbon, Corunna, and Cadiz; and now their admiral, Peter Adrien, with a squadron of twelve ships, fell in with a Spanish fleet in the gulph of Honduras. He attacked the enemy with irresistible impetuosity, drove their ships upon the sand-banks, and, after obliging them to strike, took out their valuable cargoes and the prisoners, set fire to the prizes, and arrived safe with his booty in Holland, to the great joy and emolument of the company. But the instrument destined by providence to remove the great disorders in the finances, to enable the states to prosecute the war with redoubled vigour, and to raise the West India company to a rivalship with the company trading to the East Indies, was admiral Peter Heine. This bold and active officer defeated and destroyed a fleet of Spanish merchantmen and men of war in the bay of All-Saints, bringing home so prodigious a cargo of sugar as lessened the price of that commodity at every market in Europe. Encouraged by this success, the company equipped a squadron of thirty one ships, with design to intercept the plate-fleet. Heine was appointed the commander in chief; nor did his good fortune once desert him through the whole course of the expedition. In the month of May he set sail for Mexico, desolating, as he went along, the coasts of Spain and Portugal. He arrived at the Havannah, in the island of Cuba; where he expected to fall in with the flota, part of which was driven off by a storm to the coast of Florida, just as the ships were ready to put in to the Havannah. As to the flota from New Spain, it fell intirely into the hands of the Dutch admiral, after a faint resistance, and was valued worth fifteen millions of livres, in chests of silver and rich merchandize. This was the richest prize ever made by the Hollanders; the admiral therefore thought he could not be too cautious in an affair which so nearly concerned the republic; for this reason he set sail directly for Europe, arrived in Holland with the loss only of one prize, and two of his own ships, that foundered in a storm, which rose just as he had entered the chops of the channel. Heine was received with as much honour as the princes of Orange had been after the most signal victories. Bonfires were kindled in every town throughout the seven provinces, and the people flocked from all quarters to behold him as a prodigy. Nothing was to be heard but the ringing of bells, the roar of cannon, and the shouts of the multitude. Peter Heine was publicky entertained by the prince of Orange, in company with the king of Bobemia, the elector palatine, and the ambassadors of crowned heads. He had the honour of knighthood conferred on him; a civic crown, in gold, was wrought by the hands of the magistrates of Amsterdam to adorn his temples; and he was raised to the dignity of admiral of Holland, in the room of William of Nassau, killed at the siege of Groll, and with fuller powers than any of his predecessors had ever enjoyed.

The Spanish

WHEN the whole wealth of the flota was landed, an infinity of persons of fashion crowded to see the curiosity; which proved fatal to the prince palatine, and had almost been so to the elector, the barge in which they were being overset, and the young prince drowned.

a drowned. After a minute calculation of the value of the cargo, the directors of the company divided fifty per cent. among the proprietors; a measure that was most bitterly censured by all judicious persons, who wished well to the establishment. The money would have been better employed, as they thought, in establishing such a head-colony in America, as the East India company possessed at Batavia; and this was the more necessary, as the society was now engaged in a bloody war with the Spaniards and Portuguese, without enjoying a foot of land in the Brazils, since the loss of St. Salvador.

The public rejoicings, which continued at Amsterdam during the whole month of January, were at last interrupted by a tumult that arose, because certain burghers refused to obey the magistrates who happened to be Arminians. The prince of Orange, who perceived the consequences to the state of keeping up the old fac-

b tions, resolved to abolish all party distinction, by supporting merit indiscriminately in the pursuit of public offices; it was supposed that by his interest the present magistrates had gained their election. This gave great umbrage to the Gomarists, who resented to see a proscribed set of men, the old and implacable enemies of the prince's family, now taken into his favour, and placed upon an equality with those who had always supported his interest. The whole mob of Amsterdam assembled to espouse the cause of the citizens who had refused to obey the Arminian magistrates; and Henry detached a party of twelve hundred soldiers to quell the tumult, and take the chief mutineers into custody. At the next assembly of the states an ordonnance passed, whereby the people were required to c obey the magistrates, of whatever sect or religion they happened to profess themselves. The most riotous in the late tumult were confined, or mulcted in proportion to the degree of their guilt; and this severity so irritated the Gomarists, that great numbers retired to Zealand. William Bogwert, one of the most eminent, a person who was the tool of the Gomarist clergy, going out of the city, to execute the sentence of the exile passed upon him, was met by six thousand people, weeping and tearing their hair, all pouring out their benedictions, and regarding him as a martyr to religion. On his approaching Haerlem, crowds of people went out to meet him as another Stephen, and a saint who had suffered for his faith; without reflecting that no true mode of religion can be contrary to the dictates of nature and moral virtue, which enjoin order, and a strict regard to the laws

d of society. This sedition was scarcely appeased, when another, of a more dangerous nature arose among the seamen who had served under admiral Heine to the West Indies. They complained that the company had not only refused to augment their wages, but to admit them to any share of the immense wealth brought to the state by their courage. Filled with resentment at this usage, they began forcing and pillaging the company's warehouses, in which all the rich merchandize was lodged. A party of soldiers was immediately sent against them, but this would have proved insufficient had they not been gratified with a considerable sum of money; after the division of which they retired quietly, and again offered their services to the company, to assist in manning the new squadron equipping for a fresh expedition. e This fleet was composed of sixty stout vessels, and destined to reduce Peru, Mexico, and the Brazils; in a word, all that was valuable of the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in South America. However, the great expences of this armament did not prevent the company from advancing a large sum to enable them to pursue the war with vigour, and raise an army with which the prince of Orange should be able to make head against the enemy.

f THERE could not be a more terrible stroke to the Spaniards than the loss of the fleet. Already their military operations were at a stand for want of money, and the troops in every quarter were ready to mutiny. It was an additional grievance to see the money, with which they hoped to be masters of all the Netherlands, now employed to their destruction. The vast preparations making in Holland, since the month of February, threw the court of Brussels into despair. Many lords, and other persons of distinction and influence, took this opportunity of expressing their dislike of the measures of the administration, and the methods in which the war had been conducted. They threw the whole blame of the present misfortunes upon the Spaniards. To their jealousy they attributed Spinola's resignation, though he was the chief bulwark of the state; they accused them of rapacity, profusion, ignorance, and cowardice. The country, they said, was oppressed depopulated, and enslaved; their bad policy excited the resentment of the natives, merited the contempt of the enemy, and would soon produce the loss of the Netherlands. They complained that all preferments were bestowed on foreigners; to them was committed the defence of the frontiers, and to them ought to be imputed the loss of Groll, and all insults received during the last campaign; by which the inhabitants were reduced to beggary, the country desolated, and the court disgraced. The Spaniards, they affirmed, refused to bbeey the prince of Berg, the only person of high condition among them, who was capable a of conducting an army. It was the business of the prince of Orange to profit by these divisions at the court of Brussels, and the difficulty of putting the troops in motion; nor did he let slip the opportunity. Marching his army towards the frontiers of Brabant, he reviewed his whole force at Nimeguen, including the troops of France and England; sent his artillery and baggage to the Meuse, and publicly confessed his design of laying siege to Boisleduc. His army amounted to 32,000 men, divided into forty-three battalions, and three large brigades, besides a reinforcement of 6000 men, sent afterwards by the states, with a train of sixty pieces of cannon. The town was invested in the night of the 30th of April; though the governor Anthony Schets could not be persuaded till the next morning, that the enemy b would be so rash as to attack a place of such strength and importance. Boisleduc, called the Maid of Brabant, because it had never surrendered, though often besieged, was so regularly fortified as to be deemed impregnable. It was scarce accessible on account of the dykes and marshes with which it was surrounded, and required a large army completely to invest the vast extent of walls, fortified with seven strong bastions, defended by an immense wet ditch with canals and sluices, by means of which the water might be admitted or excluded at pleasure, and the whole country, if necessary, laid under water. A variety of strong out-works obstructed the approach of an enemy; and nothing was wanting, that art or nature c could give, to render this the most impregnable town in the Netherlands. Prince Henry fixed his quarters opposite to the center of the town, at the village of Vucht, behind fort Isabella. Under him served immediately the French, and part of the English forces. Count Ernest Casimir was posted to the north-east, at the village of Hintem; count William of Nassau had his quarters on the north side; the baron Brederode directed the siege to the south-east; count Solms was situated at the village of Ingelen, with the stores of provision and ammunition; while general Pinsen presided at the operations carrying on to the westward of Boisleduc.<sup>u</sup>

ALL Brabant was overwhelmed with consternation, and the court of Brussels in the utmost perturbation, upon advice that prince Henry had begun his approaches. The most pressing messages were dispatched to Spain for money, ammunition, and the requisites for putting the troops in motion. Schets, though labouring under a thousand discouraging circumstances, destitute of officers, and a sufficient garrison, determined to make d a vigorous defence; well knowing the importance of his trust. With the prince of Orange's permission, he sent away all the women, children, and others, who served only to consume provisions; and placed his whole confidence in a garrison not exceeding two thousand three hundred infantry, and six troops of cavalry; notwithstanding several companies of burghers had formed themselves under his banners. He omitted practising nothing which long experience had taught him was necessary for his defence, resolving to maintain the great reputation he had acquired by a series of faithful, and important services. A seasonable reinforcement of eight hundred men, from Breda, slipped in with much address, on the fifth night of the siege, greatly animated the garrison and governor. The prince laboured to deprive them of all future succours, and pushed his works with e the utmost vigour, assisted by the peasants in the neighbourhood. In ten days his camp was surrounded by a deep ditch, which received the waters of three rivers, whereby the troops were supplied with all manner of provisions with ease and security. He began to build a great number of forts and batteries, in order to cut off the enemy from any communication with the river, in which he succeeded beyond expectation; turning the waters, intended for the defence of the town, to the great inconvenience of the garrison. For fifteen days had the besieged regarded the progress of these works without giving any considerable annoyance, from an apprehension of exhausting their ammunition. Great quantities of powder had been damaged by the influx of the waters into the town; so that the first sallies were made sword-in-hand, without the use of firelocks. The governor, f to prevent the soldiers from being dispirited, pretended that this was matter of choice, carefully concealing his great want of ammunition; and the troops, glad of an opportunity of shewing their valour, always behaved with the utmost gallantry (A). The batteries and trenches being finished, prince Henry played with fury against the forts Isabella and St. Antonio. The marechal Chatillon, at the head of the French, drove the garrison

(A) We are credibly informed that the gallant marshal Keith made use of the same stratagem to conceal his want of ammunition, in that unfortunate action in which he was slain, in the service of his Prussian majesty; and that it was attended with singular success.

When the sword or bayonet are used, the soldier naturally imagines he has a better opportunity of distinguishing his address and courage, than when the whole depends upon levelling a musket.

- a from their out-works, on the first day of June, and pursued them quite to the gates of the town. Another body of French, commanded by Hauterive, lodged themselves in the counterescarp of fort Isabella, and were attacking the horn-work. The viscount Turenne, who was nephew to the prince of Orange, served at this siege, commanded a company of foot, and signalized himself in so extraordinary a manner as attracted the attention of the whole army. In every desperate attack, in every difficult situation, there the young warrior presented himself, with all the calmness of a philosopher. To him it was owing that another corps of six hundred men, from Breda, had not entered Boisseduc; with a party of three hundred men he totally defeated the enemy, and continued the pursuit, notwithstanding two painful wounds he had received. The French and English were rivals b on this occasion; the officers, and even the private men, being animated with a desire of particularly distinguishing themselves; yet, as no breach could be effected, no other opportunity offered than when the enemy sallied.

At last fatigue and repeated sallies had greatly diminished the number of the garrison, when their spirits were suddenly revived by the approach of count Henry de Berg, with an army of twenty-five thousand men. The count attacked the entrenchments of the besiegers, and met with a warm reception. In three successive attempts upon the camp he was foiled, and driven back with great slaughter; upon which he retired to join Montecuculi, who had entered Cleves with an army of fourteen thousand foot and three thousand horse. Henry found by intercepted letters, that the design was to make a considerable diversion; for this reason he ordered Grave to be put in a state of defence, and directed the c states to secure all the passes and avenues to the provinces. He then pushed his operations with so much spirit, that fort Isabella surrendered on the eighteenth of July, and fort Antonio the succeeding day, after the besieged had made two desperate sallies, in which the trenches were filled with carnage. The garrison, having done every thing that valour and conduct could effect, retired in good order to the town, and there seconded the endeavours of the brave governor. By the surrender of these two forts, reduced to heaps of ashes, they were at liberty to approach the town, and to point their cannon directly against the walls. Schets, who wanted men, powder, and provision, laboured to destroy his works. The most vigorous sallies were made, but to little purpose; the great superiority of the d besiegers repulsing every attempt*.

MEANTIME count Stirum was detached with four thousand foot and twelve hundred horse, to oppose count Berg, who was meditating an invasion of the provinces. He crossed the Yssel without resistance, but was vigorously attacked in the rear by Stirum. Not long after Stirum was reinforced by three thousand men, from the camp before Boisseduc, with which he ventured to give battle, on the banks of the Yssel, to a corps of ten thousand Spaniards, under the conduct of Dulkens, late governor of Groll. The action was bloody and obstinate for the space of ten hours, when, most of the Dutch officers being wounded, the count was obliged to retire with great loss. He had, however, the precaution to break down the dykes behind him, by which means he obstructed the enemy's march into the provinces, overwhelmed with the terror of an invasion. On advice of Stirum's defeat, the prince of Orange quitted the camp with more than half his army, and was soon joined by several corps of auxiliaries, troops drawn from the garrisons, and new-levied forces; so that his army amounted to twenty-two thousand men, besides the troops left to carry on the siege. The enemy made excursions almost to the gates of Amsterdam; but they were soon thrown into despondency by the reduction of Wesel, which was surprised by the governor of Emmeric, and the garrison put to the sword, all except the governor, Lozzane, who was set at liberty, and soon after beheaded at Brussels, by order of the archduchess, for having, by his remissness, occasioned the loss of so valuable a city. The reduction of Wesel, in which the enemy had all their magazines, obliged f them to raise the siege of Hattem, abandon Amersford, evacuate the territory of Velaw, and repass the Yssel with precipitation; joined to the divisions among the general officers, it rendered fruitless the vast expence of raising an army of thirty thousand men, the last effort of Spain against the United Provinces, and enabled prince Henry to push the siege of Boisseduc without interruption.

STILL the garrison of this place, though cut off from all hope of relief, continued to make a vigorous defence; but the burghers and clergy, terrified with the effects of bombs and mines, besought the magistrates, with tears in their eyes, to avoid being pillaged, by requiring a capitulation. Moved with their distress, the magistrates resolved to grant their request, should the governor remain obstinate in refusing honourable conditions.
g Schets paid little regard to the safety of the town; his whole aim was to gain reputation, and make such a defence as should deserve to be recorded to future ages. Though he had

powder but for a few rounds, notwithstanding his garrison was quite spent, emaciated, and diminished to a third of the number, he would have stood the consequences of an assault, after some practicable breaches had been made, were not the magistrates resolute to surrender the city. This obliged him to accept the advantageous proposals, and the military honours offered by the prince. Accordingly the garrison marched out, and was conducted to Diest; and as to the inhabitants, they were confirmed in all their privileges, and liberty of conscience was permitted. Thus ended the siege of Boisleduc, by which the reputation of prince Henry was raised to an equality with that of prince Maurice, and of the first generals of the age. His camp was filled with volunteers of the highest distinction; by whom his perseverance, steadiness, prudence, valour, and conduct, were published in every quarter of Europe. The conquest cost the states an immense sum of money; but the advantages flowing from it were so great, as to absorb every other consideration.

PRINCE Henry was no sooner in possession of Boisleduc, than he detached count Ernest Casimir, with a hundred and fifty companies of foot, and thirty troops of horse, to oppose count John de Nassau and Dulkens; who, in consequence of a reinforcement from Tilly, were preparing to make a fresh irruption into the provinces. Ernest acquitted himself with such diligence, that, having thrown a bridge over the Yffel, he was encamped on the opposite side, before the enemy had an idea they should meet with any obstruction. Reinforcing the garrisons of Doesburg and Keppel, he cut off the enemy's convoys, and their communication with count Tilly's army; insomuch that, to avoid perishing by famine, they were forced to retire precipitately to the bishopric of Munster, and petition Ernest for a safe-conduct. Colonel Hauterive likewise passed the Rhine with forty companies of infantry and fourteen troops of dragoons; and, laying siege to the strong fortress of Ringelburgh, took it by assault, in the space of ten hours, putting the garrison to the sword. Thence he marched to Yffelburgh, which he reduced in four days. With the same rapidity he subdued all the towns and forts which, from their situation, proved extremely troublesome to the Dutch garrison in Wesel, and filled the whole country with terror and desolation. The new garrison of Wesel were no less eager to distinguish their zeal and valour. Dividing themselves into three corps, one of which remained for the defence of the town, they sallied out in quest of plunder and glory. One division attacked Rhimberg, and was roughly handled by the Spanish garrison. The other was more fortunate. Having attacked Duisburgh in the night, it surrendered before the morning to the Hollanders. All the other places possessed by the Spaniards on the hither side the Rhine, and in the duchy of Cleves, soon yielded to the good fortune of this little party. In a word, the Spaniards were every where defeated, dispirited, desponding; since the sieges of Boisleduc and Wesel, they scarce ventured to hold up their heads, face the enemy in the field, or refuse complying with a summons, though secured behind walls. It was matter of surprize to see the strong fortress of Roeborte, defended by a garrison more numerous than the besiegers, surrendering at discretion; after having exchanged a few shot. This could only be accounted for the universal panic that prevailed *.

Nassau's expeditions,

COUNT William of Nassau was the soul of these spirited expeditions. On advice that the elector of Cologne, and the bishops of Munster and Paderborn, were taking measures to assist the enemy, he sent them a peremptory order to desist from these designs, otherwise they would oblige him to lay their territories desolate. This menace produced the desired effect; they dropped their project, and suffered the count to go on with his expeditions without interruption. He reduced Berg, attacked Solingen, and carried the place sword-in-hand, giving the town up to be pillaged by his soldiers. A variety of other places submitted to him; he was weakened with leaving garrisons in his conquests; but this did not prevent his reducing the town of Ongermunde, the magistrates of which capitulated. William's soldiers, insolent with success, and excited by their late plunder to desire more, fell a pillaging the town without regard to the capitulation; which so incensed the burghers, that they took arms, attacked the Hollanders, and were on the point of driving the conquerors out of the town, when count William arrived with the troops encamped without the walls, and put an end to the combat, by obliging both parties to submit to the capitulation. In consequence of those conquests, the whole duchy of Fuliers was in a manner depopulated; the people deserting their habitations in the country, and flocking in crowds to all the fortified cities. Cologne, Munster, Cleves, and Berg, were much in the same situation. But the Hollanders published an edict, whereby they declared their sole intention was to oblige the Spaniards to evacuate the succession of Fuliers, and promising the natives all the protection in their power. This declaration restored, in some measure, the peace of the country; the people returned to their usual occupations, and were not a alarmed at the progress of the Dutch conquests, considering they could not suffer by a mere change of masters, the Spaniards having treated them with great insolence and tyranny.

To this rapid course of good fortune in the Netherlands, the Dutch added a variety of Naval affairs: successes in Asia and America. Notwithstanding the East-India company were engaged in a bloody war with the emperor of Java, during which Batavia was twice besieged, their returns were immense<sup>r</sup>. This induced them to rival the generosity and public spirit of the West India company, by making the government a present of five hundred thousand pounds weight of salt-petre. The last-mentioned company, determining to pursue their late good fortune, and to establish a head-settlement in South America, which might vie with Batavia, b sent a powerful squadron to those seas, under the conduct of admiral Loncke, the companion and the friend of Heine in all his expeditions. In the month of February he arrived on the coast of Fernambuco, the largest division of Brasil, and detached Vardenburch with sixteen men of war and three thousand land-forces, to invest Olinda, the capital; but the resistance made by the out-forts obliged the fleet to reunite, and determined the admiral to attack the city with his whole strength. Vardenburch retained the command of the army, which was immediately debarked in three divisions, under the conduct of the generals Elts, Honcks, and Steincallefeld, who repulsed the Portuguese in three successive attacks they made to obstruct their landing. The Hollanders began their approaches towards the Jesuits quarter of the city, and soon took their college by assault, though strongly fortified. In consequence, Olinda surrendered; and the reduction of the capital was followed d by the submission of the whole district of Fernambuco, quite to cape St. Augustine. The West India company acquired great reputation by this expedition; and they were already considered as in possession of all Brasil, as general Vardenburch had in his letters extolled the great advantages of the reduction of Olinda, which, he said, gave the Hollanders such a footing, that the whole country might be reduced at a small expence. The public hope was augmented by the further successes of the armament. Leaving a strong garrison in Olinda, the admiral repassed the line, fell upon the town of St. Martha, and pillaged the inhabitants. Soon after he engaged Frederic de Toledo, sent with a strong squadron and five thousand troops, to the succour of the Spanish settlements; whom he defeated, c after an obstinate and exceeding bloody conflict, in which the Spanish admiral was, for several months, supposed to have perished. His ship being separated from the rest of the squadron in the engagement, foundered at sea; and Toledo with a few of his crew were saved by a miracle. Such a flow of success encouraged the company to fit out another fleet, which set sail, towards the close of the year, to complete their conquests.

A. D. 1630.

As soon as the season permitted, William of Nassau renewed his expeditions against the Spaniards, who still possessed some considerable places on the frontiers of the succession of Juliers. He defeated divers parties of the enemy, took their convoys, and was attended with all the good fortune of the preceding campaign. The first project that failed was one he formed against Dusseldorp. A party of soldiers was sent in the habits of women, e to seize upon that town, but they were discovered and disappointed. Next he failed in an attempt to surprise Mulheim, garrisoned by a body of Imperialists. The detachment of five thousand men, which he had sent upon that business, was surprised and repulsed by two thousand of the enemy. Indeed all the count's schemes were so refined and ideal, as well as dangerous, that to succeed they required the utmost good fortune and address. They were so connected with each other, that the failure of one occasioned a general disappointment; though it proved otherwise in the present case, for William was successful on the opposite side of the Rhine, though all his projects against Dusseldorp and Mulheim had been baffled. The town of Sichtelen, and a variety of other places held by Spanish or Austrian garrisons, submitted to the Hollanders. These rapid victories, and so long a series f of prosperity, however, raised a powerful confederacy against the count of Nassau. All the catholic princes on the frontiers of the provinces were alarmed. They gave out that the Dutch wanted to penetrate as far as Frankfort, and to throw themselves into the Palatinate, there to revive all the horrors of a war which had for ages desolated that country. It was affirmed their intention was to restore Frederic V. despoiled of his electorate and dignities; a project which the emperor thought himself particularly interested to obstruct. The elector of Cologne and the bishops of Munster and Paderborn, though over-awed by William of Nassau, privately solicited the emperor to oppose the states of the United Provinces, and protect the catholic religion and the dignity of the empire, which suffered extremely by permitting a handful of rebellious heretics to pursue unmolested, a course g of the most cruel tyranny and oppression. His imperial majesty lent a willing ear to the suggestions of the catholic princes; and fearing that the count de Hanau would declare for the Dutch, because he refused admitting an imperial garrison into his city, he ordered all the avenues to be blocked up, and Hanau to be in a manner besieged by the imperial army. This obliged the count to admit the emperor's troops, who were a few months after driven out by the Swedes.

Farther operations in Juliers and Cleves.

ALL this time the Dutch were employed in the entire reduction of the succession of Juliers. On advice that the Spaniards were building a new fort on the canal between the Rhine and the Meuse, the governor of Wesel, making draughts out of his own and the nearest garrisons, detached colonel Iselstein to disturb the works, and if possible ruin the fort. His detachment amounted to nine hundred men, with which he ventured to attack count John of Nassau with a body of fifteen hundred foot and horse, defeated and took him prisoner after an obstinate engagement. This and other advantages gained by the Hollanders, determined the duke of Newburgh to repair in person to the Hague, to solicit the consent of the states to the partition-treaty lately concluded between him and the elector of Brandenburg. The states, perceiving that the Spaniards refused to evacuate Orsoy and Sittert, could not be prevailed upon to surrender Emmeric, Rees, and Wesel, with their dependent towns and territories. At last the archduchess consented to withdraw her troops entirely from the duchies of Cleves and Juliers; upon which the states began to relax a little from their former rigour, condescending to cede all their conquests, except the three towns just mentioned<sup>a</sup>. With this concession the duke of Newburgh was forced to rest satisfied; accordingly he took his leave, and returned to Germany.

Proposals for a truce.

IT was immediately after this negotiation that the court of Brussels made proposals for a truce between the arch-duchess and the states, for the space of 34 years, upon the same conditions offered twenty-one years before. The remittances necessary for the support of the war were entirely stopped at Madrid, and the catholic king seemed to take little concern in the event of the war carried on in the Netherlands. A treaty of commerce between the catholic and protestant provinces, about this time, had somewhat diminished that implacable animosity which had for so long a time subsisted between them. This, with a variety of other circumstances, the archduchess hoped would dispose both parties to listen to the means of establishing the tranquillity of the seventeen provinces, after a bloody war of sixty years duration. It was well known at the Hague that necessity dictated the proposals to the archduchess; however, they did not chuse absolutely to reject propositions, which might turn out more to the advantage of the provinces than even a successful war. After the conferences held at Rosendal, for the exchange of prisoners, the archduchess's deputies proceeded to the Hague, because the Dutch deputies had no instructions to enter upon the business of a truce. Opinions were divided in the assembly of the states general. Some persuaded themselves that an accommodation with Spain would incur the resentment of France; they urged, that while the republic had nothing to fear, it was absurd to consent to a truce, which was only giving the enemy time to recover their exhausted strength and spirits; and that Holland being now opulent by the wealth of the Indies, and powerful by the reduction of Boisseduc and Wesel, the two ramparts of the United Provinces, ought in her turn to treat the Spaniards with that haughtiness and insolence, of which they were so profuse in their prosperity. Those of a contrary opinion supported their sentiments by a variety of arguments, tending to evince, that a suppliant humbled enemy ought not to be despised; that the chance of war was uncertain; and that those who were this year at the very pinnacle of fortune, might next season be reduced to the lowest abyss of distress. These general reflections they corroborated by the sentiments of the late excellent patriot, Barneveldt, who, with the consent of the French king, had urged pacific measures in 1609. They might possibly have carried their point, had not cardinal Richlieu, bent upon retrenching the power of the house of Austria, traversed the negotiation, by means of the sieur de Bouguy, sent in quality of ambassador to the Hague<sup>a</sup>. This artful minister practised so ingeniously on the temper of the states, that, instead of concluding a truce with Spain, they renewed the alliance with France, then at war with the catholic monarch. The treaty differed but little from that signed in 1627, but never ratified. Here, as in the former, the states consented to enter upon no truce, treaty of peace, engagement, or alliance, without the consent of his most christian majesty. They likewise promised to assist him with troops, ammunition, cannon, &c. as soon as his army should enter upon hostilities in Artois, Hainault, and the other countries belonging to the Spaniards; the king, on his part, stipulating to pay a considerable subsidy to the states, and to employ the same number of forces in the Netherlands, which he had hitherto maintained. All the measures taken by Spain and the court of Brussels, to promote a truce, were disconcerted. No regard was paid to the Flemish deputies at the Hague; they were treated with the utmost contempt, and in danger of being openly insulted. An answer to their proposals was published, under the title of the Anti-truce; in which the courts of Spain and Brussels were lashed with a great severity, and indeed very little decency. Yet did not this discourage the archduchess from proceeding in her pacific designs. She had recourse to the mediation of England, and hoped to gain an influence with the mediator, by procuring the restoration of the elector palatine, brother-in-law to Charles, and nephew to the prince of Orange. The states themselves were likewise interested in seeing this unhappy prince re-established in the electoral dignity and his dominions; however regard for the prince did not operate so powerfully as was expected. They suffered themselves to be solicited for the space of four months by the British ambassador, and at last returned for answer, that when they had any thoughts of concluding a truce, they would acquaint their ally the king of Great Britain with their intentions. This put an end to the negotiation, and obliged the Spaniards to make the best preparations in their power for the renewal of hostilities.

WHILE the prince of Orange was employed in the siege of Boisleduc, the Hollanders supported a vigorous war against the new admiralty formed at Dunkirk, which had struck such terror since the reduction of Breda, and the excellent regulations made by Spinola. The losses sustained by the Dutch merchants obliged the states to encrease their marine, and send the merchant ships under strong convoys. Early this season a powerful squadron put to sea, under the conduct of the new admiral of Holland, Peter Heine, and next day fell in with three Spanish men of war on the coast of Flanders. An action ensued, and Heine was killed by a cannon-bullet at the first broad-side; but his lieutenant concealing his death carefully, the mariners continued to fight with spirit, and the three Spanish ships were taken, and carried into Rotterdam, where the admiral's death was first divulged (A). This last defeat gave a considerable check to the Dunkirkers, and diffused a spirit of discontent and mutiny through the Spanish army and garrisons; who could not but attribute to misconduct, that the wealth intended for their maintenance should be the means of their destruction; and those very sums destined for their pay, enriching their enemies, and purchasing them all the conveniencies of life, while they were pining under all the miseries of hunger and nakedness. Crouds of deserters came over every day from Breda, and the other Spanish garrisons. Even the officers in the count de Berg's army quitted the service, and enlisted with the states. The peasants were oppressed with contributions, and the nobility incensed at the insolence of the Spaniards, and the preference given to foreigners. Even the clergy murmured, and declaimed against the remissness of the government, and lamented the danger that threatened religion. All these disorders, all these grievances, were charged by the natives on the proud foreigners, who enjoyed every emolument arising from places, pensions, and preferments, without contributing at all to the relief, the ease, and the security of the people. The states of the clergy and nobility assembled, to deliberate on the present situation of affairs, and the means of applying remedies to oppressions altogether unsupportable. Many persons were for submitting to the Hollanders, without regard to the protestant religion, which they had established, and their declared opposition to the catholic faith; but others, touched with conscience, and strongly attached to the religion of their ancestors, proposed deputing the archbishop of Mecklin and the duke d'Arfchot, to the arch-duchess, to represent to her the grievances of which the people complained; all of which had their rise in the preference shewn to foreigners. They gave her to understand, that, on condition they were not saddled with the ministers and officers of the Spanish court, they would willingly give up all the assistance in troops, and remittances in money, expected from that kingdom; not doubting but they should be able to defend their religion and liberty, under the general authority of his catholic majesty and the archduchess. The good princess heard their complaints, felt for their misfortunes, and promised to do all in her power to redress them. With this view she sent the count de Solre into Spain; but the duke de Olivarez destroyed the effects of her remonstrances. Disappointed in this hope, the archduchess endeavoured to ease her subjects, by opening a free intercourse of trade between them and the states of the United Provinces<sup>b</sup>; and as the Hollanders and the prince of Orange shewed no dislike to this project, she mistook their attachment to commerce for an inclination to renew the conferences for a truce; but soon perceived that they were resolved to pursue their good fortune, until a proper barrier, and firmer security were procured for the republic.

(A) The admiral's remains were conducted with great solemnity to Delft, where they were interred with the utmost pomp and magnificence, in the great cemetery set aside for the monuments of illustrious persons, who have done their country important services. Deputies from the states general and the states of Holland and Zeland, the directors of the East and West India companies, all the different corporations at Amsterdam, and a great number of persons of distinction, honoured the funeral with their presence. A superb monument, graced with the relation of his exploits, was erected at the public expence, and Peter's memory continues at this day to be admired, honoured, and esteemed.

Richlieu makes an attempt to seize upon the city of Orange.

SINCE the late treaty with France, cardinal Richlieu directed the counsels of the states general, and soon discovered that all his good offices towards the republic had their source in self-interest. While he was caressing the states, and cajolling the people with the hope of powerful succours from the French king, he was secretly contriving the means of seizing on the town of Orange, and the patrimony of prince Henry. For some time he had maintained a clandestine correspondence with the sieur de Walkemburg, governor of the city, who, notwithstanding he was the great favourite of the prince his master, could not avoid lending an ear to the bewitching solicitations of Richlieu, who of all men best understood the human heart, and most successfully employed the talent of seduction. Walkemburg consented to surrender the place to the cardinal for the sum of four hundred thousand livres in money, and an estate in Provence of twenty thousand livres in value; but insisting upon being put in possession of the whole, before he admitted a French garrison, the negotiation was protracted, and the prince had some intimation of his infidelity. The government of the town and citadel was triennial; but the prince, out of regard for Walkemburg, broke through the rule, and continued him in the government beyond the usual time. Immediately, on advice of his treachery, the office was bestowed on Knuyth a Zealander, who pursued his instructions with great address, assembled a body of troops with the utmost expedition and privacy, got possession of the city, blocked up Walkemburg in the house of a burgher where he had dined, killed him in a scuffle that ensued on his refusing to surrender, and then laid siege to the citadel, which the lieutenant-governor gave up, on being informed of Walkemburg's death, and Knuyth's commission. This laid the foundation of that rivetted aversion which the prince ever afterwards entertained for the cardinal, and opposition to the grandeur of the house of Bourbon, constantly shewn upon all occasions by the succeeding princes of the family of Orange.

The stadtholder-ship made hereditary.

THE prudence, the valour, and the great moderation of prince Henry had raised him to a higher degree of credit with the states and the people, than even his brother or father had acquired. Perceiving that he had no intention to abuse his authority, or encroach on the liberties of his country, they resolved to testify their gratitude, by rendering the stadtholdership hereditary in his family, and raising his son to the office of general of the cavalry, though then only in the fifth year of his age. These acts of acknowledgment were accompanied by particular demonstrations of the joy of the people; and a solemn deputation from the states general waited upon the prince with the strongest assurances of their esteem and gratitude. The young prince's commission was presented in a gold casket, and compliments were poured in daily from the states of all the provinces. But the attention required to these ceremonials did not divert Henry from the business of the state; he resolved to shew himself worthy of his new honours, by a double portion of diligence. Assembling his army near Emmerick, where he had formed vast magazines of corn imported from Dantzick, his great preparations alarmed the courts of Brussels and Madrid, as they still entertained remote hopes, that the truce might yet take place. The archduchess, sensible that it was vain to flatter herself longer with this prospect, exerted herself to put the army in a condition to take the field, and for that purpose laid additional taxes on the clergy and people. A proceeding so necessary when the treasury was quite exhausted, excited the clamours of the Flemings; and the ill-judged policy of the court of Madrid increased their discontent, by appointing the marquis de Santa Cruz to succeed Spinola in the command of the forces, an employment which the people hoped would be conferred upon a native of the Netherlands. To sweeten the draught, which it was well known would prove unpalatable to the Flemings, a report was spread, that the marquis was to serve under the cardinal Ferdinand of Austria, brother to the catholic king, and nephew to the archduchess, who was to succeed her in the government. Count Henry de Berg was made marechal-general of all the troops in Flanders, and Carlo Colonna was raised to the rank of camp-master-general. A corps of six thousand men was destined to cover Antwerp and Mechlin, under the conduct of Zapeta; the care of all the convoys was committed to Lucas Cayro, who had four thousand foot, and thirty troops of horse under his command. As to the count de Berg, he took post near Rhimberg, for the defence of the new canal, and of Spanish Guelderland, of which he was governor.

A. D. 1631.

SUCH were the measures taken by the enemy, while the prince of Orange, dividing his army into three corps, took post upon the Rhine, at Boisleduc and Sluys. Leaving count Stirum with a flying camp of ten thousand men at Rees, he embarked his troops at Emmeric, and attended by the duke of Vendosme, made a descent in the neighbourhood of Bruges, passed the rivers and canals on rope-bridges, constructed upon a new plan, surprised three Spanish forts, advanced to Ghent; but finding that a body of the enemy's cavalry was formed at the skirts of a wood in his way, he dropped his design, and returned, from an apprehen-

- a sion of falling into an ambuscade. The Spanish army multiplied daily; troops were pouring in from Germany and Italy, and already a body of twenty-nine thousand foot, with twenty seven companies of horse, had advanced to the canal between Ghent and Bruges, on a supposition that the prince formed designs upon one of these cities. The archduchess perceived that the vigilance of the prince of Orange would baffle all her endeavours in the usual method of carrying on the campaign; she therefore resumed a scheme which had been proposed two years before, of cutting off the communication between the provinces of Holland and Zealand. For this purpose a great number of barges and flat-bottomed boats had been constructed, but laid aside rather for the want of troops or money to carry the project into execution. At the persuasion of a capuchin, and the son of the advocate-general Barneveldt, who lived in banishment at Brussels, the boats were again taken into commission, a body of forces appointed to serve in the expedition, and the direction of the whole committed to John count de Nassau. The count set sail from Antwerp with a fleet of ninety boats, having on board five thousand land-forces, and thirteen hundred marines; but part of the priest's intelligence proving false, he was forced to alter the course prescribed, re-enter the Scheld, pass by Remerswall, and coast along the isle of Tolen, into which the prince of Orange had thrown a reinforcement of nine thousand men. The barks loaded with his ammunition, provision, and cannon, having run on the sandbanks, a whole tide was lost before they were got afloat, which afforded the Hollanders time to collect a small fleet of boats at Bergen-op-zoom; with these they attacked the enemy, and took several boats, and three hundred prisoners. At the same instant the fleet of Zealand, commanded by admiral Hollart, fell upon the Spaniards in the night. Count John sustained the attack with great intrepidity, and the capuchin performed wonders; but after an action of six hours, the Spaniards were totally defeated; and of the whole armament, only eleven officers escaped, in which number were count John, the baron Balançon governor of Breda, and the capuchin. Seventy-six boats and barks were taken, the rest had been either sunk or burned, and the number of prisoners exceeded five thousand men, most of whom enlisted in the prince's army, and were incorporated in different regiments. The victory was deemed in Holland among the most glorious with which it had pleased the Almighty to bless the arms of the republic; and indeed the consequences were very important, as they entirely broke the scheme planned at the court of Brussels, of seizing all the Dutch islands quite to the Brille, and Dordrecht, while the marquis de Santa Cruz should subdue the whole country along the Meuse, as far as Gertruydenberg <sup>a</sup>.

A grand expedition prepared by the Spaniards.

The Spaniards defeated.

- The defeat of this expedition threw the court of Brussels into consternation. Equipping the armament had cost the government large sums, which were now entirely lost, together with great part of the army. The archduchess supported the misfortune with infinite spirit and moderation, exerting her utmost influence to appease the clamours raised against the marquis de Santa Cruz, upon whom the blame of so ideal a project was thrown by the multitude, and even by the Flemish nobility. Something must be done to satisfy the people; accordingly the count offered the admiral Jacob Janse a victim to their discontent, and sent him prisoner to Breda; but Janse was an Italian, and this proceeding served only to encrease the public murmurs. Happily, however, a large fleet of Dutchmen, loaded with corn, seized by the Dunkirkers, brought the Flemings into better temper. Advice coming to the court of Madrid of the fate of the late expedition, the ministry had recourse to their usual artifices. They greatly diminished the loss, and magnified some petty advantages gained in the East and West Indies. They had little indeed to boast with respect to the latter, for the great armament destined for the recovery of Olinda was dispersed in a storm, and the greatest part of the troops died of a malignant fever. D'Oquendo at last set sail, with a numerous fleet, for Brazil, and in his voyage encountered the Dutch admiral Pater, with seventeen ships, ten of which sheered off before the engagement began. Pater was too far advanced to retire with safety or honour; he determined therefore to supply the want of numbers by courage, fell upon the enemy with irresistible impetuosity, sunk four and burned six of their ships, before he could be surrounded. After having long kept victory in suspense by dint of skill and intrepidity, he saw one of his finest vessels blown up, with the crew, consisting of three hundred men. The loss was succeeded by another accident, which all his prudence and valour could not remedy. The powder-room of his own ship took fire, the flames spread in despite of his utmost endeavours, and Pater, with above four hundred brave seamen, perished in the flames. Five ships now only remained, and they fought with redoubled vigour, determining to revenge the death of their valiant admiral. Nothing could exceed their fury; they cleared their decks, crowded with Spaniards who had boarded them, tinged the sea with blood, and covered it with floating carcases. At last, perceiving they must sink under the weight of numbers, they made one desperate push, broke through the enemy's line, and after having destroyed four ships, got clear, and steered their course unpursued to Olinda. The honour of victory remained with the Spaniards; but they had purchased it so dear, that d'Oquendo was disabled for that year from acting offensively. Returning to Europe some time after, he was attacked by four Dutch men of war, and defeated with the loss of seven hundred men, twenty two officers, three ships, and his vice-admiral. Such were the exploits of which the court of Madrid boasted; but a false relation of facts served for a time to blind the public, and appease the clamours of the people <sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 1632. WHILE Spain was busied in preparing for the defence of the Netherlands, and the recovery of her losses in Brasil, the eyes of all Europe were turned upon the king of Sweden, whose irruption into Germany threw the whole empire into consternation. In the space of one year he had conquered whole provinces, restored the dukes of Mecklenburgh, to the dominions of which they were despoiled by the victorious imperial general Wallestein, defeated the emperor's troops in divers rencounters, obtained the glorious victory of Leipsic over Tilly, the most celebrated commander of his age, crossed the Rhine and the Danube, reduced above sixty towns, fortresses, and cities, and was on the brink of overthrowing the whole power, and subjecting the grandeur of the antient house of Austria, which had long given law to Christendom. Covered with laurels, and hedged in by victory, this glorious monarch did not think the states of the United Provinces unworthy of alliance. They had long laboured in the same cause, and with equal perseverance and courage fought in defence of liberty and the protestant religion. With this view he sent his chancellor Oxenstierna to the Hague, where he was received with all the honours due to his own merit, and the minister of so great a prince and hero. A treaty was concluded between the king and the republic, whereby they stipulated to attack the Spaniards on the Rhine, with all their forces, and by this means divide the Austrian army. The pensionary Pauw was sent to the king, to adjust further particulars <sup>b</sup>.

Treaty with Sweden. c.

To fulfil the treaty with Sweden, the prince of Orange took the field at the head of two hundred and fifty-three companies of infantry, and fifty-eight troops of cavalry. Several detachments were sent out to reconnoitre the enemy; and the prince entering Spanish Guelderland, bent his course towards Venlo, seizing upon Arsen, a little fortress upon the Meuse. Next day he summoned the garrison of Venlo. The magistrates desired him to consult the count de Berg; but Henry marched his troops by two avenues, amidst the furious discharge of the artillery on the ramparts, and a sharp sally made by the garrison. Before morning, the trenches were advanced three hundred yards, notwithstanding the besieged gave all possible obstruction. A battery of six pieces of cannon was erected, which played so briskly with ignited balls, that one side of the town was set on fire. By the third of June, the inhabitants, seeing the enemy approach the ditch, desired to capitulate, on condition that their privileges were preserved, liberty of conscience permitted, and a church allowed for the public exercise of the catholic religion. The garrison, scrupling to submit on the same terms with the burghers, defended themselves for a day, and then capitulated, retiring to the city of Juliers. This siege, though the firing was extremely brisk, cost the besieged only two lives, which was attributed to the prudent conduct of prince Henry, imitating the example of his brother Maurice, in exposing his troops to danger, only in cases of extreme necessity <sup>d</sup>.

The Prince of Orange gains several advantages. e.

HENRY was no sooner in possession of Venlo, than he detached count Ernest with six thousand men, towards Stralen and Ruremonde, the former of which surrendered without resistance to the sieur Truillieri. Ruremonde, an episcopal town in Guelderland, was besieged by Ernest in person. Batteries were immediately erected, but before they began to play, the prince of Orange arrived in the camp. His presence wrought such an effect on the inhabitants, that they surrendered next day, the 10th of June, on the same conditions granted to the magistrates of Venlo. The prince's moderation contributed no less to the sudden reduction of towns, than his valour. He generally granted all their privileges, and liberty of conscience to the conquered, who experienced no other hardship than what is consequent on a mere change of masters and of government. The siege of Ruremonde proved however extremely unfortunate to the provinces of Groningen and Friseland, who by a musket-ball, the last shot fired by the garrison, lost their excellent governor, count Ernest Casimir of Nassau. He was succeeded in his dignities by his son Henry Ernest, and the states general acknowledged their esteem for the deceased, by making the stadtholdership of the two provinces hereditary in his family <sup>f</sup>.

In the mean time William of Nassau gained very considerable advantages over the enemy. He was detached with a corps of three thousand men, by the prince of Orange, to harass the enemy on the banks of the Scheld. Embarking his troops in a number of a small boats at Ramekins, he pushed up the river to Lillo, made himself master of the important post and dyke at Cowesteyn, and of two forts at the extremities of the dykes, from the Scheld to the territory of Ryen. Afterwards he took Peckgat, fort St. Martin, and all the works which covered St. Vliet. To oppose his progress, the Spaniards detached a body of five thousand men, composed of the garrison of Antwerp, and the militia of the country, under the generals Colonna and Feria. A battle was fought near Callo, in which both sides behaved with great valour; but the Scotch and Irish auxiliaries at last broke the enemy, defeated them, and took a great number of prisoners, killed four hundred men, among whom was the brave Spinelli, and obtained a compleat victory. So many advantages gained by the Hollanders determined the count de Berg to resign his commission, after he had faithfully served the court of Spain for a great number of years, notwithstanding he was nearly related to the prince of Orange, connected by strong ties with count Stirum, to whom he had given his daughter in marriage, attached to liberty, but so zealous a catholic, that his conscience would not suffer him to submit to the protestant government established in the Seven Provinces. He retired to Liege, under pretence that it was a neutral city, and that he was deserted, and denied a body of forces sufficient for the defence of Guelderland; but it was generally supposed, he had concerted matters with the prince of Orange, being disgusted with the preference shewn to foreigners. The sudden retreat of so important a personage alarmed the court of Brussels. The archduchess feared that so dangerous an example would be imitated by others of the nobility, dissatisfied with the conduct of the Spanish ministry, and ready to enter into a league for the expulsion of all foreigners out of the Netherlands. Filled with these apprehensions, she dispatched a letter to the count, written with her own hand, inviting him back to Brussels, and promising to redress all his grievances; but the count excused himself in an answer couched in the most respectful terms, for the princess. He was sensible of her goodness, but he knew her power was limited by Olivarez, and that her favour to himself would be discontent to all the Spaniards. He hoped, he said, that his faithful personal services of forty years, and the death of six brothers slain in the war, would give sufficient testimony of his zeal for the house of Austria, and the catholic religion. He touched upon the sufferings of the country, and the ruin of the catholic cause, from the pride, avarice, and that contempt which the Spaniards affected to entertain for the natives. He wrote, at the same time, a circular letter, in form of a manifesto, to the clergy, nobility, and towns of the Ten Provinces, to justify his conduct with respect to the marquis de Leganez, and other Spaniards with whom he was at variance. In the result, he entirely threw off the mask, declared his intention of levying an army for the defence of the country, against the opposition and tyranny of the Spaniards.

ON the eighteenth of June the prince of Orange wrote a letter to the count de Berg, applauding his resolution, and declaring that he should not have seized upon the towns in Spanish Guelderland, of which he was governor, but that they were left defenceless, the magistrates refusing to furnish the Spanish garrisons with money, which he feared might produce tumults and the ruin of the places. He offered him all manner of assistance and consolation, in his own name, and that of the states general, and requested he would rely upon their friendship and protection, against all his enemies. With respect to the catholic religion, in which he was so zealous, he might rest satisfied, as the states were determined to permit liberty of conscience, and the free exercise of the Romish religion in all their conquests, as was obvious from their conduct at Venlo, Stralen, and Ruremonde. The states of Liege, apprehensive that the declaration published by the count de Berg might be regarded as a breach of their neutrality, published a protest of their having no share in the count's designs; while he, on his part, confirmed their asseveration by a solemn act, acquitting the chapter and states of all communication, interest, or connection, with his affairs, and the purport of his late declaration. Measures so deliberate and well laid, convinced the court of Brussels, that the count's resolution had not been formed in a sudden fit of disgust; the Spaniards insinuated to the archduchess, that the invasion of Spanish Guelderland was in consequence of secret intelligence between him and the prince of Orange. This first determined her to prevent the consequences of his desertion by letters wrote to the three estates of the provinces, and then, by a personal declaration against the count, with an order to seize his person. So vigorous a resolution terrified the count's party, and obliged him to return to Aix, in Holland, upon which he was declared a traitor by the court of Brussels, and condemned to lose his head upon a scaffold.

He declares against the Spaniards.

THE revolt, however of the count de Berg did not produce all the expected consequences. It was supposed that the Flemish troops would desert, by which means the archduchess would be deprived of her greatest strength, and disabled from opposing the conquests of the prince of Orange; but that princess had taken her measures so prudently, and was so universally beloved, that scarce any more than the usual desertion happened. It was notwithstanding a terrible blow to the court of Spain, as she was now deprived of a general <sup>a</sup> to oppose prince Henry, and whose popularity in Guelderland might greatly assist the operations of the army. Four towns and three forts, situated on the Meuse, were reduced in the space of eight days. By the tenth of June, the Dutch had pushed their conquests quite to Maestricht, and penetrated to the farthest extremity of Limburgh. Maestricht itself, the most commodious passage of the Meuse, was now invested, after it had quietly remained in the hands of the Spaniards since the year one thousand five hundred and seventy-nine, when it was taken by the duke of Parma. The city was defended only by a garrison of two thousand five hundred men, under the command of the baron de Leda, nephew to the count de Motery, an officer of great experience, absent when the prince of Orange formed the siege. That prince carried on his approaches with his usual <sup>b</sup> caution, while the baron performed all that youth, fire, and an eager thirst of glory could inspire. With this only troop of cavalry, he reconnoitred the disposition of the Dutch trenches, maintained a sharp conflict, and returned with a number of prisoners superior to his whole party; a success which so elated the inhabitants, that the whole, without distinction, even the clergy and women, determined to second the vigorous efforts of their intrepid governor, and labour in repairing the fortifications. A sally was made to burn all the surrounding houses, which could any way assist the approach of the besieged; but the garrison was repulsed with great slaughter. All the batteries being finished by the fourteenth of June, the rest of the month was employed in battering the walls, and advancing the works, which the besieged endeavoured to obstruct by a great number of <sup>c</sup> brisk sallies. Sometimes they proved successful, and in one sally they destroyed two batteries, filled up part of the trenches, and made prodigious carnage<sup>a</sup>.

MEAN time the Spaniards, sensible that Maestricht was a town of the last importance, were collecting all their strength for its relief, and not satisfied with their own forces, had recourse to the assistance of their allies. Gonzales de Cordova, with a body of forces drawn from the Palatinate, presented himself before the trenches, upon which he played with twenty-four pieces of heavy cannon; but endeavouring to force his way into the town, was vigorously repulsed by the French and English auxiliaries. The sieur d'Estiaux particularly distinguished himself in this affair, pursuing the enemy across the river, with such impetuosity, that he penetrated the Spanish camp, threw it in great confusion, and retired with <sup>d</sup> a considerable number of prisoners. Gonzales collecting his dispersed troops, attempted to seize all the avenues leading to the Dutch camp, and thereby cut off their provisions; but the prince of Orange took such measures as effectually baffled the project of the Spaniards. Six weeks had now been consumed in this siege, during which a variety of sallies and assaults were made, which gave it so much reputation, that volunteers flocked from all quarters of Europe, to learn the art of war under prince Henry. On the twenty-second of July, the marquis de Santa Cruz arrived with his whole army before the trenches, and attempted to force a passage over the Meuse at Stocken; but his troops were so roughly handled, that he was forced to wait patiently for the arrival of his artillery, and the German auxiliaries under Pappenheim, one of the best officers in the emperor's service. When the prince of <sup>e</sup> Orange understood that this reinforcement had joined the Spanish general, he redoubled his vigilance, placed stronger guards at all the posts, and ordered William of Nassau to join the camp with the troops he had levied in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen. Nor had Pappenheim reason to be satisfied with the reception given him by the marquis de Santa Cruz, and the Spanish officers, who were jealous of his reputation, and afraid he would run away with the whole honour of relieving Maestricht. To prevent this, he sent the duke of Newburgh, with proposals to the prince of Orange, for changing hostilities into a negotiation. Pappenheim, incensed at the usage, declared by a trumpet, that he was come with the imperial army to oppose the Dutch, and immediately advanced to force the prince's intrenchments. The Hollanders sustained the attack with great firmness, and at last drove <sup>g</sup> back the imperialists with prodigious slaughter. Pappenheim then entrenched himself opposite to count Stirum's quarters, with intention to seize the first opportunity of throwing succours into the town. To second his design, the besieged made a brisk sally, furiously attacked the English quarters, and filled the trenches with blood. Above four hundred British soldiers perished in this action, the principal of whom were the lord Oxford, and colonel Williams<sup>c</sup>.

AFTER Pappenheim had fully examined the posts, the strength and situation of the besiegers, he disposed every thing for a second attack, on the eighteenth of August, planted his cannon, and drew up his army in order of battle. Two regiments of carbineers composed the van, followed by all the infantry, with fascines to fill up the trenches; the cavalry supported both wings. The attack was so impetuous, that notwithstanding the <sup>g</sup> trenches were choaked up with their dead, the Germans still pressed on, and obliged the

- Dutch* to abandon their advanced works. The fight was obstinately maintained for three hours, when the prince of Orange arrived with fresh troops, conducted by the dukes de Candale and Bouillon, and a body of volunteers formed out of the flower of the French nobility. They attacked the Germans in flank, with irresistible fury: the scale of fortune was now changed, and the Imperialists in their turn put in disorder, defeated, and driven from the entrenchments. The brave Imperialist was shocked to see the Spaniards cool spectators of the slaughter of his troops; he complained to the marquis de Santa Cruz; but his application meeting only with ridicule, he determined once more to exert his valour, and demonstrate that he could finish his business without their assistance (A). A second time he returned to the charge; both sides of the Dutch camp were attacked, and he forced a footing for his cavalry within the trenches. He sustained the attack, from one till seven in the evening, the Spaniards all the while remaining quiet spectators of his extraordinary efforts of gallantry and conduct. The artillery, musketry, grenades, bombs, and carbines, continued an unremitting discharge, and the clouds of smoke obscured the light, and made it impossible for the combatants to distinguish each other. Prince Henry, the dukes de Candale and Bouillon, count John Maurice of Nassau, and the French volunteers, opposed their utmost vigour to the fury of Pappenheim, who performed every duty of a soldier and great general. Perceiving his troops gave way, he erected gibbets behind, and forced them in despair to return to the attack, to avoid a more ignominious death. The garrison finding such astonishing brave efforts made for their relief, resolved to contribute their endeavours, and sallying out vigorously upon the English quarters, made a considerable diversion, but were at last repulsed with loss, after an obstinate engagement. The Germans were discouraged by the defeat of the besieged. They had repeatedly come back to the charge, and were as often repulsed. Now they were fatigued, exhausted, and broken, while the Dutch poured in fresh to the attack, and relieved the troops that had suffered. After one furious unsuccessful attempt, Pappenheim retired in tolerable order, leaving two thousand killed on the field, and nine hundred wounded prisoners, among whom was lieutenant-general Lindlock, four colonels, and a great number of inferior officers, greatly chagrined at his defeat, and the conduct of the Spaniards, who regarded his disappointment as a real victory gained by themselves.
- d PRINCE Henry finding himself disengaged from so formidable an opponent as the imperial general, and having nothing to apprehend from the Spaniards, who seemed to lie encamped at a little distance, only to give testimony to his valiant exploits, his excellent conduct, and glorious triumph, pushed the siege with redoubled vigour. The British troops sprung a mine on the twentieth of August, which destroyed great part of the raveline; the garrison and burghers flew in crowds to the breach, where the baron de Leda fought in person with amazing intrepidity, and after a bloody action drove the besiegers back to their camp. Several women, mixed with the men, distinguished themselves, and extremely galled the assailants with their hand-grenades. Above three hundred British soldiers, and about eighty of the besieged, perished; several women likewise were slain and wounded.
- e But this success served only to protract the siege; it could not determine the fate of the garrison. The breach was stormed a second time, and carried sword in hand; which so alarmed the burghers, that in a body they besought the baron to save their lives and effects by a capitulation. After using some fruitless arguments to persuade them to continue their defence a few days longer, he signed a capitulation, and obtained the most honourable conditions; those respecting the town differing but little from the terms granted to the magistrates of Venlo and Ruremonde. Thus was the important city of Maastricht, in despite of the utmost efforts of three armies, that of Spain, under the marquis de Santa Cruz; of the Palatinate, commanded by Cordova; and the imperial army, led on by the brave and experienced Pappenheim, obliged to surrender. The states lost six thousand men in the siege;
- f but the importance and glory of the conquest obliterated every other consideration, and made the reduction of Maastricht be regarded as one of the most memorable events of a war abounding in battles and sieges<sup>f</sup>.

HENRY having bestowed the government of Maastricht on the duke de Bouillon, left a strong garrison in the town; and, secured from all attempts from the Imperialists on the side of the Rhine, sent seventy large barks filled with troops to the mouth of the Scheld, to spread terror along the coast of Flanders. William of Nassau advanced likewise with eight thousand men to Lillo and Saffingen, by which means the catholic provinces were beset by

(A) Nuville reports, that when Pappenheim desired that the Spaniards might march to his assistance, the marquis answered that the king had employed four hundred thousand dollars to fill the ditch with German carcasses. We must confess this raillery appears too indelicate for an officer of the marquis's merit and distinction.

sea and land. Count Stirum was likewise detached to reduce the few remaining towns of Spanish Guelderland, most of which submitted rather to the influence of the count de Berg than to the arms of the Hollanders. The archduchess apprehended that the prince would next point his vengeance against the few towns held by the Spaniards in the duchy of Cleves. Unable to protect them with her own forces, she wrote to Pappenheim, requesting he would claim them as imperial towns, or rather as places sequestered in the hands of the emperor. Glad of an opportunity of extending the influence of the court of Vienna, Pappenheim wrote to the prince of Orange, exhorting him to distinguish between the places in the duchy of Cleves, under the protection of the emperor, and those held by Spain; but Henry, perceiving the artifice, returned for answer, that, provided his imperial majesty would observe an exact neutrality, and prevail on the Spaniards to withdraw their garrisons, he was ready to comply. a

WHILE this affair was negotiating, prince Henry detached lieutenant-general Stakembroek and colonel Pinsen, to invest Limburgh, the capital of the duchy of that name. As the town was but indifferently fortified, it surrendered upon the first summons. Stakembroek then penetrated to Namur, and laid the whole surrounding country under contributions. Heavy contributions were likewise raised in the territories of the duke of Newburgh and the elector of Cologne, because they had violated the neutrality, in assisting Pappenheim's expedition to Maastricht. In the month of October, Orsoy, a town in the duchy of Cleves, was surprised by a Dutch party; but the avarice of the soldiers, and their eagerness after plunder, exposed them to the enemy, and occasioned the loss of their conquest. b

They were attacked, and driven out of the town, by a detachment of the garrison of Rhinberg. William of Nassau, however, soon after recovered the place; with which the campaign, so glorious to the prince of Orange, and advantageous to the republic, concluded. c

S E C T. IX.

Containing Proposals for a Truce between Spain and Holland; Propositions concerning the Re-union of the Seventeen Provinces; the Siege of Breda; and a Variety of other military Operations, to the Death of the Prince of Orange, and the Treaty of Munster.

- b Confounded with the rapid conquests of prince Henry, and the progress of the Dutch conquests, the court of Brussels had no other resource than the renewal of their negotiations for a truce with the states general. Necessity rather than the love of peace dictated this measure. The Spaniards were not yet sufficiently humbled to grant what the United Provinces required; but they were forced to temporize, and gain a little respite, by establishing conferences, whose sole object was to procrastinate. It had been the policy of Philip II. to set negotiations on foot whenever he found his treasury exhausted, and his arms unfortunate, with no other view than to break them off as soon as the flota arrived from the Indies, and he had recovered himself; this policy was imitated by his successors. The archduchess now dispatched a deputation to Maastricht, with proposals to the prince of Orange, which he transmitted and referred to the states general. The states declared they could enter upon no conferences with the Spanish ministry; but that they were willing to begin a negotiation with the catholic provinces, on condition that they would detach themselves from the Spaniards. This proposal was accepted by the archduchess, who accordingly sent the archbishop of Mechlin, and the duke d'Arscot, to the Hague, to open the conferences: seven other deputies from Brabant, Hainault, and Flanders, assisted. They were acknowledged as the ambassadors of the court of Brussels by the states, and they declared they were come intirely in the name of the states of the catholic provinces. As the states general were bound by the treaties with France and Sweden, to enter upon no negotiations without the consent and participation of their allies, they drew up a scheme of preliminaries so unreasonable, that the deputies declared it exceeded their instructions to give any answer. It is, however, supposed, that had the proposals been more favourable, they must have made the same declaration: this at least is asserted by Dutch writers<sup>a</sup>. Upon this the deputies returned with more ample powers: and the prince of Orange, unwilling to be diverted from his military operations by conferences, the fruitless issue of which he foresaw, marched at the head of his army, and laid siege to Rhimberg. This town standing upon the Rhine between Wessel and Orsoy, was regarded as a place of great importance to the Hollanders. It commanded the whole navigation and commerce of the Rhine, was a key to the Spaniards into Friseland, and enabled them to levy contributions in the Dutch territories on the higher side the Rhine. This important town the prince of Orange invested on the 11th day of May, pitching his head-quarters towards the south-side. Diesdorff, an officer of reputation, commanded in the town, having under him a garrison of 2000 men. He defended himself with so much judgment, that, notwithstanding the prince carried on his approaches with the utmost vigour, only nine soldiers of the garrison were killed at the end of the month, but the fortifications were considerably damaged. His spirits were kept up by the prospect of relief from Moncada, who was marching to his assistance with an army of 20,000 men; hopes that were soon cut off by the judicious measures of prince Henry, who detached a body of horse and foot to oppose the enemy, to cut off their convoys, and harass them in their march. The duke de Bouillon and colonel Pinsen commanded this detachment, and effectually executed their commission; Moncada was unable to advance, and Diesdorff, destitute of all resource and expectation of relief, his garrison fatigued, and his provision and ammunition consumed, surrendered the town upon obtaining the honours of war, and certain favourable conditions for the inhabitants.

- f The reduction of Rhimberg was the most important service that could have been performed, relative to the provinces of Friseland and Groningen, who were obliged, while this place remained in the hands of the Spaniards, to maintain large garrisons at a vast expence. It procured, likewise, another advantage to the United Provinces, by diminishing the duties upon all merchandize going up and down the river. In a word, the place was deemed of such consequence by the court of Brussels, that Diesdorff was sent prisoner to the citadel of Antwerp, and afterwards cashiered, for not having defended himself to the last extremity. Henry's expedition to Cleves diminished greatly the public expectation from the conferences, which still were pursued. Though the Flemish deputies continued at the Hague, the archduchess thought herself authorised, by the example of the states general, to continue her hostile preparations. Levies were accordingly made in all the territories a subject to the government; a considerable army took the field in three divisions; and every thing promised that the campaign would be conducted with the utmost vigour.

The count de Mittery, with one division, marched into the district of Liège, to revenge the breach of the neutrality, and that partiality of the chapter and states, shewn for the Hollanders during the siege of Maestricht; but he was twice defeated by the duke de Bou- illon, and forced to abandon the enterprize. Prince Henry marched to Brabant, and en-camping at Botel, was joined by 12,000 Swedes, under general Melander. Now was the most formidable army in the field, which the states general had beheld since the origin of the republic; it was composed of 50,000 infantry and 10,000 cavalry. Spanish Brabant re- b garded itself as already conquered, and the terror of the allied army had spread to the remote extremities of the catholic Netherlands. After conferring with the Dutch deputies upon the operations of the campaign; after observing a strict fast, and offering solemn prayers for the prosperity of his arms, the prince of Orange began his march, at the head of all his forces; towards Endybove, in the month of September. A deluge of rain, which poured incessantly during the whole month, and the excellent disposition made by the Spanish general Moncada, frustrated, however, all his designs. The country was destitute of forage, the lands were overflowed, sickness appeared in the army, the peasants deserted their habitations, to avoid bringing provision to the Dutch troops, and every thing contributed to disappoint the great projects of the prince of Orange, and the vast expectations of the states general from so formidable an army c. Unable to penetrate farther he retired, and distributed his troops in winter quarters.

THE naval armament under count William of Nassau was somewhat more fortunate, tho' greatly short of expectation in point of success. After alarming the Spaniards in different quarters, and keeping them in suspense where the stroke would fall, he at last made a descent on the coast of Flanders, near Cadfan, and took a little fort in the neighbourhood of Sluys, which he garrisoned. Perceiving that his progress was vigorously opposed by Fon- taine, governor of Bruges; he reembarked his troops, and fell suddenly upon fort Philippine, near Sas de Gand, where he found abundance of ammunition, provision, and several pieces of beautiful cannon. To the fortifications of this place he made vast additions, strength- d ening the counterscarp, in particular, with seven great bastions, and a variety of outworks, that rendered it almost impregnable, and formed a convenient inlet to the Hollan- ders into Flanders. While he was thus employed, his other conquest was lost, owing to the misconduct and cowardice of the garrison. They surrendered after a faint resistance, and upon their return to Holland were broke, and rendered incapable of farther service. Some of the officers were banished, and the name of Cut Head was given to the fort, because it proved fatal to a variety of governors, Spanish and Dutch, who lost their heads for not defending it with more vigour and obstinacy. The Spaniards perceiving the effects of losing fort Philippine, that, instead of laying waste the territories of the states, as usual, their own dominions were now subjected to contributions to the very gates of Ghent, exerted their utmost endeavours once more to gain possession of a place so important. The gover- e nor of Antwerp made draughts from his own and the neighbouring garrisons; Colonna joined him with a body of cavalry, and Gonzales with several companies of infantry. In a short time such a force was assembled, as extremely pressed William de Nassau, and obliged him to apply for a considerable reinforcement. However, by a stratagem, he forced the enemy to drop their design of attacking him, of retaking fort Philippine, and of returning the insults they had lately sustained. Ordering several boats, with a trumpeter in each, to land in the night, sounding their warlike instruments, he persuaded the enemy that a strong reinforcement was arrived, and obliged them to decamp with great precipitation, leaving behind their baggage, provisions, the utensils brought for carrying on the siege, and several pieces of artillery. f

WITH this transaction the campaign ended, upon which the negotiations for a truce were again resumed. The conferences at the Hague had been interrupted by hostilities committed in the field, and by a variety of difficulties started by the Hollanders, but not wholly broke off; for some of the deputies constantly resided in Holland, while others went to Brussels for farther instructions. It was the intention of the court of Spain and the states general both to amuse; the archduchess alone was serious in her endeavours to restore tranquillity and the blessings of repose to the Netherlands. Possibly she might have effected this sooner, had she not been curbed, traversed, and disappointed by the intrigues of Oli- varez and the Spanish ministry, who were too weak to execute their designs upon the United Provinces, and too proud to grant them peace on the only conditions they were resolved to g accept. Her wise conduct broke all the measures concerted by the Hollanders for procu-

a ring the re-union of the Seventeen Provinces, upon such a footing as would entirely exclude the Spaniards. The count de Berg's desertion first suggested the idea of this re-union, to which great numbers of the Flemish nobility seemed well disposed. Indeed the people in general were not averse to the scheme of a new republic, under the same laws and government, except in matters of religion, where perfect liberty of conscience should be tolerated. The design was noble, but it was too vast for practice; so many persons were interested to oppose it, that it was impossible it should ever be carried into execution. The archduchess was to be maintained in all her dignity and authority during her life, out of respect to her wisdom, and that general esteem which her sweet and amiable disposition attracted; but unfortunately she could not accept the offer, without betraying the confidence
b reposed in her by the court of Madrid. Some writers ascribe the ruin of the project to the duke d'Arfskot, who betrayed the negotiation between the Flemish nobility and the count de Berg. The states general perceived, that it was not with the court of Brussels they had to treat, but with that of Madrid; they altered their tone, spoke a different language, seemed more indifferent about the truce, but, however, did not positively refuse to listen to the proposals, with which the deputies returned to the Hague. Cardinal Richlieu now interposed; and omitted nothing to keep open the breach between Spain and the United Provinces, so necessary to the designs he had formed. With this view he sent the baron de Charnesse to the Hague, who acquitted himself with so much address, promised so largely, and flattered the states with such agreeable prospects, that they precipitately broke off the conferences,

It must be confessed that this measure was by no means agreeable to the majority of the people, who ardently wished for a solid pacification, whereby they might be at full liberty to give their whole attention to commerce; but the states of Zealand, and the prince of Orange in particular, entered so warmly into the interests of the French ambassador, and represented so strongly the utility of continuing the war, that the states general declared in their favour, in despite of all the remonstrances made by Holland and West Friseland, the most concerned of all the provinces to bring about a respite of the enormous expences of supporting large fleets, armies, and numerous garrisons. Charnesse surmounted these difficulties by the gold which he promised to shower down from France, and the powerful diversion the king's troops would make, by an irruption into Lorraine and Alsace. The states
d relied on the effects of these promises, the people were brought into good-humour, and all coincided in the resolution to prosecute the war with such vigour as should compel Spain to sue for peace, upon such terms as France and the republic should think fit to prescribe. This determination was scarce formed, when the Netherlands were deprived of their most excellent princess Isabella-Clara-Eugenia, archduchess of Austria, infant of Spain, daughter to Philip II. of Spain, grand-daughter of Henry II. of France, and still greater by her extraordinary e merit, than her elevated birth and connections. She died at Brussels, on the first day of September, lamented by all degrees of men; and equally esteemed by the Spaniards, Flemings, and Dutch, for her prudence, moderation, humanity, piety, and every other quality which could adorn her sex, and reflect lustre upon her high dignity. To a capacity and courage altogether masculine, she joined the softness, the tenderness, and amiable delicacy of the female; but it was her truly moral and rational piety that, of all her qualities, shone with the brightest radiance: in her religion even the Hollanders, the enemies of her faith and person, believed she was sincere; though the catholics blamed that moderation, which she recommended, and always observed, in regard to the reformed religion.

The death of Isabella was an irrecoverable loss to Spain; it furnished an opportunity of displaying those ideal strokes of policy which seldom succeed, on account of their excessive refinement. We have seen Philip II.'s views in marrying the princess to the cardinal archduke, brother to the emperor Rodolph. The Netherlands and Franche-Comte were her dowry; and the contract of marriage stipulated, that the elder male issue should succeed, and in case of failure of such issue, the oldest of the female line; but that the provinces on no account should be divided, or alienated. Now the whole scheme of Philip was frustrated, and the Netherlands again reverted to the Spanish monarchy, without producing any of the effects proposed. Among the papers in the cabinet of the archduchess, was found a commission, signed in 1630, appointing the archbishop of Mechlin, and the duke d'Arfskot, don Carlo Colonna, and the marquis d'Ayetone, regents, during the absence of Ferdinand of Austria, brother to the catholic king, destined to succeed the archduchess, not in the property, but in the government of the Netherlands. The death of some, the absence of others, and the contempt into which the duke d'Arfskot was fallen, so changed the regency, that the whole management devolved on the marquis d'Ayetone. As the cardinal
g infant was deeply engaged in Germany, a new commission was granted to the marquis, constituting him governor of the provinces, and captain-general of all the Spanish forces acting in the Netherlands. He began his government with seizing upon the persons of the nobility suspected of holding any correspondence with count Henry de Berg, and the states general of the United Provinces. The prince de Barbançon was committed prisoner to the citadel of Antwerp; the duke de Bournonville, called likewise count Hennin, and the prince d'Espinoi, saved themselves in France: an attempt was made to seize upon divers other noblemen; but they had notice of the intention of the governor, and made their escape. Some, however, were carried prisoners to Antwerp, while others took refuge in the United Provinces and Brabant, with the counts de Berg and Warsujé. As to the duke d'Arfchot, he fell under suspicion, and was detained prisoner at the court of Madrid. Sentence of death was pronounced against the count de Berg, which greatly alarmed all the Flemish nobility who had any way connived at his desertion. The consternation became so general, that, dreading a revolt and an immediate insurrection, the marquis d'Ayestone found himself obliged to quiet the fears of the people, by publishing an amnesty of all that passed before the sixteenth of April. He saw the consequences of the rigorous treatment of the duke of Alva, and that iron scourge which he held over the Flemings; a conduct to which may justly be attributed the loss of the Seven United Provinces, and the union that took place at Utrecht.

NEXT he visited the coasts of Flanders, reinforced the garrisons of the frontier towns, built several forts, to restrain the incursions of the Hollanders, and concluded a treaty, on the twelfth of May, with Gaston de France, duke of Orleans, and brother to Lewis XIII. in the name of his Catholic majesty; whereby the duke engaged to declare war against the French monarch. This treaty was opposed to the new alliance formed between the king and the republic, by which the king stipulated to augment his forces in the service of the states, to pay two millions yearly, and to declare war against the king of Spain, should he attack the United Provinces. After his negotiation with the duke of Orleans, the marquis d'Ayestone ordered his army to file towards the Meuse, leaving the counts de Fontaine and Feria, governors of Bruges and Antwerp, to oppose William de Nassau's designs upon Flanders; to effect which they had a corps of six thousand foot, besides a considerable body of cavalry. Immediately the duke de Lerma and the marquis de Leda were detached to lay siege to Argentau, a place of strength and importance, situated between Maastricht and Liege, and founded upon a rock washed by the waters of the Meuse. Notwithstanding its great strength, Argentau surrendered after the exchange of a few shot; the garrison, consisting of twenty-five soldiers, not chusing to wait for the expected succours from the prince of Orange. The governor, who was son to Junius the prince's secretary, was committed prisoner to Maastricht, by order of the states; but the chief blame fell on the prince of Orange, justly censured for leaving a fortress so important in a condition so defenceless.

Maastricht in vain besieged by the Spaniards.

FROM Argentau the Spaniards marched to Limburgh, a city of which they made sure, in consequence of a secret treaty with the governor. He had agreed to admit the enemy upon receiving thirty thousand pistoles; but his treacherous design was discovered, and frustrated by the lieutenant-governor, who obliged him to take refuge among the Spaniards. The disappointment did not hinder the marquis from investing Maastricht in the month of July. This alarmed the prince of Orange, who had hitherto been seduced into a state of inactivity, by the negotiations carried on by the states with the French king, the Swedish queen, the German Protestants, the duke of Newburgh, and the malcontents in Flanders. Now he advanced to the frontiers of Brabant and Guelderland, in such a manner as to penetrate into either, as circumstances might require. The duke de Bouillon, governor of Maastricht, apprehending that d'Ayestone formed designs upon that city, threw himself with four thousand men into the place, and made so furious a sally on the besiegers, that they were constrained to convert the siege into a blockade. Upon receiving a strong reinforcement, the marquis again began to make his approaches. He battered the town with the utmost fury; but all his efforts gave no inquietude to the prince of Orange, who relied upon the courage of the garrison, and the intrepidity and skill of the duke de Bouillon. Perfectly secure in this well-reposed confidence, Henry did not quit the Hague before the month of August, contenting himself with sufficiently reinforcing the garrisons of Ruremonde and Venlo. Now indeed he resolved to invest Breda, rather to make a diversion in favour of Maastricht, than with hopes of succeeding in the reduction of so well-garrisoned and strong a city. It answered his expectation: he had scarce begun to work upon the trenches, when d'Ayestone raised the siege of Maastricht, and marched with all his forces to Breda, upon which the prince retired on the eighth of September, leading his army in good order along the Meuse, and closing the campaign with this transaction.

- a THOUGH the marquis d'Ayotone had been fairly over-reached by Henry's feint upon Breda, yet he assumed the airs of a conqueror, and entered the place in triumph, as if he had defeated the enemy, and delivered the city from the pressure of a close siege. This policy was necessary to quiet the minds of the people, who murmured at the expences fruitlessly bestowed on the siege of Maastricht. It answered d'Ayotone's purpose, the multitude being amused and dazzled with the public rejoicings, and bonfires kindled in Breda, to celebrate an imaginary victory. Henry's prudence had cut off all possibility of gaining any real advantage, the garrisons being all put in a state of defence, and the troops so judiciously cantoned, as effectually to cover the whole frontier. This security of the provinces was matter of great chagrin to Ayotone, who hoped to signalize his government by some very important blow; and his uneasiness was augmented by the motions of the
- b French army, under the marechal de la Force, on the side of Luxemburgh. The duke of Orleans likewise broke his engagements with the court of Spain, and was reconciled to the king his brother. All these circumstances involved the court of Brussels in the utmost confusion, when the cardinal infant Albert arrived, to take upon him the government, to dispel by his presence the gloom that overspread the face of affairs. At Brussels he was received as a conqueror, with all the pomp, magnificence, and honours, formerly shewn to Charles V. and Philip II. It was immediately published, that he meditated nothing less than the re-union of the seventeen provinces under his government, and the greatest hopes were entertained from a prince known to be of a warlike disposition, and confessed
- c by all to possess the talents of a sound politician.

The cardinal infant arrives in the Netherlands.

- THE cardinal's arrival announced to the states-general the necessity of keeping strict watch, and putting their troops and garrisons into the best posture. They beheld with disquiet and jealousy the compliments that were paid to the cardinal by the neighbouring states and princes; especially the king of England, and the elector of Cologne, who were the earliest in their congratulations. It was also matter of great offence that the duke of Newburgh, with whom they had lately been upon terms of friendship, should not be satisfied with meeting the cardinal upon his way, but must escort him with a numerous train to Brussels. Their resentment, however, against this prince was soon turned to compassion, when they saw his territories desolated, on the one hand, by the duke of Luxemburgh, as the ally of Sweden, and on the other, by the imperial general count Manfeldt. It was for this reason they sent him a deputation, exhorting him to continue firm in his neutrality, promising, in that case, to afford him all possible protection. This extraordinary change at the court of Brussels determined the states to send an embassy to the court of France, pressing the execution of the late treaty, and exhorting the king to declare war against the Spaniards. The consequence was, the renewal of the same treaty, with this addition, that an offensive alliance was now contracted between the king and the republic, from which the states expected nothing less than the entire conquest of the Spanish Netherlands. A scheme of partition was actually drawn up, whereby the towns were to preserve their privileges, and the people their religion. The duchy of Luxemburgh, the earldoms of Namur, Hainault, Courtray, Artois, and Flanders, as far as Blakemberg, Damme, and Rupplemonde, were assigned to France; while Brabant, Guelderland, the territory of Waes, the lordship of Mecklin, and all the rest of Flanders, should be annexed to the republic. We have since that period seen other unjust and unsuccessful partitions of the Spanish monarchy, in which France and Holland were to have been principal sharers. Providence, however, did not wholly abandon the Spaniards, or suffer the ambitious, iniquitous designs of their enemies to take effect. The vast projects and sanguine hopes of the allies were disappointed, chiefly by their own blunders, and by the jealousy which the Hollanders entertained of the growing power of France, and the vicinage of so powerful a monarch as Lewis. The prince of Orange likewise was greatly instrumental in defeating
- d the intention of the league. He could never forgive cardinal Richlieu the attempt made on the principality of Orange; and he sought his revenge by embracing every occasion to mortify that haughty prelate, and crafty minister.

Feb. 8.
An offensive alliance between France and Holland.

- g LEWIS XIII. now wanted a specious pretence for coming to a rupture with the court of Spain, and declaring war against the cardinal governor of the Netherlands, as the first step towards the execution of the treaty with Holland. The seizure of Triers, and the unjust detention of the elector, sent prisoner to Brussels, and thence to Vienna, afforded the opportunity he wished<sup>f</sup>. The elector was under his protection; he demanded his release; and not obtaining it, he solemnly denounced war, by the mouth of a herald sent to Brussels. It was concerted, that the prince of Orange should enter Brabant with his forces, while a French army, of twenty thousand foot and seven thousand horse, advanced to the frontiers of that province, to effect a junction; the combined army to be commanded in chief by the prince of Orange. It was the business of the cardinal infant to prevent this union: he accordingly detached prince Thomas, with the counts Burget and Feria, to give battle to the French. On the twentieth of May the two armies met near the village of d'Avein in Luxembourg. An engagement ensued, and the Spaniards were totally defeated, after an obstinate engagement that continued for five hours, and was sustained with astonishing intrepidity. They left four thousand dead upon the field, eight hundred prisoners were taken, and several pieces of cannon, with standards, colours, and other military trophies. The conquerors advanced to Maestricht, to join the prince of Orange, who lamented that he was deprived of a share in this glorious victory, and complained to the sieur de Pontis, that the marechals de Brezè and Chatillon should have presumed to give battle without the orders of the generalissimo<sup>a</sup>. This is the insinuation of French writers; we find not the least blame thrown upon the marechals in the prince's own relation of his campaigns; and it is certain he received them with great civility, and bestowed the highest encomiums on their valour, when they met at Maestricht. It must, however, be confessed that no great harmony subsisted, though this arose from motives more worthy of the prince of Orange: they related chiefly to his country; he seemed to penetrate into futurity, and clearly to predict all the consequences of suffering the French king to establish a footing in the Netherlands.<sup>b</sup>

taken by the Dutch.

WHEN the armies of France and Holland were united before Maestricht, they exceeded fifty thousand men, commanded by the best officers in Europe, and generals who had drawn their first breath in the camp, and been nursed in the arms of Bellona. Such an armament was sufficient to swallow up the Spanish Netherlands, already under the utmost consternation, from the defeat at d'Avein. Henry passed the Meuse above and below Maestricht, on the first of June, and penetrated into Brabant, accompanied with a train composed of one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. The cardinal infant encamped at Demer, having secured all the passes in the best method he could, by throwing up entrenchments, building redoubts, and cutting down great trees; but on the approach of the allies he was forced to retire with precipitation, to desert all his works, and leave a free passage. In consequence St. Tron, Landen, Hallem, and several inconsiderable places fell into their hands; and Tillemont, because the governor and garrison were intrepid enough to resist, experienced all the horrors which the brutal incensed soldiers could devise. It was summoned on the eighth of June, and Francisco de Bargas, with a garrison of eleven hundred men, replied, that he would endeavour to merit the prince's esteem by his conduct. He made the most vigorous defence, but the town was at last forced by escalade, the houses pillaged, the churches destroyed, and the priests murdered; a barbarity which is entirely attributed to the Hollanders, and even to the prince of Orange, who did not take sufficient precautions to restrain the fury of the soldiers. The French alledge, that the few who escaped owed their safety to a guard placed over them by the marechal Brezè; but the cruelty here charged upon the prince of Orange seems to be fully refuted by all his former conduct, which breathed nothing but humanity, and the most generous feelings for the unfortunate<sup>c</sup>.

The allies besiege Louvain.

ON the tenth of June the two armies separated, the prince of Orange taking the route of Brussels, where the cardinal infant expected the succours which Piccolomini was bringing from Germany, and the French directing their march towards Diest, which surrendered at the first summons. They afterwards joined between Louvain and Brussels, and now that jealousy betwixt the prince and the French marechals which, say the French writers, had its origin in the victory at d'Avein, became more open and declared. Debates took place of action, and instead of profiting by the enemy's consternation, and besieging Louvain at the time proposed, several days were consumed in fruitless altercation, and the provision necessary for the execution of the design was exhausted. The garrison had time to repair the fortifications, and the cardinal to throw in a reinforcement of five thousand foot and two hundred horse. He entered the town in person, resolving to defend it to the last extremity; and to draw him to Brussels, the prince of Orange moved towards that capital, as if he intended to besiege it, which effectually answered his purpose. The cardinal, terrified for the seat of the wealth, the archives, and of all that was valuable in the Netherlands, flew to Brussels, leaving two thousand men in Louvain under the conduct of the baron Groobendenck, and the allies made a sudden turning, sat down before Louvain, and broke ground on the twenty-fifth of June. By next day their batteries played vigorously on different quarters of the town, and all the generals seemed unanimous that the governor would make but a short defence. He had, however, since the reduction of Tillemont, been preparing for a siege, and had amassed great store of ammunition and provision. The fate of that place determined him upon making the most obstinate resistance; and<sup>d</sup> a his views were seconded by a brave veteran garrison, accustomed to all the hardships and fatigues of a siege, who were admired by Henry himself for the intrepidity exerted at Boisseduc and Masstricht. The skill and courage of the garrison, joined to a certain languor and inactivity in the allies, protracted the siege. Henry is accused of an intention to ruin the French army. Provisions grew short in the camp; several parties of foragers returned without being able to find grass or corn for their horses; whole convoys came back empty, or were interrupted by the enemy; dissensions arose; the French murmured, and soon complained openly that they were betrayed; disease swept off great numbers of the troops; Piccolomini was advancing to give battle with a fine army; and the result was the breaking up of a siege, which gave the first turn to the fortune of the allies, and laid the foundation of numberless disappointments. The armies now separated, and the Dutch went to Brabant, where they found abundance of refreshment; while the French unhappily quartered in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, in which nothing but hunger, disease, and accumulated misfortunes offered. Above six thousand men died in the space of a few weeks, and the camp was in so wretched a situation, that it rather resembled an hospital than the army of a powerful monarch sent to extend his conquests<sup>i</sup>.

ALREADY the enemy's affairs began to assume a more benign aspect. Hitherto nothing but ruin and disgrace had succeeded the death of the archduchess; but the want of harmony in the confederate army afforded the cardinal the fairest opportunity, and the happiest prospects. One army was now wholly destroyed by sickness, and the other was too weak to face the powerful forces drawn from Germany, joined to the army already formed in the Netherlands, composed of Spaniards, and the best troops of the provinces. The reduction of the strong fortrefs of Schenck was the first fruits of this favourable change in the cardinal's situation. Adolphus d'Embolt, a lieutenant-colonel of the Walloon guards, formed a scheme to surprise the garrison, and succeeded by dint of vigilance, address, and intrepidity. He was rewarded with the government of the fort, a gold chain presented by the cardinal's own hands, and a present of fifty thousand livres. The states-general regarded fort Schenck as the key of the United Provinces: they were alarmed at the loss of a place so important, and immediately sent instructions to the prince of Orange to use his utmost art in recovering it. He obeyed the mandate, and thereby left all his conquests a prey to the enemy, who were at liberty now to pursue every method to obstruct the return of the allies. To succeed in the recovery of fort Schenck, it was thought necessary to re-unite the French and Dutch armies. Accordingly the prince of Orange pitched his quarters on the side of Betau, while the marechals Brezè and Chatillon encamped towards Emmerick and Cleves; however, the necessary preliminaries for conducting the siege could not be got ready before the month of August. To shorten matters, and abridge the expedition, prince Henry formed a plan to surprise the garrison; but the vigilance of the governor baffled the attempt, and obliged him to recur to the first scheme of operations. It was settled, that the Dutch should carry on the approaches, while the French should cover the siege, and oppose the enemy's succouring the garrison. This they performed with great intrepidity, obliging the cardinal, after a sharp action, to retire, notwithstanding their numbers were greatly diminished, and the army in general in a wretched condition (A), owing chiefly to the excessive heat and drought of the summer-season, and the deluges of rain that poured down for the whole autumn. So miserable indeed was their situation, that the marechals were forced to lead back the poor remains of the army to France, while the prince of Orange continued the siege with invincible perseverance, and in despite of all the rigours of a severe winter. The Spaniards were no less obstinate in the defence of Schenck; they exerted their utmost diligence to throw in succours, and the prince was equally vigilant to prevent them, and force the brave garrison to submission. At last the Hollanders took the

(A) The picture drawn of this army by Nuville is extremely affecting. After the battle of d'Aven it was augmented to forty thousand men, all well clothed, vigorous, and eager for action: now, says he, by the artifices of the prince of Orange, it was reduced to a third of the number, naked, starving, and covered with sores, or emaciated by coughs and consumptions. Under pretence of feeling for their misfortunes, the prince assigned them quarters in Holland; but such as completed their misfortunes. Even the officers were forced to sell their cloaths for bread, and to beg their way back to France; insomuch that cardinal Richlieu, incensed at Henry's treachery, would have declared immediate war against the states-general, if he had not been deterred by the circumstances of the court, and other weighty considerations. But M. Nuville equally displays his gross partiality and ignorance. The mortality in the French army arose solely from the nature of the climate, which later experience has fully demonstrated will ever prove fatal to French soldiers. Scarcity of provision and bad cloathing likewise contributed; but this proceeded not from the treachery of Henry, but the poverty of the French court, unable to remit the sums necessary for supporting so numerous an army. This much we thought necessary in vindication of a prince vilely traduced, only because he first penetrated the ambitious views of France, and predicted the consequence of giving them a footing in the Netherlands. It is certain he opposed the late treaty; it is allowed he detested Richlieu; but it does not appear, from any authentic proofs, that he acted contrary to the duty of a great commander.

castle of Billand by assault; they ruined all the outworks of the besieged, except the half-moon, which was defended with incredible intrepidity; the intrepid Emholt was slain by a musket-bullet; all communication between the fort and the Spanish territories was cut off; the garrison was greatly reduced and dispirited by the death of their leader, and every thing drawing to a crisis favourable to the besieged, when the cardinal determined to send baron Groobendenck, who had so successfully defended Louvain, to succeed Emholt in the government. The prince of Orange attended the business of the states at the Hague, leaving the conduct of the siege to William of Nassau, who performed all that could be expected from courage combined with conduct, and ardor tempered by prudence and judgment. He took his measures so well, that he greatly augmented his army, and obliged prince Thomas, detached with a strong body of forces to raise the siege at the hazard of a battle, to remain a tame spectator of his successful operations, giving a general assault, and becoming master of a place which cost so much blood and treasure, without granting a capitulation to the garrison<sup>a</sup>. He concluded the campaign with some other advantages obtained in the territory of Cleves; all of which, however, were insufficient to ballance the consequences of the retreat of the French army, and the number of soldiers lost by keeping the field for almost a whole rigorous winter.

THE remainder of this year passed in mutual expeditions into each other's territories, which produced nothing decisive. The Spanish arms were chiefly employed in Picardy, under the conduct of prince Thomas and Piccolomini. As to the Hollanders, they struck their most important blows on their own proper element, the ocean, having defeated a fleet of Dunkirkers in sight of Dieppe. In this engagement the Dutch were commanded by Evertzen, who began already to distinguish himself: the Spaniards had two ships sunk, one burnt, and two taken, with their admiral Antonio Collardo on board. In consequence of this victory, the commerce of the provinces was secured, and trade flourished extremely, notwithstanding it had suffered greatly by the enemy's piracies the succeeding year. The chief advantages, however, were obtained by the East India company, who extended their trade far beyond what it ever before attained, and made such returns as astonished Europe, and enriched the provinces. As to the West India company, it was less fortunate. All the attempts of the company had lately miscarried in Brasil and on the coast of Africa, where the Portuguese were greatly superior in numbers. Chagrined with disappointment, they resolved to commit their affairs to some general, whose established reputation, valour, prudence, and experience, might retrieve their losses, and extend their settlements in Brasil and the West Indies. No person appeared more likely to answer all their purposes than count John Maurice de Nassau, who had for many years faithfully and eminently served his country. The offer was made of appointing him governor-general and commander in chief of Brasil and South America; an employment which the count accepted, with the consent of the states-general and the prince of Orange. His authority was directly the same vested in the governor-general of Batavia; a fleet of thirty-two sail, twelve of which were men of war, with two thousand seven hundred land-forces on board, was equipped; and he quitted the Texel on the twenty-fifth day of October, having already conquered in imagination the whole Portuguese Brasil.

Nassau made governor of Brasil.

OF the fourteen provinces into which Brasil was divided, four were subject to the Hollanders, Fernambuco, Temeraca, Paraiba, and Rio Grande. Since the year 1630 the court of Spain sustained incredible damage by the efforts which the Dutch made to establish settlements in South America. Of eight hundred ships fitted out by the king of Spain for that service, five hundred and forty-three fell into the hands of the enemy, were burnt or destroyed, the loss amounting to forty-five millions of florins. The Dutch had seized upon the island of Curacao, on the northern coast of America; they had pillaged the opulent town of Truxillo in the gulph of Honduras, with a variety of small settlements on the coast of Mexico; they had defeated in divers engagements the Spanish generals Albuquerque, Bagniola, and Lewis de Rocca de Bergia; they had by force and fraud gained over to their interest several nations, who ardently wished for the expulsion of the Portuguese; but at the time Maurice was appointed governor, their efforts had been faint and fruitless, and Christopher Artichessi, a Polish socinian, of all their officers, met with any degree of success. When the count arrived at Brasil, his first step was to relieve all the garrisons, and form his army of troops acquainted with the country, and seasoned to the climate. His little corps, amounting in all to three thousand seven hundred men, he led against Porto de Calco, the garrison of which had almost intirely cut off the communication betwixt the Dutch settlements. Bagniola, the Portuguese general, marched with a superior army to oppose him; a battle was fought, and the Portuguese totally defeated, Bagniola saving himself and a few troops with great difficulty in a city built on the river Porto Calco, and fortified in such a manner

a that it commanded all the adjacent country. Maurice pursued, and immediately invested the fortrefs. The Portuguese general defended himself bravely; but was in a few days forced, for want of provision, to surrender at discretion.

FLUSHED with conquest, the count marched against Openada, a town situated upon the same river, within six miles of its opening into the ocean. This place surrendered with little trouble: Maurice strengthened it by a citadel which he erected, and called after his own name. At the mouth of the river he built another fort, which obliged the Spaniards on both sides to take shelter in Seregippa del Rei, and abandon their habitations. Leaving the greater part of the army with Artichoffi for the defence of the frontiers, he returned to Reciff, to establish the government and religion of the United Provinces in all the country
b subject to the republic, treating however with great moderation the natives and foreigners who had been bred in a different faith, and under a different policy. He also equipped two squadrons, one of which he sent southwards under admiral Lichtbart, beyond the bay of All Saints; the other sailed north-east to the coast of Africa, under colonel Coine, whose exploits and reduction of St. George de la Mina we have seen in a former volume <sup>1</sup>.

WHILE these conquests were making in Africa and America, the plan of a general pacification was laid in Europe. The pontiff, as the common father of all Christians, offered his mediation between France, Spain, and the empire. The states-general rejected an umpire whom they justly suspected of partiality to the court of Spain: however, he still continued to press the other powers to accommodate matters, sensible that the republic
c would not long chuse to support a war singly against the power of the house of Austria. Cardinal Richlieu did not fail to make his advantage of the disposition of the states general, notwithstanding the grudge he bore the prince of Orange. He urged the states-general to continue the alliance with France, and his remonstrances were followed by a renewal of the treaty between the two powers. By this treaty Lewis engaged to supply the states with a yearly sum of five hundred thousand livres, over and above the usual subsidy of two millions, on account of the great expences of the former year, spent chiefly in the reduction of Schenck, and opposing the Spaniards in Picardy. Two days after the states-general renewed their ancient alliance with the elector of Brandenburg.

THE strong connections between France and Holland evinced cardinal Richlieu of the necessity of suppressing his own personal dislike to the prince of Orange, the better to promote the interests of his sovereign; he therefore laboured to gain the friendship of prince Henry. He knew his influence in the republic, and was sensible that the operations of the field could never prove successful, unless he concurred heartily with the views of the French court. For this reason it was that he directed Charnosse, the ambassador, always to bestow the title of Highness upon the prince, instead of that of Excellence, with which he had been formerly complimented. He perfectly understood the character of Henry; and that though he was superior to corruption, inviolable in his attachment to his country, and invariably fixed in the paths of virtue and honour, yet he was not insensible to the irresistible charms of ambition. He gained his point, and established a perfect harmony, to all appearance, e between the king and the states-general, and between himself and the prince of Orange. Both sides now prepared to execute their engagements with punctuality, and repair the losses consequent on the former discord that subsisted. Henry never lost sight of Breda, in the reduction of which he was especially concerned, though the conquest would likewise prove of the last consequence to the common cause, and to the republic in particular. He planned a scheme, which he hoped would greatly facilitate the siege. Near four thousand f boats of different burthens were collected in the port of Flushing; an armament which gave great disquiet to the Spaniards, who believed it was destined against Bruges, Dunkirk, or some of the maritime towns in Flanders. In this state of uncertainty, and not knowing where the storm would break, the cardinal infant assembled all his troops, and distributed them round the frontiers of Flanders, and in all the places which he thought most exposed. This was precisely what Henry desired, who immediately advanced to Breda, when the Spanish army was removed to a convenient distance. By the twenty-third of July the siege was formed, which happened to be the same day on which Landreci and Hanau surrendered to the French. Omer Fourbin, an officer who had signalized himself on every occasion, especially at the defence of Schenck, when the Dutch themselves admired his conduct and valour, was governor. He had a garrison of three thousand men, whom he so animated by his precepts and example, that they became rivals for glory, and every soldier cheerfully offered to lay down his life in the service of his country, and for the honour of his beloved commander. Fourbin possessed the hearts of all his inferiors by his complacency, generosity, liberality, and those other qualities of true greatness, which the most powerfully operate on the minds of the multitude, and in a particular manner on the soldiers. He punc-usually advanced the pay of the troops, carefully inspected their provision, saw them properly clothed, and, whenever remittances happened to fail, generously distributed his own money, coined his plate, and even sold his horses and apparel, to supply the wants of his garrison. 2

THE prince of Orange, accompanied by his son prince William, then but thirteen years of age, and the prince Palatine, afterwards elector, pushed the siege with all imaginable vigour, to finish their work before the cardinal should have time to assemble a sufficient army to give battle. That prince, however, had detached count John of Nassau, with a body of five thousand foot and two thousand horse, to throw himself into Breda. He had orders to attack that quarter of the camp commanded by his cousin count William de Nassau; but he found the works so exceedingly strong, that he dropped the attempt, and b wrote to the cardinal that the prince's camp was impregnable; at least, to force it would require the whole Spanish army. While he lay at some distance waiting the cardinal's orders, he met with an opportunity of throwing three hundred men with bags of corn into the city. The garrison had made a vigorous sally, and the count so well managed the occasion, that, in despite of the diligence and courage of the besieged, he introduced such succours as helped to protract the fate of Breda. The whole Spanish army advanced to Rhimberg; but every pass and post was so stoutly guarded, that, after fruitless attempts to draw the besiegers out of their lines, the cardinal was forced to retire, and confide solely in the valour of the besieged. However, he found means to reduce Venlo and Ruremonde, publishing at the same time a report that Nimeguen was taken by surprise, Knotsemburg by c assault, and that he had forced the prince of Orange to raise the siege of Breda. Rejoicings were made in every town in the Spanish Netherlands, which so astonished Maurice, that he sent a message to Fourbin, governor of Breda, desiring to know the foundation of these reports. Fourbin's answer became the sincerity and honour of a soldier. "He had rather, " he said, the reports had been true, and not published, than false, and reported with so " much ostentation."

FOURBIN's courage did not abandon him on the retreat of the Spaniards: he sustained the redoubled efforts of the enemy with his usual vigour. A variety of brisk sallies were made, in one of which fell, among other considerable personages on the side of the besiegers, the baron Charnosse, ambassador from the French king. The incessant fire d and perpetual attacks from the town, obliged the prince to alter his manner, and carry on his approaches under cover; which, though more slow and expensive, saved the lives of great numbers, and enabled him at last to arrive at the foot of the walls. This at length shook the constancy of the brave Fourbin, who saw himself destitute of powder and provision, without hope of succour; his garrison diminished to a third of their original number, and the remains broken, fatigued, and exhausted. He was besides teased with the clamours of the townsmen, oppressed with a malignant fever, that swept the people off by hundreds. All these circumstances determined him to propose a capitulation: he sent it to the prince of Orange, and it was immediately accepted, without alteration, though the prince's generosity and regard for the brave garrison occasioned loud clamours against his e conduct. The governor and soldiers were allowed all the honours of war, and the officers of the city placed on the same footing as in the year 1625, before it was reduced by Spinola. Fourbin paid his compliments, sealed in a letter to the prince: he was received graciously, loaded with praises and honours, and dismissed with valuable presents, which reflected equal credit on the generosity of the prince and the valour of the governor <sup>m</sup>.

THE conquest of Breda was attended by consequences the most important to the states-general. It secured commerce on the coasts of Zealand, and frontiers of Holland; it delivered the provinces from the incursions of the enemy, quite to the gates of Bergen-op-zoom and Boisleduc; it gained a valuable addition to the dominions of the republic; it depressed the spirits of the Spaniards, disconcerted their projects, gave fresh courage to the Dutch, f and greatly augmented prince Henry's reputation. To put so valuable an acquisition beyond all danger of being again lost, the prince laboured with diligence to repair and augment the fortifications; in which he so happily succeeded, that Breda might be deemed one of the strongest cities then in Europe; for as yet Vauban and Coehorn had not appeared to raise the art of defence and attack to its height of perfection.

THE rejoicings made for the reduction of Breda had almost proved fatal to Rhimberg. The Spanish garrison in the city of Gueldres, apprised of the vast consumption of powder at Rhimberg, in firing cannon and giving magnificent exhibitions, and imagining that amidst the joy and riot of public rejoicings the defence of the town might probably be neglected, formed a scheme to surprise the place, and introduce a body of Spanish forces. That part g of the walls where the enemy approached was guarded only by one centinel, who imme-a diately discharged his piece, and thereby alarmed the garrison. The governor was gone to the Hague, to be cured of the wounds he received at the siege of Breda, and John Weeckens, his deputy, had but a handful of soldiers. Resistance was vain, as the enemy had already applied ladders to the walls: he bethought him therefore of a stratagem, which was to desert with seventeen men to the enemy, in order to prevail upon them to defer the attack, until the orders he had given within could be executed, and the place put in a posture of defence. The project was wild, but it partly succeeded. Weeckens was well received; his story was plausible, and he related it with such discretion, and gave so strong reasons for deferring the attack, that several hours were lost: however, being at last discovered, he was forced to fight his way back, sustained the whole weight of the enemy, and b disappointed their design, by this equally bold and extraordinary measure. When they returned to the attack on Rhinberg, the garrison received them with so much bravery as obliged them to abandon the enterprize <sup>a</sup>.

As the Spaniards were not sufficiently strong on the Meuse to act openly, and lay siege to the towns lately taken by the Dutch, they made several attempts to surprise the garrisons. A deep design upon Maestricht was happily disappointed, on the point of execution: all the rest of their projects, most of which were extremely refined, had the same issue. At sea they were more fortunate. The Dunkirkers attacked a fleet of Zealanders, under convoy of a single man of war, which they took after an obstinate battle, during which the merchantmen escaped. Soon after they augmented their fleet to forty sail, and attacked a Dutch
c squadron of forty sail, whereof five were men of war. A bloody battle was fought, and the victory decided by the loss of one Dutch man of war, all the rest having escaped safe to port. Towards the spring hostilities were renewed on shore. Prince Henry resolved now to make use of the large fleet, detained for the whole preceding autumn in the road of Flushing by adverse winds and the vigilance of the Spaniards. He meditated the reduction of Antwerp; and, to facilitate this scheme, advanced his cavalry to Boisleduc, Bergen-op-zoom, and Lillo, leaving Henry de Nassau, count of Friseland, with a small army in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen. The infantry was embarked in thirty transports, under count William de Nassau, who arrived on the twenty-third day of June before Fort Perle, which he reduced. With a force not exceeding six thousand men, he laid siege to Fort St. Mary, and d secured the whole country to Fort Isabella, which immediately communicates with the city of Antwerp; but the difficulty of breaking down the dykes, and other cross accidents, obliged him to content himself with blocking up Fort St. Mary, and directing his chief strength against Fort de Verre Broeck, about a league distant from Calloo. Mean time the cardinal arrived at Antwerp, and with a considerable body of horse and foot crossed the Scheld. The Hollanders were immediately drawn from their posts before St. Mary; and count William having taken Verre Broeck, and received a reinforcement from prince Henry, e assembled all his forces near Calloo, where he made a stand. Here he was attacked by the cardinal, with an army double his number; but he defended himself with so much intrepidity, that, after an engagement of eight hours, the enemy were forced to retreat. On both sides the loss was considerable; but the Dutch chiefly regretted the death of the young count Maurice de Nassau, who had in an extraordinary manner distinguished all the virtues of a long line of heroic ancestors.

THOUGH the Spaniards were repulsed in this attempt, they were neither defeated nor dispirited. A fresh attack was made in the count's quarters, before his troops had time to draw breath. The artillery at the same time played with fury, all the outworks were forced, and the Dutch in the utmost danger of being totally defeated, when the night seasonably interposed, under cover of which the count drew off his broken forces. He was
f pursued; and his rear, composed intirely of Scotch regiments, cut off, after a brave resistance. Great numbers, endeavouring to gain the ships, plunged into the river, and were drowned; while the Spaniards, pursuing their victory, entered Calloo, and made prisoners the Dutch garrison. Fort Verre Broeck surrendered upon honourable conditions to the conquerors, the prince of Orange's whole scheme was defeated, and the states were extremely mortified at the severest blow they had received since the cardinal came to the government of the Spanish Netherlands <sup>a</sup>.

PRINCE Henry was posted at Bergen-op-zoom, exerting his utmost diligence in collecting the fugitive remains of the defeated army. Sfondrato was detached, with twenty-four troops of horse, to attack his intrenchments. He surprised the centinels, and threw the Dutch camp into confusion; but the prince poured out his troops with such impetuosity, as entirely disconcerted the Spaniards, and repulsed them with great loss, the prisoners
g amounting to four hundred men, among whom were several officers of distinction. Two days after, when the Dutch imagined themselves in perfect security, their camp was a second time attacked at Worven, with such vigour, that having forced the intrenchments, the Spaniards began pillaging. In this situation, the Dutch having rallied, returned to the charge, drove the enemy out of the camp, and obtained a complete victory. Being superior in forces, the Spaniards resolving to keep the prince in continual perturbation, a third time fell upon his cavalry near St. Vliet, the contest was warm, and the advantage disputed; certain it is, that near a thousand men fell upon each side. It was after these sharp actions, that the prince of Orange made an unsuccessful attempt on Gueldres, and that the Spaniards reduced Kerpen, with which transaction and some other less considerable losses on the side of the states, ended the campaign, in a manner more glorious to the cardinal than any of the preceding.

NOR were the Dutch more fortunate in South America than in Europe. A fever that brought the life of count Maurice into great danger, proved extremely detrimental to their affairs in Brazil. After the reduction of Porto Cavallo, the Portuguese general Bagniola had assembled a considerable army, with which he fell upon the Dutch conquests, and desolated the country, putting all the natives to the sword, who had acknowledged the sovereignty of the republic. Colonel Schruppen marched against him, checked his ravages, but could not bring him to a battle. As soon as count Maurice recovered, he took the command of the army, and laid siege to St. Salvador, for which purpose he received express orders from the directors of the company. He had first, by a variety of feints, diverted the enemy's strength to another quarter, and now carried on his approaches without any external molestation. But the vigorous conduct of the garrison, and their first sally, supported by four hundred men, boded an unfortunate issue to the enterprize. In this sharp skirmish the count lost near three hundred men, some of his best officers, and the only person who merited the appellation of an engineer in his whole army. Finding that his numbers were insufficient completely to block up the besieged, or prevent the enemy from throwing in succours, he broke up his camp, and retired with some precipitation, and great chagrin. This disappointment was succeeded by a fruitless attempt on the plate-fleet, made by admiral Jol in the gulph of Honduras. He attacked the enemy with great fury, but was deserted by his captains in the middle of the engagement, and left with three ships to encounter the whole force of the Spaniards. After extricating himself with great valour, he again collected his ships, punished some of the delinquents, animated the rest, and returned a second time to the attack; but with the same success. Just as victory was ready to declare for him, his cowardly officers, whom neither shame, honour, or interest, could influence, sheered off, and again left him deeply engaged in the midst of the enemy. Once more his conduct and intrepidity prevailed; he broke the enemy's line, and opened a way to join his own squadron. Apprehending that his former severity might have alienated the minds of his captains, Jol had now recourse to arguments and entreaties. He set before them the vast riches in view, the infamy consequent on their cowardice and disobedience, with every other topic that could move their passions, or convince their reason. A few were drawn back to their duty; and supported by these, Jol determined upon a third attack; but now the wind had shifted in favour of the Spaniards. In despite of all difficulties, the brave Dutchman bore down upon the enemy, engaged them with redoubled vigour, and was a third time defeated. Thus after the noblest exertions of courage he lost his prize, but acquired a reputation which will transmit his name to posterity, enrolled in the long list of heroes produced by the republic. All his present satisfaction consisted in punishing the cowardly, and after having them superseded, sending them home in irons to be tried by the martial laws of Holland for cowardice and mutiny <sup>p</sup>.

A. D. 1639.

THE disgraces of the preceding campaign determined the states to make the most vigorous efforts to recover their losses. Early in the spring the prince of Orange was at the head of a formidable army, ready to oppose the cardinal's designs, and the vast projects entertained by the Spaniards, who were highly elated with their victory at Calloo, the reduction of Kerpen, and Henry's disappointment before Gueldres. Leaving a body of infantry at Lillo, and a few squadrons of horse at Bergen-op-zoom, the prince divided his army into two columns, one of which he embarked, to make a diversion in Flanders, and engage cardinal Richlieu to perform his part of the late treaty. Colonel Alverdt was left with seventeen companies of foot, to oppose the enemy on the Scheld; and the prince went in person to Nimeguen, where he was joined by four thousand Hessians, under general Melancther. With this force he proposed renewing the siege of Gueldres; he had even detached part of his forces to invest the city; but finding that the enemy had thrown in powerful succours, he dropped the design, and removed to Venlo.

a GREATER expectations were entertained from the fleet sent under Martin Harpert Van Tromp, lieutenant-admiral of Holland, and one of the best naval officers that Holland, fruitful in good seamen, ever produced. Tromp had accompanied the famous Heine in all his expeditions, was the great favourite of that admiral, and fought by his side at the time he was killed. In divers other actions he had so distinguished his intrepidity and conduct, that the states raised him to his present dignity under the prince of Orange, the highest officer in their navy. Having advice that a Spanish Squadron, composed of ten large men of war, four frigates, and several smaller vessels, had quitted the port of Randyke on the eighteenth of February, Tromp immediately went in pursuit, came up with the Spanish admiral off Graveline, joined battle, and defeated him, after a bloody conflict, which lasted six hours. The Spanish admiral, and three more great ships, were driven on the sands, and taken; and the vice-admiral's ship was burnt, to prevent her falling into the hands of the Hollanders. Four frigates were besides taken, and the Spaniards were reported to have lost near two thousand men, of whom seven hundred were made prisoners.

b THE most important consequence of Tromp's victory was, that four thousand men on board the Spanish Squadron were destined for a grand armament equipping at Cadiz and Corunna, the most formidable that had been seen since the armada prepared to invade England. All the maritime powers were attentive to the object of this vast fleet. England and France imagined the court of Spain intended, in conjunction with the king of Denmark, to attack Sweden; while the states-general trembled for the fate of the provinces. In fact, the Catholic king had his own immediate interest too strongly in view, to hearken to the suggestions of the king of Denmark. The armament was expressly equipped to annoy the provinces, and it set sail with twenty thousand land-forces on board, in the month of July, under the conduct of Don Antonio d'Oquendo, who had already experienced the valour and naval abilities of the Hollanders. To oppose this powerful fleet, amounting to eighty-seven sail, Van Tromp weighed anchor with no more than a Squadron of eighteen men of war. His first design was, merely to obstruct the passage of the Spaniards; but having fallen in with their van, on board which was all the money and four thousand troops, he attacked it in the night with such fury, that the enemy were wholly dispersed, every ship crowding all the sail she could make, to get out of the reach of Tromp's cannon. Next morning Oquendo came up with the rest of the fleet, and immediately engaged Tromp yard-arm-and-yard-arm. After a violent conflict the Spaniard was forced to shift his flag; his ship was soon after sunk, and four more were taken; but the Dutch were prevented from pursuing their advantage by a thick fog, which effectually concealed the enemy. Before the weather cleared up, Tromp was strongly reinforced, which enabled him to pursue the enemy to the Downs, where they had taken sanctuary under the wing of the English admiral. It is probable he would have destroyed the whole but for the partiality evidently shewn in favour of the Spaniards. Tromp remonstrated upon the king of England's conduct as a breach of the treaty subsisting with Holland. To the English admiral's conduct he ascribed the safety of the enemy; his intelligence had misled the Dutch, and his motions had covered the Spaniards; but no redress was obtained. At length another reinforcement arrived, which rendered Tromp so powerful, that he resolved to face the enemy in the Downs, and even to give battle to the English rather than be diverted from his purpose. It was upon this resolution, say the Dutch writers, that the king of England ordered his admiral to withdraw his protection from the Spaniards, perceiving that otherwise he must come to an open rupture with the Hollanders. Thus it was that Tromp, after having for a month blocked up Oquendo, obliged him at last to come to an engagement. Rather than stand an attack in his present situation, the Spaniard resolved running the hazard of crossing the Channel under cover of a fog; but Tromp kept so strict watch that it was impossible to escape. An action ensued, and both sides fought with desperate fury. For the space of eight hours the Spaniards made an obstinate resistance; at last they were totally defeated, with the loss of fourteen men of war, burnt, sunk, taken, or driven ashore, among which were the vice-admiral of Spain, the admiral of Galicia, and the great galleon of Portugal, fourteen hundred tons burthen, mounting eighty guns, and carrying eight hundred men, all of whom perished by the water or the sword. Twenty-one of the enemy's ships put back to the Downs in a wretched plight; fire-ships were sent to destroy them; but the English again interposed, contrary to their neutrality, and the express injunctions of the sovereign. That day thirteen ships more fell into the hands of the Hollanders, of which eleven only could be carried off, so miserably were they shattered. In a word, of this whole prodigious armament, only eight reached Dunkirk. Oquendo's own ship was so much damaged, that he owed his life to a frigate sent to his assistance by the generous Van Tromp. Eight thousand men were killed, four thousand wounded, and two thousand taken prisoners, and carried with the rest of the spoils in triumph to the Texel, Brille, and Flushing. All Europe admired the skill and intrepidity.

intrepidity of Van Tromp, and the naval power of Holland. The states decreed him the same honours conferred upon admiral Heine, and the French king sent him particular marks of his regard; among the rest a patent, whereby he was enrolled among the nobility of France<sup>a</sup>.

Prince Henry
invades Flanders.

HAVING entirely ruined the maritime power of Spain, the most vigorous preparations were making to carry on the war by land with equal success. With this view prince Henry took the field at the head of a powerful army, with which, in the month of May, he entered the bishopric of Bruges. He encamped at Maldegheem, in order to gain the command of the two canals that lead to Ghent, and the neighbouring forts. This march a good deal alarmed the cardinal, notwithstanding all the passes were in possession of the Spaniards, and strictly guarded. It was his fear that made him throw himself into Ghent, in expectation that his presence would encourage the garrison, and deter the prince from making any attempt on that important town. The effects corresponded; every where the Spaniards seemed invincible, driving before them the Hollanders, and defeating them in every encounter. Henry, however, was not dispirited by the unfortunate issue of skirmishes, which produced nothing decisive. He was in hopes that the valour of the enemy was a last effort of despair, and therefore proceeded coolly in his designs, without suffering himself to be disconcerted by accidents, which necessarily eluded human foresight. He laid siege to Damme, and declined fortifying his camp in the usual manner, in hopes to draw the cardinal to a battle. But he could not succeed, nor did the reduction of the garrison prove a matter of so little difficulty as he imagined; the resistance within indeed was so obstinate, and the alarms from the cardinal's camp without so perpetual, that Henry abandoned the design, quitted Flanders, and disappointed the great expectations of the court of France and the states general. His retreat left the cardinal at liberty to penetrate into Artois, and take measures for succouring Arras, then besieged by the French army.

WHILE the cardinal was employed in Artois, the prince was endeavouring to profit by his absence, and cut off his return. With this view he formed an enterprize against Hulst, which he began with storming fort Nassau. This affair was happily and boldly executed by the French troops led on by the marquis de Hauterive. The surrender of the fort struck terror into Hulst, and even set the city of Antwerp upon arming the townsmen, and preparing against a siege. Sfondrato and Cantelmo with a body of troops flung themselves into the city, and the garrisons were withdrawn from all the adjacent fortresses, the better to secure Antwerp. Henry's object, however, was Hulst; to this place he laid siege, drew his lines, and gave the assault to fort St. Anne, during which his cavalry was attacked by a strong body of horse, under Sfondrato. After a sharp action the Spanish cavalry was defeated; but the infantry coming up, led on by Saavedra, sustained the fire with admirable constancy, and at last repulsed the Hollanders with the loss of the brave Henry Ernest de Nassau, governor of Friseland; a loss more regretted by the states general than the two hundred men who perished in this unfortunate action. This repulse evinced Henry that he had committed a fault in amusing himself by an attack on a little out-fort, when he ought to have employed all his attention in blocking up Hulst. By this means he afforded the cardinal leisure to draw his troops from Artois; but it was too late to remedy the error; the enemy had assembled a superior army, and there remained no alternative, but to run the hazard of being defeated, or immediately to break up the siege and retire. The latter was his choice, and his retreat put an end to the operations of the campaign<sup>c</sup>.

Affairs of the West-India company in Brasil, and on the coast of Africa.

FORTUNE, which seemed, upon the whole, to favour the Spaniards in the Netherlands, was less propitious to them in America. Philip had sent the count de la Torre, with a strong armament, the preceding year, to Brasil. On his arrival on the coast of Africa, the troops were seized with a pestilential disease, which swept off three thousand men before the fleet reached St. Salvador. The number that remained did not exceed two thousand soldiers, all of whom were too sickly to enter upon action. It was not doubted but the count de la Torre must have dispossessed the Hollanders of every foot of land they possessed in Brasil, as his fleet amounted to forty-six sail of large ships, twenty-seven of which were galleons double manned, and well provided with every necessary. Had this armament arrived safe, Maurice must necessarily have quitted the country; but the wretched situation of the land-forces and sailors, and the long stay made in Ali Saints bay for the recovery of the men, enabled the Dutch to make all possible preparations. In a short time their fleet amounted to forty one sail of armed ships of different dimensions and strength, while la Torre used such diligence, that he collected ninety-four ships, transports and men of war, having twelve thousand men on board, including the Brasil forces. His intention was, to fall upon the Dutch settlements; which count Maurice, and his admiral William Looff, used all their diligence to prevent. Looff came up with the enemy between the island Tamaraca

- a and the river Gojana, and engaged them from noon till night, when he was unluckily killed by a cannon bullet. His death animated his seamen with a desire of revenge; vice-admiral Huygens took the command, and renewed the battle next morning with the utmost intrepidity. He knew so well how to make advantage of the size and swiftness of his frigates, that he terribly galled the large unwieldy galleons, and raked them fore-and-aft, without receiving considerable damage, as they could only bring their chace-guns to bear. Before night several Spanish men of war floated like useless wrecks upon the water; but it was dangerous to attempt boarding them, on account of their being filled with soldiers. Huygens, however, kept close all night, and by day-break again began the engagement with more success, notwithstanding several of the enemies ships that had been the most damaged, were b towed away to the Rio Grande. For this whole day a running fight was maintained, the Spanish admiral making all the sail he could to the northward; but next day Huygens came to close quarters, and so admirably served his cannon, that a complete victory was obtained, with the loss, on his side, of scarce an hundred seamen and soldiers, while the enemy, by their own confession, had four thousand killed and wounded. Ten of their largest ships were driven upon the sands, where they perished with their whole crews. The rest of the fleet was prevented from putting into harbour to refresh, in consequence of which a pestilential disease appeared on board, and destroyed more than half the soldiers. Some of their straggling vessels were every day falling into the hands of the Hollanders, and before the end of the year only four galleons and three merchantmen remained of all this formidable c armament, which had once terrified count Maurice into the notion of evacuating the Brasils. Yet no important consequences resulted; Maurice contented himself with driving the Spaniards at a distance from the Dutch settlements, and desolating the country round the bay of All Saints. Admiral Jol cruised off the island of Cuba for the plate-fleet; but he had the misfortune of being terribly shattered in a storm, and reduced to the necessity of throwing himself upon the clemency of the Spaniards.

- THE signal revolution that now happened in Portugal, produced great alterations in the affairs of Brasil. The Portuguese having thrown off the Castilian yoke, count Maurice doubted not but all the natives of that country in South America would follow the example, separate themselves from the Spaniards, and conclude a truce with the Hollanders. Mean-
d time he determined to seize the happy occasion which the quarrel between Spain and Portugal afforded. With this view he repaired the squadron under admiral Jol, with the utmost expedition, and resolved to push the Dutch conquests not only in South America, but on the coasts of Africa. While he was employed with the land-forces in reducing Seregippa del Rey, and the province of Ceriji, Jol was sent to the coast of Angola, to secure the negro trade to the Dutch company. His force consisted of twenty-one ships, nine hundred mariners, and two thousand two hundred soldiers, commanded by colonel Henderson, who likewise acted as vice-admiral. The colonel, with the land-forces, was landed on the island of Loanda, on the coast of the kingdom of Congo, and immediately he invested the capital, called Santa Paolo. The negroes flew to the assistance of the city, gave battle e at the foot of the mountains to the Hollanders, and were defeated. Nor was Mencses, the Portuguese governor, more successful. With a considerable body of Europeans he engaged Henderson, made an obstinate resistance, and disputed the victory until the greater part of his troops was cut in pieces. The city was abandoned to the conquerors; all had deserted it besides the aged and infirm; the booty was considerable, consisting of twenty-nine pieces of brass cannon, sixty-nine of cast iron, great quantity of warlike stores, and thirty ships lying in the harbour, many of them ready to sail with negroes to the settlements in America and the West Indies.

- ADMIRAL Jol no sooner found himself in possession of the capital, than he resolved to make it a place of strength, for which purpose he built one large citadel, and two upon a f more confined place, but all with regular fortifications. This conduct astonished the Portuguese governor, who hitherto imagined that the Dutch only wanted booty, and would directly quit the island as soon as that purpose was answered. Perceiving the admiral proposed gaining possession of the whole island, he alledged, that this intention was a violation of the treaty subsisting between Portugal and the republic; Jol denied his knowledge of any treaty, a second time defeated the governor, drove the Portuguese out of Loanda, and reduced the whole under the dominion of the states, which they kept, until it was surrendered to Portugal eleven years after. A. D. 1641.

- FROM Loanda admiral Jol directed his course to the island of St. Thomas, lying immediately under the equinoctial, which divides the capital. This island was before reduced by g the Dutch in 1610, but retaken soon after by the Portuguese. Jol debarked his troops near Pavosan, ordered them to march strait up to the walls of the citadel, but to commit no hostilities unless they were attacked, which soon happened. The negroes and Portuguese fell upon them tumultuously, and were defeated, but not before they had blown up a Dutch ship ship with her whole crew and cargo. To reinforce the army, the town and citadel had been left defenceless; they consequently fell an easy prey. Jol had scarce settled the government of his new conquest, when he was seized with that endemial fever, which had before swept away numbers of his troops, and died much regretted by his soldiers, the directors of the company, and the states<sup>a</sup>.

THESE expeditions on the coast of Africa were succeeded by another undertaken by count Maurice against the province of Maranbaan, to the north of Brasil. The company earnestly wished to gain possession of a province so fertile in sugar, cotton, ginger, tobacco, and other valuable commodities, so rich in gold, and so conveniently situated to annoy the Spanish trade to the Antilles, the Caribbees, and all the islands in the neighbourhood of the gulph of Mexico. Maurice detached colonel Coane and admiral Lichtirdt upon this enterprize, in which they succeeded with little difficulty. Having taken the island Marignan, and the capital St. Lewis, the rest of the provinces submitted, and thus half the Brasils acknowledged the sovereignty of the states general. Three provinces, however, revolted soon after, and gave much trouble to the company and vexation to count Maurice. At present a truce with Portugal was concluded. John IV. on his accession resolved to secure himself against the attempts of Spain, by re-establishing peace with all his other neighbours, and particularly with the republic of the United Provinces; for which purpose he sent Don Mendoza Hurtado to the Hague, to propose a cessation of hostilities. It was no difficult matter for Mendoza to demonstrate that the inveterate enemy of the provinces would be greatly weakened by concluding the desired truce; it therefore was signed on the fourteenth day of June, and extended for ten years to all the dominions of both powers on either side the equinoctial. Accordingly hostilities were to cease in Brasil as soon as the truce was published in that country, and the Portuguese and Hollanders were to join in the total expulsion of the Spaniards. Notwithstanding the truce extended to the East Indies, the Dutch never lost sight of their own interest, and seized this opportunity of chasing the Portuguese out of Japan<sup>c</sup>.

THE principal transactions relative to the republic in Europe, were the marriage of William, the young prince of Orange, with the princess Mary Stewart, daughter of the king of England; a match brought about by Mary de Medicis. The siege of Gennep was the next considerable occurrence. No sooner were his son's nuptials celebrated, than prince Henry led his troops to the territory of Cleves, laid siege to Gennep, pushed his works with great vigour, and exerted himself so effectually, that his trenches were finished, and a communication opened between all the different quarters of the camp, by means of bridges over the Meuse and Niers, in the space of a few days. The cardinal relying upon the strength of the place, the numbers of the garrison, and the courage of the governor, Preston an Irishman, attempted to surprise Ardenberg in Flanders; but failing in his design, he turned his whole attention to the relief of Gennep. Withdrawing the garrisons from all the towns in Flanders and Brabant, he detached almost his whole army under the count de Fontaines, and the marquis de Leda, together with a body of three thousand Imperialists, to harraß the camp of the besiegers, throw in succours into the town, and, if occasion offered, to give battle to prince Henry. After all, this numerous army gave less disturbance to the Dutch than the garrison, which behaved with great gallantry. Preston made the most spirited sallies, nailing up the cannon, filling up the trenches, and destroying the works of the besiegers. This he repeated daily, notwithstanding his troops were greatly diminished and fatigued; but perceiving that the Spanish army undertook nothing, that the place was laid in ashes by bombs, that the course of the Niers was turned, that the town-ditch was dried up, that several mines were ready, and that a practicable breach was effected, he surrendered on being allowed the honours of war.

MEANTIME Cantelmo, elated with his victory at Calloo, continued in the territory of Waes, the theatre of his glory, and of all the trivial advantages he had gained over the Hollanders. He now attacked colonel Alnaerdt, and defeated him with considerable slaughter. Next he surprised count Tillemont, whom he entirely defeated, though with great loss on his own side. To put a stop to his insults, the prince of Orange assembled an army near Hulst; but Cantelmo joining the army under Fontaines, broke all Henry's measures, and with a corps of eight thousand men obliged him to decamp, at the head of twenty-six thousand chosen troops, and drop the design formed of laying siege to the city. With this transaction ended the campaign, about which time the cardinal Ferdinand yielded up his last breath, with the reputation of a wise, moderate, and mild governor. The administration came into the hands of Don Francisco de Mello, who with the marquis de Velada opposed the French, while the count de Fontaines, governor of Bruges, commanded in chief against the Hollanders. The death of cardinal Richlieu soon followed: and though it made no al-alteration in the treaty between France and the republic, it greatly obstructed the military operations of this year, and prevented the prince of Orange from undertaking any enterprise important enough to merit notice in a general history. A new treaty indeed was signed on the eighth of March between the two powers, whereby the states consented to maintain a squadron of thirty men of war to cruise before Calais, and to grant the king's troops a free passage over the Rhine, the Wesel, and the Meuse, into Germany; in consideration of which the king was to pay them a subsidy of one million two hundred thousand A. D. 1643. livres. Before the treaty was ratified Lewis XIII. died.

THE chief operations of the preceding year were directed to induce Cantelmo to give battle, which he always had the address to decline. He now retired under the cannon of Antwerp, where he watched an opportunity of again insulting the Dutch territories with impunity; but prince William, who was appointed general of the cavalry, by a bold and masterly stroke, drew him into an ambuscade, attacked him with impetuosity, and after a short engagement defeated him, leaving nine hundred men dead upon the field, and carrying off six hundred prisoners, among whom were two general officers, with forty-five others of inferior stations. Cantelmo himself was once taken, but soon after rescued by the bravery of his own troops, and the negligence of the Hollanders. This action, the first in which prince William ever commanded in chief, spread his reputation, and convinced the world that he might one day equal the glory of his renowned ancestors. Prince William defeats a body of Spaniards.

THE truce with Portugal having stopped all hostilities in Brasil, count Maurice sent admiral Brewers with a squadron to attack the Spaniards on the coast of Chili; but the most important consequence of this expedition was, that the admiral discovered a more safe and easy passage to the South Sea, than either by the streights of Le Maire or Magellan, since called by his name, but scarce ever frequented. Maurice having now nothing further to transact in Brasil that required his presence, obtained leave from the company to return to Europe. He arrived in Holland on the ninth of May, 1644, brought home a fleet richly laden, had particular honours conferred on him by the company and the states, and was appointed to the government of Wesel, and the rank of lieutenant-general of the cavalry by the prince of Orange. The year 1643, was distinguished by the memorable but unsuccessful attempt, to find a safe passage to Europe from China and Japan by the northern coast of Tartary; and by the discovery of New Holland, and other parts of the Terra Australis, or southern continent, of which we have already given a particular account.

NEGOTIATIONS for a general peace began about this time to be set on foot at Munster A. D. 1644; and Osnabrug. The states-general were sensible that now must be decided their title to sovereignty, and the issue of all those bloody wars, which they sustained against the whole force of Spain for little less than a century past. To gain the other powers, it was necessary to link their interest inseparably to that of France; for which purpose they concluded a new treaty with that court, the object of which was to cement the contracting parties in a still closer union. The fruits of this treaty was a resolution of the states to assist France in the siege of Graveline. A squadron under Van Tromp was detached to block up the harbour; and he performed his instructions with such diligence and conduct, as greatly facilitated the reduction of the place. The prince of Orange had likewise directions to co-operate with the French; with which view he penetrated into Flanders, and was advancing to Bruges, where he was stopped by the count d'Issenburgh, and forced to retire to Maldegheem. This retreat, though involuntary, proved fortunate; it enabled the prince to lay siege to Sas van Ghent, and carry the town, before Issenburgh, with all his diligence, could come to the assistance of the garrison. Don Andrea de Petrada, the governor, made a gallant defence; but he was forced to capitulate on the seventh of September, after a siege of six weeks. This conquest was thought of so great importance to the security of the provinces, that the states sent an order for repairing and enlarging the fortifications with all possible expedition.

No sooner were the negotiations opened at Munster, than the states found themselves greatly embarrassed with respect to two points; the one regarded the honours to be demanded at the congress by their ambassadors; the other, the nature of their late treaty with France, whereby they were tied down from entering upon any conferences either of truce or peace, with any power, particularly Spain, without the consent and participation of the French court. Don Francisco de Mello was at this very time urging them to conclude a separate peace with Spain; and it was imagined that very advantageous conditions might be obtained, should they give ear to his proposals. His most Christian majesty laboured to divert them from this measure. Cardinal Mazarin gave them to understand, that their deputies should have the same honours paid to them as the ambassadors of the Negotiations at Munster.

republic of Venice. He likewise strenuously exhorted them not to depart from their own interest, by renouncing their alliance with France, as nothing could be more uncertain than the issue of conferences which might hold for years, and at last vanish in smoke. He assured them, that Spain desired nothing more than to dissolve the confederacy betwixt France and Holland; and to stop the course of the prince of Orange's conquest. Their proposals had no other object, and that once gained, the states would hear no more of advantageous offers made, merely from selfish motives. The states assented to the cardinal's arguments, and in consequence the alliance was renewed, both parties engaging to continue the war against Spain on the usual footing. Accordingly the French penetrated into Flanders on one side, while the prince of Orange opened a way on the other. His design was to lay siege to Antwerp, a city of which he had long earnestly wished making a present to the states. He spoke of it to d'Estrades, the French minister, and assured the marshals Gassin and Rantzau, that if they assisted him with three thousand cavalry to oppose the enemy's horse, he would immediately undertake this arduous enterprize. This proposition occasioned an interview, but the marshals would not join with the prince's opinion; each prepared a different plan of operations, and thus the whole project vanished. The French generals, however, advanced a few squadrons and battalions to disengage the prince's army, cooped up between Ghent and Bruges by general Beck and count Picolomini. With this reinforcement Henry was enabled to cross the canal and the Lys, oblige Picolomini to retire, and visit the duke of Orleans near Courtney, to concert the future operations of both armies. On his return general Beck opposed his passage over the Scheld, was repulsed, and defeated with great slaughter, the general himself receiving a wound in the shoulder, and narrowly escaping being made prisoner. Henry was in expectation that the marshals would now have assisted him in his favourite project; but the siege of Antwerp was inconsistent with the measures of their court, and they excused themselves, by pleading the expiration of their commissions.

HENRY, though disappointed in his great purpose, resolved to employ the rest of the campaign to the best advantage, and in performing the engagements into which the states general had entered with the French court. With this design he passed the Lys, though opposed by the Spaniards, and detached prince William with the cavalry to invest Hulst, a place deemed one of the keys of Brabant and Flanders, and among the strongest fortifications of that country. By the fifth of October, he began to work upon the trenches, and attacked the forts Nassau and Verrebroeck with such impetuosity, that they surrendered at the first assault. Spinola's fort, connected by four great bastions to Hulst and Verrebroeck, proving a great annoyance to his troops, this he likewise attacked, and carried after a sharp dispute that lasted for the space of five hours. Having thus reduced all the outworks which could any way molest his operations, he battered the town on every side, without being at the trouble of entrenching himself with his usual solicitude. The garrison, consisting of three thousand foot, and two troops of horse, kept up a perpetual fire, and made three spirited sallies; but the dryness of the season deprived them of the benefit they might otherwise expect from the canals and marshes with which the place was surrounded. General Beck was, since his late defeat, in no condition to offer them succours; and Picolomini was fully employed in opposing the French army. On the seventh of November, they saw the prince preparing for a general assault; to amuse him, a capuchin was dispatched to the camp, with proposals of peace or a truce. He presented his credentials; by which he was fully authorised to terminate all differences between Spain and the United Provinces; but he could not deceive Henry, who was not to be persuaded that the Catholic king would intrust an affair of such importance to the management of an ignorant priest: yet as the imposture could not be detected, the capuchin was sent back, the resolution of storming the town resumed, and every thing got in readiness for that purpose. Upon this the garrison desired to capitulate; all their proposals were granted, except the article respecting religion, the prince determining, that only the Protestant religion should be publicly tolerated in all his future conquests. The court of France resented this restriction, the queen regent having the good of the Catholic Faith extremely at heart. D'Estrades had orders from cardinal Mazarin to remonstrate upon this head to the prince of Orange, who excused himself, by alledging that the lenity he had shewn upon former occasions had incurred the suspicion of the states, and given breath to a report, of his being inclined to favour the doctrines of the church of Rome.

by the Dutch.*

IMMEDIATELY after the surrender of Hulst, prince Henry attacked fort Moerspeye, situated between Hulst and Ghent, defended by four strong bastions, well provided, and filled with soldiers. Notwithstanding this he carried it by assault, after a bloody action that contia nued six hours; and by this conquest, the last of his life, secured to the republic the territory of Waes, a barrier against Spanish Flanders, from Lillo to Sluys, and a great number of strong forts situated in a chain, at a small distance from each other. With this transaction ended the campaign on the side of the Netherlands.

It was otherways in Brasil, notwithstanding the Hollanders imagined themselves in perfect security by the late truce concluded with Portugal. They did not reflect that this was a measure dictated by the new king's necessities, and that the Portuguese in general bore with ill-will the temporary cession made to the Dutch of their conquests in Africa, America, and the East Indies. The Portuguese ambassador at the Hague complained, that since the crown of Portugal had been separated from Castile, and the truce concluded with the b United Provinces, the Dutch governors had committed divers hostilities against the subjects of his most Faithful majesty; but the Dutch deputies, far from giving him any satisfaction, vindicated the conduct of their governors, and asserted the company's legitimate claim to certain places in dispute, both on the coast of Africa, and in Brasil. Nothing could be obtained besides a provisional treaty, in which it was stipulated, that the parties should mutually restore all their conquests made since the twelfth day of June, 1641, when the truce for ten years took place. The instructions, however, sent to the governors of their conquest were not express; they therefore neglected executing them, and were well satisfied with any opportunity of retaining places which produced great advantages in point of commerce. During the last year of Maurice's government, all Brasil tasted the blessings
c of tranquillity and repose. The truce was rigidly observed, and the Portuguese and Dutch lived in perfect amity. The same harmony continued the year after the count's departure; and such was the confidence the Hollanders reposed in the fidelity of the Portuguese, that they suffered their fortifications to fall to ruin, admitting those who were lately their bitter enemies, into civil and military employments, and without scruple supplying them with arms and ammunition, for the sake of the excessive price they paid, without reflecting upon their designs, to use them to their destruction. Now the eyes of the company were opened by the complaints of the Portuguese ambassador. They rightly conjectured, that his remonstrances were calculated merely to palliate some scheme of violence then in agitation. In fact, it proved what they conjectured. Antonio de Silva, viceroy d of Portuguese Brasil, meditated a project for expelling the Dutch out of the country, and seized the opportunity of the count's absence, the weakness of the Dutch, and their confidence in the Portuguese, to execute his purpose. He carried on a clandestine correspondence with all the Portuguese under the Dutch government, and readily drew them over to his sentiments, particularly in the province of Fernambuco. The viceroy nominated Fernandez Vieta, a person of fortune, influence, and distinction, chief of the enterprize; and Vieta embraced the offer with the more readiness, because, if the project succeeded, he should by that means clear off an account of two hundred thousand crowns with the Dutch merchants. A body of fifteen hundred soldiers were secretly sent on board a galleon and ten transports, to surprise Reciff, a place of great importance, negligently guarded by the e Hollanders. Other detachments were made to seize upon Serinbaam, Nazareth, and all the strong holds in the hands of the Dutch; while Vieta and other Portuguese emissaries were privately levying troops in the country, and cajoling the Dutch governors with all the appearances of the most sincere friendship and hearty good-will and esteem. They had been invited on the day appointed for the insurrection to celebrate the nuptials of a Portuguese lady; and while they were sitting at table, letters arrived from the directors in Europe, which gave them the first intimation of the conspiracy. All their address was scarce sufficient to extricate them out of this perplexed situation: with admirable presence of mind, they framed an excuse for retiring a few minutes, so plausible, that it even deceived the Portuguese. The governors immediately gave the alarm, and the conspirators
f finding they were discovered, fled with their arms to the woods. Both now had recourse to open hostilities, and the war was resumed with redoubled animosity. The Dutch fired at the treachery of the enemy, and the Portuguese resented their disappointment with as much rancour as if they had sustained a real injury. In the first engagement the Hollanders were worsted; but they balanced this loss by a victory at sea, in which the enemy lost two of their best ships, and seven hundred mariners and soldiers. Upon the whole the Hollanders lost ground. Cape St. Augustin, Reciff, and Olinda, fell into the hands of the enemy, either by treachery, cowardice, or open force. Nothing but pillaging, stratagem, and massacres, passed between the two nations. The news came to the Hague, and the people rose tumultuously to demolish the Portuguese ambassador's house. Incensed g at the insidious conduct of the court and people, they would have tore him limb from limb, if the prince of Orange had not interposed. The ambassador protested, that the court of Portugal had no share in the insurrection, and that they would severely punish the conspirators; but the states, well informed to the contrary, carried their complaints to to the court of France, and represented to the most Christian king the perfidy of his Portuguese majesty *.

By these means was laid the foundation of a new truce between France and Holland. Cardinal Mazarin reproached the Dutch with treating privately at Munster with the Spaniards, and said, that their sufferings in Brasil was the just punishment of their treachery and disregard of solemn treaties. At the same time, he promised them all possible assistance to revenge the insults received from the Portuguese, and encouraged them to use their utmost diligence in defence of their settlements in Brasil. This was proposed with a view to gain the entire confidence of the states. However, it was accepted in the literal sense, and accordingly a fleet of fifty-two sail was equipped under admiral Baucher, appointed commander in chief of the naval armament in Brasil, the West Indies, and the coast of Africa, having Sigismund Schuppen to assist him, and direct entirely the land operations. Thus a new war was commenced with great vigour on the further side the line, which after raging without remission for the space of ten years, ended with the expulsion of the Hollanders out of Brasil, and the almost total overthrow of the West India company.

DURING the whole winter the congress sat at Munster, without making any considerable progress in the scheme of a general pacification. The French king, persuaded that the Spaniards raised numbers of difficulties in order to divide the allies, resolved, by the advice of the queen-regent his mother, to prosecute the war for another campaign; for which purpose he continued the usual subsidy to the states-general, on condition they should maintain an army of twenty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, to lay siege to some important fortress in the Spanish Netherlands, and a squadron to block up the Spanish ports in Flanders. When the treaty was signed, the cardinal dispatched a messenger to the prince of Orange, to induce him to undertake the siege of Ghent, the reduction of which would facilitate the designs on Antwerp. It was proposed to march two French armies under the dukes of Orleans and Enguiben, the one to assist the prince, the other to invest divers other places; but Henry was so afflicted with the gout, and a complication of other diseases, that it was not possible for him to give a direct answer to the cardinal's propositions.

A. D. 1646.

MEANTIME the marquis de Castil Rodrigo, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, until the arrival of the archduke Leopold, having notice of the new treaty between the court of France and the republic, and the designs formed upon Ghent, powerfully reinforced that city, and wrote to the states general, demanding a suspension of arms, during the conferences at Munster. These letters answered one essential purpose; they augmented the dissensions among the provinces, some of which were for detaching the republic from France; but the states wrote back, that notwithstanding they were perfectly sincere in the negotiations at Munster, they could not grant the suspension required, consistently with their engagements to their allies; however, under pretence of the prince of Orange's illness, not above half the army took the field. A plan was laid for the reduction of Antwerp; but that was likewise frustrated by Henry's disease, which daily gained ground, and began now to alarm the provinces. It is indeed supposed that he grew jealous of the power of France, and advised the states to hasten the negotiations at Munster. Besides, he retained some of the old prejudices harboured against Richlieu, and convinced himself, that the new minister pursued the same system, and bent his whole policy to procure a secure footing in the Netherlands. As to what some writers mention of his jealousy of his own son prince William, and his dislike to seeing him at the head of an army, it is too improbable, and too injurious to the character of prince Henry, to deserve credit. Certain however it is, that the Spanish faction daily augmented in Holland; that the alliance with France was in the decline; and that Tromp's blocking up Dunkirk, while the French army besieged the town by land, was the last instance of friendship that passed between the Christian king and the republic. Venlo indeed was invested by prince William, but the siege was soon raised, by order of the states, under pretence that the season was too far advanced.

Death of the
Orange.

DURING the whole winter, the prince of Orange lingered under a variety of chronical disorders, any of which were sufficient to render his life miserable, and his death certain. The gout, the stone, and dropsy, had reduced him to a skeleton, and the excruciating torture in which he had passed several months, not only made his temper harsh and peevish, but even affected his intellects. To this the French writers ascribe his falling off from the interest of France, though this measure may truly be regarded as a proof of his foresight, penetration, and policy. At length, Henry yielded up his last breath, on the fourteenth of March, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and was regretted as a martyr to his country, having brought on his illness by that assiduity, diligence, and anxiety, with which he pursued the interests of the republic. No prince of Orange was ever more universally a or deservedly beloved. Affable, generous, noble, and above all suspicion of deceit, and that duplicity so much affected by statesmen, he was justly esteemed the best politician, and greatest warrior in the United Provinces. He loved virtue, cherished science, rewarded merit, maintained the utmost harmony among the provinces, set his soldiers an example of patience, vigilance, activity, and courage, and fulfilled every duty of a general, patriot, friend, and father of a family. We speak not of the two last years of his life, in which sickness and disappointment would seem to have entirely soured his disposition, and changed his character. In justice therefore to his memory, we draw a veil over what prejudiced writers relate of his conduct during this period.

The same day on which his father died, prince William attended the states-general to William II. take the oaths, on being appointed to all the employments held by prince Henry. Some prince of Orange. of the provinces deferred acknowledging him stadtholder for a few days, in order to watch the bias of his policy, as he was supposed inclinable to continue the war, and the alliance with France. It was proposed in the states of Holland and West Friseland to exact an obligation from him, that he would endeavour with all his ability to forward the negotiations at Munster, and detach the republic from the French interest; but some of the more prudent members apprehended lest such rough measures might incense a young prince, full of fire, beloved by the nobility, the army, and the people: they therefore advised the states to content themselves with sending a respectful message, requesting that he would not traverse the conferences at Munster, or any way obstruct the negotiations carrying on with Spain. William no sooner consented than they acknowledged him stadtholder, and he was immediately proclaimed, by the acclamations of the people, stadtholder of six provinces, captain-general by land, and admiral-general by sea, of all the forces and fleets of the republic, with the same powers vested in his father and uncle.

ALL this time the United Provinces were labouring to effect a separate peace with the Spaniards, which was constantly obstructed by the vigilance and address of the French plenipotentiaries. Besides the deputies of the states-general, and of the particular provincial states, the body of nobility was represented by eight deputies. It was now that the sovereignty of the states-general, and the rights of the separate departments of the republic, were established. No other terms would be accepted than an absolute independence on the house of Austria, and an universal acknowledgment of all the powers concerned in the negotiation, that the United Provinces should henceforward be regarded as a free and sovereign republic. The concessions made in 1609 were but provisional: they were indeed acknowledged by France, and other powers, whose interest it was to keep well with the provinces; but Spain retracted them on the renewal of the war, and other states might follow the example, as soon as any difference arose with the republic. The French minister at the Hague remonstrated to the states on the ambiguous conduct of their deputies, and exhorted them not to give Spain an opportunity of accomplishing her views, by fomenting divisions among the allies. This obliged the Dutch plenipotentiaries to declare, that they had no intention to give weight or force to any articles, upon which they might agree with the Spaniards, unless they were sanctified by the concurrence of their allies. The most Christian king, however, still doubted their intentions. In order to keep the states steady, he dispatched M. Severin to the Hague, where he was coldly received, and indeed affronted with the superior attention shewn to the Spanish minister, who was sent to ballance his influence. Severin, nevertheless, supported the dignity of his character with great address; but he could not alter the disposition of the states, or prevent the conferences carried on by the deputies Knuyt and Pauw with the Spanish ambassadors at Munster. At length, after abundance of altercation between the plenipotentiaries of Spain, France, and Holland, after the darkest intrigues had been carried on, and the sources of the deepest policy drained, the following articles of peace were concluded between Spain and the United Provinces:
 f That his Catholic majesty should renounce all right and sovereignty over the lords the states-general of the United Provinces, who were henceforward declared a free independent republic. That both sides should remain in the unmolested possession of what they severally held at the signing of the treaty. That the same regulation should take place in Asia, Africa, and America, as in Europe, with respect to the conquests made since the expiration of the armistice. In the sixth article it was stipulated, that the Spaniards should not attempt the extension of their commerce to the East Indies, and that the Dutch should form no enterprizes against the possessions and settlements of the subjects of that crown in Asia. This obligation indeed was reciprocal, and sufficient time allowed for transmitting the treaty to those distant colonies. Thus the sovereignty of the republic was at last acknowledged, and for ever established, by that power who alone disputed it, at the expence of her blood and treasure, with an obstinacy hardly to be paralleled in history.

Peace of Munster.
A. D. 1648.

Treaty of Munster.

The French king resents the separate peace struck up by the republic.

Letters from the king of France.

FRANCE, however, accused the republic of ingratitude for defeating the interests of a nation, the chief instrument of her present felicity, opulence, and independence. The Dutch were upbraided with a gross violation of their engagements, to accept of no separate terms, until the demands of their allies were fully satisfied; but they justified themselves by demonstrating the necessity of a peace, the private views of cardinal Mazarin in protracting the war, and the frivolous difficulties raised about Lorrain. The ambassadors of the states waited upon the French plenipotentiaries, and assured them, that had they one day longer deferred signing the treaty, Spain was resolved to break off the negotiation; but this would not appease their clamours. They insisted, that the republic ought, at least, to have waited the return of the courier dispatched to Madrid by the count de Pignaranda. To remove this load of calumny, the states used all their influence to reconcile the two crowns; but they were told by M. Severin, that affairs had taken a new turn, and his majesty now thought himself at liberty to act without consulting the republic, whose conduct had absolved him from his engagements. He said, the mediation of the provinces would be suspected, and the only reparation of their error, now possible, was to refuse ratifying the treaty, until the court of France had time to demonstrate that all the obstructions to a general pacification arose from the delays and intrigues of the Spanish ministry. Spain offered to submit the dispute to the arbitration of the states; but this the French plenipotentiaries declined, which served the more to confirm the republic in the rectitude of her own measures, and the ambitious designs of the most Christian king. Returning to the Hague, the deputies reported their proceedings, and received the thanks of the states-general for the perseverance, vigilance, and ability, with which they had conducted the whole negotiation. Soon after their arrival, two letters from the French king were presented to the assembly, wherein he reproached the states with perfidy, and the infraction of the most solemn engagements with the greatest benefactor of the republic. These remonstrances produced however no effect. The states imagined that Spain was now sufficiently weakened, and it was their business to prevent the French from growing too powerful, and extending their dominions on the side of the Netherlands. In vain therefore did Lewis's ambassadors solicit the provinces to delay ratifying the treaty; in vain did they endeavour to excite divisions, and foment discord among the members of the assembly: the same policy which had hitherto induced the Dutch to continue the war, amidst their civil dissensions, and under the pressure of poverty, fatigue, and famine, now impelled them to ratify the treaty lately signed. Accordingly the fifteenth of May was appointed for the exchange of ratifications, which was performed with the usual solemnities, to the great satisfaction of all the parties, except the king of France. On the same day of the ensuing month, the peace was proclaimed. In this manner ended that tedious negotiation of Munster, by which tranquillity was again restored to the United Provinces, and that sovereignty established, for which they had struggled for near a century<sup>2</sup>.

SCARCE was the peace of the republic restored, when she was almost involved in fresh difficulties with the elector of Brandenburgh, who demanded restitution of certain places in the duchy of Cleves, now sequestered in the hands of the states-general. He sent ambassadors to the Hague, under pretence of contracting a new alliance with the provinces; but, in fact, to make a demand by no means agreeable to the Hollanders. The elector procured the emperor's mediation, but it was little regarded. The states peremptorily refused complying with the demand, because the claim of the duke of Newburgh was not yet adjusted, and they must be responsible for the places intrusted to their care. This was only a plausible pretext, as Spain had now wholly relinquished the interest of that prince, who was too weak of himself to support his pretensions. Philip now saw himself under the necessity of alone supporting a war against the whole monarchy of France. Deprived of the assistance of the emperor on the one hand, he, however, found his enemies proportionably diminished on the other, by the peace concluded with the republic. His ambassadors loitered away their time at Munster, without renewing their efforts to finish a ruinous and disgraceful war. But Philip was now sketching out the rudiments of a more extensive project. He flattered himself that the United Provinces, having incurred the displeasure of the French king, would at least furnish him with money, and suffer him to levy troops in the Netherlands, by which means he might be able to reduce France to reasonable terms of accommodation. He even went so far as to propose an alliance; and, when this was rejected, his minister at the congress, the count de Pignaranda, propagated such reports as rendered it necessary for the Dutch deputies to give Severin, the French plenipotentiary, the strongest assurances of their pacific intentions, and friendly disposition with respect to his master. Pignaranda resented his disappointment, and now complained of the commerce carried on with France by the provinces; declaring, that the court of Madrid determined to have satiation;

a faction. With this view the Spaniards stopped the Dutch shipping in the port of Ostend<sup>a</sup>. The states-general immediately took this delicate affair into consideration; but were greatly perplexed in what manner to determine. If they refused to satisfy the demands of the Spanish court, they apprehended their ships would be condemned as lawful prizes; and in forbidding a reciprocal trade with France, the commerce of the republic would be greatly injured.

WHILE the states were temporising, in hopes that a peace between France and Spain would remove all difficulties, cardinal Mazarin played every engine of the cabinet to induce the prince of Orange to engage in his interest, and exert his influence again to involve the provinces with the court of Madrid. It is well known that the Orange party always opposed the late peace; but whether the prince listened to the propositions now made, is uncertain. The cardinal attacked the young hero on his weak side; he applied to his passions and his ambition: but the republic was so circumstanced, that the negotiation proved fruitless. Mean time, after the defeat of the India company's forces in Brasil, the cardinal acted as mediator between the Portuguese and the republic, in hopes that, if a peace was concluded between them, Portugal would then prosecute the war against Spain with redoubled vigour. It was soon, however, perceived that the Portuguese ambassador wanted only to amuse the states, while he pretended to accept of their propositions; but the want of unanimity among the cities and provinces prevented their coming to any fixed resolution. Some were for avenging the late disgrace in Brasil; while others, less sanguine in their expectations, thought it better to put up with a small part, than run the hazard of losing all footing in this rich and fertile country.

S E C T. X.

Containing all the material transactions in which the republic was concerned, until the second rupture with England in 1665.

d SUCH was the situation of affairs in Holland, while unhappy England was torn with civil wars, her soil fattened with the blood of her children, and her king brought to an ignominious death upon a scaffold. The republic had hitherto maintained a strict neutrality with respect to the factions in England, notwithstanding the close alliance between the unfortunate Charles and the house of Orange. It is true indeed, that queen Henrietta, forced to quit the kingdom, passed over to Holland; but she could obtain no succours, except the money raised upon the crown-jewels. The prince of Orange had taken some measures in behalf of the royal party; but they were of little consequence, and detached from the politics of the republic. Now, however, we see the situation of the states more delicate, and the provinces reduced to the necessity of denying refuge to the shattered remains of the royalists, or of coming to a rupture with the parliament of England. James duke of York, having escaped from his confinement, took refuge at the Hague, where his presence considerably embarrassed the states-general. Their perplexity was increased by the arrival of the prince of Wales, who solicited the interposition of the republic for the king's life; and represented in such lively colours the danger of his majesty's being brought to an infamous death, that the states resolved to send ambassadors to treat with the parliamentary chiefs. M. Pauw, and Joachimi, the latter of whom had long resided in a public character at London, were appointed to this delicate trust<sup>b</sup>. These two were able servants of the republic, and had the courage, the one at the age of eighty-eight, and the other of seventy-eight years, to embark in the depth of winter, when the cold was intolerable, for England, where they arrived in the month of February. They were received with respect; they pleaded the royal cause in terms the most pathetic; but all their endeavours to stem the torrent of fanaticism, cunning, and cruel ambition, proved fruitless. Charles lost his head upon the block, to the eternal disgrace of the British nation.

No sooner was the news of the king's execution come to the Hague, than the prince of Orange communicated the fatal event, by one of his chaplains, to the prince of Wales; while the clergy thought it their duty to wait in a body on that young prince, with compliments of condolence. This proceeding was condemned by the states, as equally impolitic and unconstitutional: their speech to the prince of Wales was forbid to be printed; but it soon became public, notwithstanding it was apprehended that the English parliament would take offence at certain flattering expressions, and that warmth of regard shewn to the royal family. But though the states-general industriously avoided the publication of every thing which might disgust the infant commonwealth of England, the states of Holland could not dispense with the civility of sending a deputation of condolance to the prince of Wales: even the states-general themselves waited upon the young prince, in deep mourning, and complimented him with the appellation of king, though they declined congratulating him on his accession to the throne of his ancestors.

It was next deliberated whether the republic should recal her ambassadors from London, and give audience to the envoy sent by the parliament of England. Mr. Striëland had long served the parliament with fidelity and capacity, in quality of minister, at the Hague. He now demanded audience of the states-general, as public ambassador from the English commonwealth; in which he was opposed by Sir William Boswel, who had for several years resided in Holland, as envoy from Charles I. This gentleman's remonstrances were so powerfully seconded by the prince of Orange, and a party he had formed in favour of the king, that Striëland's credentials were, after violent contests, rejected.

Dorisslaus, envoy from the parliament, is murdered.

WHILE this business was in agitation, an accident occurred, which had almost destroyed all the prudent schemes of neutrality formed by the republic. Dorisslaus, a civilian, and native of Holland, employed in conducting the charge against the late king, was now sent by the parliament to assist Striëland. The part he acted in the late horrible tragedy rendered him odious to all the royalists, who flocked in crowds to the little court kept up by Charles II. in the neighbourhood of the Hague. As he was sitting quietly at supper, certain persons, masked, violently forced open his lodgings, and after assassinating him, retired without being questioned, or at all suspected of the murder. The whole province was in motion at so flagrant a breach of the laws of nations: a reward was offered for discovering the assassins; but, however, the states acted so carelessly, that the parliament, harbouring suspicions of their fidelity, made complaints to M. Joachimi; and, in truth, Striëland turned the whole with so much address to the advantage of his masters, that the leading men in Holland grew impatient for the king's quitting the province, and even the dominions of the republic. Yet still the states-general persisted in refusing Striëland's credentials, under various pretences; upon which he threatened to retire. The states of Holland, apprehending a rupture with England, which could not fail of proving extremely prejudicial to the commerce of the province, sent remonstrances to the states-general, charging them with all the consequences of Striëland's departure. Upon this they were forced to apologise to the envoy, and to gain time by referring the matter to the provincial states.

The intrigues of cardinal Mazarin.

It was the true policy of the republic to keep clear of the civil divisions which at that time afflicted both France and Great Britain; but it was difficult to wave the solicitations of the English monarch, supported by the interest of the prince of Orange on one side, and of the intriguing Mazarin on the other. This busy prelate insinuated to the prince of Orange, that the royal family in England being intirely ruined, his influence and power must necessarily decline, unless he was strongly linked in alliance with the crown of France. His design was to involve the provinces in a fresh war with Spain; but the prince escaped his snare, and penetrated his views. He informed M. Brasset, the French envoy, of the impossibility of carrying the project into execution, because it must pass through the provincial states, and the refusal of one city was sufficient to frustrate the whole design. Foiled in this attempt, the cardinal sent instructions to M. Brasset to exert his utmost endeavours to prevent the states from entering into any engagements with the parliament of England, and to conduct himself with such caution, that it should not be imagined France at all interposed in the affairs of the republic, while the cardinal was negotiating with Fairfax and Cromwel.

WHILE Brasset was deeply engaged in this negotiation, M. le Brun arrived at the Hague, in quality of envoy from the Catholic king. The provinces of Zealand and Utrecht, who had not yet ratified the treaty of Ghent, opposed his reception, notwithstanding which his public entry was allowed. Nothing, indeed, could be more glorious to the republic than this open declaration of her sovereignty, by an express embassy from the king of Spain; and the ambassador took particular care to sow his discourse thick with the flattering terms of Mighty State, Flourishing Republic, and Sovereign People, which produced a good effect on the minds of the states-general. Yet this only regarded externals, and the civilities he met with; for as to the real intention of his embassy, he made no progress; the republic resolving, as long as possible, to observe the strictest neutrality. The affair of Frankendal was the most difficult part of his commission. The Spaniards had possessed themselves of that place, and the elector-palatine, to whom it belonged, demanded restitution. The states-general supported the elector, who was violently persecuted by the emperor, and the Spaniards were at a loss how to determine. At last they consented to the restitution, upon these conditions; that the Catholic religion should be established in the palatinate; that a a free passage should be granted to the Spaniards; that they should be allowed a place of arms, and that the republic would guarantee these conditions. This, together with some depredations committed by the Lorrainers, in the neighbourhood of Boisleduc; certain disputes concerning Rhinberg; and an old quarrel with the bishop of Liege, were the subjects of le Brun's negotiation.

It was about this time that the grand prior of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, arrived in Holland, to demand all the commanderies of Malta, situated in the provinces. First, a variety of difficulties arose about the honours to be paid to the grand prior; but this affair being adjusted, the states entered into a negotiation with him, which produced nothing but useless altercation. It was otherwise with M. Ufeldt, the Danish ambassador, who at this time concluded a treaty of alliance and redemption between the crown of Denmark and the republic of the Seven United Provinces. By the treaty of alliance they were reciprocally bound to assist the party attacked with four thousand men, and to use their utmost influence with the aggressor to lay down his arms, and submit to arbitration. The treaty of redemption regulated the duties on all Dutch merchantmen passing through the Sound to the Baltick, about which there had been great disputes. Instead of rating each ship according to her tonnage, it was agreed to pay a certain sum yearly for the free passage of the Sound; however, this expedient was displeasing to some of the provinces, and highly resented by the hanse-towns, as injurious to their commerce, especially as a Dutch squadron, not exceeding four men of war, were allowed to pass unquestioned into the Baltick. Sweden likewise complained loudly of an alliance which must necessarily break off the good harmony between that kingdom and the republic, and queen Christina plied the states with remonstrances, which passed unregarded.

THE states having established the foreign concerns of the republic upon the most solid footing that the circumstances of affairs would admit, applied their attention to the finances, which were brought into great disorder by the long continuance of the war, and the confusion that reigned for a series of years in the provinces. The interest of public debts was reduced, because the province of Holland had offered to furnish money for the payment of all who desired to be reimbursed. However, the public credit was so well established, that not a single creditor sought to withdraw his stock; by which means the interest of debts became too large for the stated revenue. To remove this difficulty, certain taxes were imposed on the barony of Breda, and the district of Boisleduc, because those lands were exempted from taxes during the war. The inhabitants, who had paid heavy contributions to the Spaniards, complained of the hardship of being rated on a footing with countries that had paid nothing. Projects were delivered to the states, to obviate the objection; but none of the remedies applied penetrated to the bottom of the disease: one of the expedients proposed by the states of Holland was, the reduction of the troops; which the prince of Orange, supported by the council of state, warmly opposed, while all the princes and states were armed on the frontiers of the republic. The dispute rose high, and yet the whole difference of opinion was trivial; the prince insisting that a standing force of twenty-six thousand three hundred foot and three thousand horse should be maintained; while the province of Holland asserted that twenty-five thousand foot and two thousand seven hundred horse were sufficient for the protection of the republic. It is probable their animosity was more deeply rooted, and this occasion only seized as a cover to their real designs. Holland had taken certain measures respecting the payment of the troops, without consulting the prince and council of state; and this proceeding was not only resented by the prince and council, but by all the officers of the army, and the states general themselves, who regarded it as an infraction of the union. At this time a deputy from the province of Holland presided in the states general, and he laboured to prevent the assembly from taking any resolution contrary to his instructions from the states of his province; but finding he could not stem the torrent, he resigned the chair, and was succeeded by a deputy of Guelderland, who proceeded to revoke the order of the states of Holland, in consequence of a great majority of voices. Determining to support this decision, their high mightinesses sent express orders to all the officers of the army, not to obey any directions they might receive from the states of Holland, unless they were confirmed by the authority of the states general; the governors of the frontier towns had similar orders; and the deputies of Holland protested against this proceeding, as injurious to their liberties. In the end, the steadiness of the states of Holland, and the fluctuating councils of their high mightinesses, afforded the prince of Orange the opportunity of pushing his ambitious views. Attended by the council of state, and count de Nassau, governor of Friseland, he waited upon the states general, praying their mightinesses to forbid the governors from making the reformations in their garrisons required by the states of Holland.

land, and to send a deputation to each town of that province, to oblige the magistrates to alter their sentiments. The deputies of Holland and Guelderland opposed this request, because the deputies of Friseland, Groningen, and Overijssel were absent; but a resolution passed in favour of the prince, and the desired deputation was dispatched. They proceeded first to Dordrecht, where they were badly received, and insulted by a resolution of the magistrates to hold no conferences with the prince of Orange or his deputies. The prince in person joined the deputies, but no ear was given to his remonstrances; upon which he set out for the Brille, Gorcum, Rotterdam, and the other towns, where his reception was little better than at Dordrecht. Amsterdam sent two burgo-masters as far as Tergau, to request of the prince not to attempt entering that city, because they could not give him audience with his train, which was pretty numerous. As he still pursued his journey, a second deputation was sent to acquaint his highness, that if he proposed honouring the city with a visit as governor of the province, he would be received with all the respect due to his birth and the dignity of his office; but he could not be admitted as a deputy from the states general, because the design of his embassy appeared dangerous. On his arrival in the neighbourhood of the city, he could procure no relaxation in the conditions, and therefore proceeded to Haerlem, where the magistrates displayed the same aversion for the resolutions of the states general. In North Holland the prince met with more civility; however, the magistrates of Medemblic sent to acquaint him that the roads were so bad, and the town so small for the accommodation of his retinue, that they could not hope for the honour of a visit.

ON his return the prince complained loudly to the states general of the conduct of the cities, particularly of Amsterdam, against which he inveighed bitterly, ordering his speech to be printed, to render it more public, hoping, by this means, to inflame the minds of the people, and especially of the clergy, who were devoted to his interest. The deputies of Amsterdam, who were present when this speech was delivered, expressed their astonishment that the prince should have particularly aimed his resentment at their city, when several others had acted in just the same manner. They vindicated the conduct of the magistrates, and their measures were approved by the states of Holland, who, in a public manifesto, declared that the states general had no right to send a deputation to the several cities, which looked as if they wanted to gain them without the consent of the provincial states.

THE return of admiral de Wit with a sickly, shattered fleet, augmented the civil divisions. This officer, perceiving the impossibility of recovering the losses lately sustained in the Brazils, returned, without the consent of the council established in that country by the states general. Loud complaints were made by the council against the admiral and his officers, who were blamed for the miscarriage of the expedition. It was urged that he had formed not a single enterprize; that he let slip several opportunities of retrieving the affairs of the company; that he had quitted the coast against the express order of the council; and, that he had carried off all the provision, and left the company's servants and effects in the entire power of their enemies. De Wit was arrested by the prince of Orange, as high-admiral: he was accused by the states of Zealand, and supported by the states of Holland, who feared that his Portuguese majesty would stop their ships in his ports, and prohibit their trading to the coast of Guiney, if the war was prosecuted in the Brazils. At the same time the states general issued orders to the admiralty of Amsterdam, to confine the six captains who accompanied de Wit; and this produced a violent altercation, the states of Holland insisting, that the order was a violation of their rights; it was an encroachment on their sovereignty to imprison by any other authority within the limits of their jurisdiction. The states general quoted precedents, and, besides, urged, that reason dictated that all officers who held their commissions from them, should be subject to their authority, in whatever province they might happen to reside. In a word, the captains were confined by order of their high mightinesses, and the prison-doors were forced by the magistrates of Amsterdam, and the prisoners set at liberty. William, determined upon revenge, had the six deputies of Holland arrested, at the head of whom was Jacob de Wit, an old burgo-master of Dordrecht, and the father of the famous pensioner de Wit. After being some time confined in separate apartments in the prince's palace, they were sent under a strong guard to the castle of Louestein. Determined to support this bold attempt on the privileges of his country, William detached a body of forces under the count de Nassau, towards Amsterdam, in hopes of reducing the magistrates to his terms, by menaces and the terror of a siege<sup>d</sup>. His measures were concerted with so much secrecy, and pursued with so much vigour, that the troops were in motion before the magistrates had any suspicion of his intentions. Had it not been for some unforeseen accidents, the city must certainly, without striking a blow, have fallen into his hands.

- <sup>a</sup> WHEN the news first arrived at Amsterdam, that the army was on their march, of the Amsterdam four burgomasters regent, one was dead, two were absent, and M. Bitzker alone left to <sup>besieged.</sup> provide for the defence of the city. He was well supported, however, by M. Nydecooper, an infirm magistrate, whose diligence, gallantry, and public spirit, was now conspicuously exerted in the defence of liberty. So popular were these two magistrates, that the people flocked to them with offers of their service. Immediately the ramparts were mounted with cannon, the garrison put in arms, the ships cleared out for the defence of the harbour, and every other measure taken for making the most vigorous resistance. The council met, to deliberate whether the sluices should be opened, and the neighbouring country laid under water, in order to sweep away by one fatal stroke the whole army of the
- <sup>b</sup> besiegers; but a more moderate opinion prevailing, it was resolved only to drown such parts of the neighbourhood as led to the weakest posts of the city. Every inhabitant was in motion, and the sailors in particular contributed with the utmost alacrity towards the safety of this great emporium of Europe. On the count's arrival he found his project was disconcerted, and his force too inconsiderable to attempt investing so extensive a city. He gave notice of his disappointment to the prince of Orange, who was highly chagrined to see a plan drawn out with so much care so unexpectedly foiled, and his honour and authority stained and despised: but imagining his presence would retrieve all things, he communicated his design to the states general, and instantly set out for the army, attended by great numbers of the nobility and officers of distinction. On his way he met
- <sup>c</sup> with M. de Beeverwert, a gentleman descended from the house of Nassau, a friend to the prince, but an enemy to this attack upon the liberties of his country. Resolving, if possible, to obviate the fatal consequences which might ensue from the obstinacy of the parties, he led the prince to an eminence, and bid him from thence behold the vast body of water in the power of the magistrates of Amsterdam, with which they could overwhelm his whole army, if they resolved to push matters to extremities. This demonstration was equally concise and conclusive. William instantly felt its conviction, and entreated M. Beeverwert to go immediately to the Hague to acquaint the states general with his danger, and procure an order for recalling himself and the army; the only measure which could save his honour.
- <sup>d</sup> WHILE M. Beeverwert was employed in this affair, a negotiation commenced between <sup>The siege</sup> the prince and the magistrates of Amsterdam. William had wrote to them, desiring they <sup>raised.</sup> would send four deputies, to confer with him upon the subject of an accommodation. As the magistrates began already to feel the inconveniencies of a siege, they listened the more readily to the proposal. Dissension had thus early begun to shew itself in the city. A variety of libels were published, taxing the magistrates with holding a secret correspondence with the English parliament. This allegation was founded upon Pieterfon's voyage to England, to manage the affairs of the province with Cromwell, who had refused admitting an embassy from the republic. Nothing could render the magistrates more odious than such an accusation; besides, the merchants apprehended that a siege would stop the
- <sup>e</sup> course of exchange, and hurt their credit. These were the motives that influenced the magistrates to enter upon a negotiation, and the prince artfully augmented the fears of the citizens, by threatening to convert the siege into a blockade. To this may be added the little dependance placed by the magistrates in the other cities, who contented themselves with murmuring at this attempt on their liberty, without entering upon any measures of resistance. In these circumstances the following articles were mutually signed: That the prince should be received in the city with all the honours due to his dignity, and paid to his ancestors in the same office. This condition was stipulated merely to save the prince's honour, for, apprehending the popular indignation, he never made his entry: that the city of Amsterdam should engage to pay the arrears due to the troops which the
- <sup>f</sup> province had disbanded: that the magistrates should use their influence with the states of Holland, to effect a public reconciliation: and lastly, that M. Bitzker and his brother, notwithstanding the many services they had done to the house of Orange, and the state, and notwithstanding their present strenuous efforts in defence of freedom, should be stripped of all their employments, and rendered incapable of being ever again reinstated. The council obstinately opposed this last article; but those two excellent citizens insisted upon resigning, offering themselves a voluntary sacrifice for the public tranquillity. In this manner terminated this dangerous civil war, which had brought the republic on the brink of destruction. William's designs were now obvious; and all, with one voice, accused him of betraying his country, and using those forces entrusted to his care for the
- <sup>g</sup> protection of the republic, to the purposes of ambition, and the suppression of public liberty. Happily, perhaps, for himself and his country, he was seized with the small-pox, of which he died on the sixth day of November, while he was projecting schemes of a revenge, which might, possibly, involve Holland in a more dangerous civil war than what the provinces had just experienced. As his virtues were universally acknowledged, and his ambition dreaded, his death occasioned equal joy and grief in the provinces. The friends of the house of Orange lamented him as the worthy successor of his heroic ancestors, cut off in the bloom and vigour of life; while the friends of liberty rejoiced at the event, as flowing from the immediate interposition of Providence in their behalf. The people, who imagined themselves oppressed by the rigid exertion of his authority, were quite indecent in their festivity and public rejoicings; bonfires blazed in every town almost in Holland, and medals were struck, insulting the memory of a prince who might have died loved and revered, had he known how to moderate those high passions which ever b prove ruinous in a popular government<sup>f</sup> (A).

The prisoners released and reinstated.

WILLIAM had set at liberty the prisoners confined in the castle of Louweſtein, on condition they should not be restored to their employments; but his remains were scarcely cold, when the deputies were reinstated with such distinctions, as could not but be regarded as an insult to the deceased. Even the court was divided into parties, and engaged in opposite interests. The princess dowager, mother to the late stadtholder, was less sensible of the death of her son, because under his government she lost that authority which she enjoyed in the life-time of his father. As to the young princess his widow, already afflicted with the misfortunes of her royal father and family in England, she became inconsolable, until it pleased Heaven to revive her hopes, and moderate her grief, by the birth c of a young prince, eight days after the death of his father.

The states of Holland reconciled to the states general.

As the states general had been strongly linked with the prince of Orange in the same interest, his sudden loss caused a general consternation in that assembly, of which he was the soul and invigorating principle, though he had no voice in the states. Their first resolution was, to notify this fatal event to all the provincial states. Holland was no sooner acquainted with it, than the states met to deliberate on the necessary measures. They charged their deputies to assure the states general, that they would sacrifice their resentment to the public good, and strictly adhere to the conditions of the union of Utrecht, and the reformed religion, agreeable to the decree of the synod of Dordrecht. Next, they resolved upon sending a deputation to all the provinces, to conjure them to send to the d Hague deputies from their own body, to deliberate on the present circumstances of the republic. The project was approved by the states general, and the deputation was well received in all the provinces. A third resolution of great importance to the province, likewise passed the states of Holland. It was determined to limit that influence assumed by the counts of Holland and the stadtholders, in the election of the magistrates of the cities, by which they often gained an undue influence in the provincial states, and the assembly of the states general; and to reserve to themselves the nomination to public offices, to military preferments, and all employments of profit or power. They likewise ordered that the guards about the prince should be the troops of the province, and that all the rights and prerogatives usurped by the stadtholder, should now be annexed to the e sovereignty of the states of Holland. All the remonstrances of the young princess dowager had no effect. The infant son was stripped in the cradle of all the honours enjoyed by his ancestors, and supported with a dignity that rendered their names immortal. Zealand followed the example of Holland, and seized the opportunity of recovering all the prerogatives of the province.

THOUGH the princess dowager was differently affected with her daughter-in-law at the death of her son, she still laboured for the aggrandizement of her grandson from the moment of his birth, and with that view, wrote circular letters to all the provinces, persuaded it would give universal satisfaction, that the illustrious family of the founders of the republic was not extinct, and that a child was born, who would support the edifice f reared by the hands of his ancestors. She hoped likewise, that the states would invest the infant with all the dignities of stadtholder, as soon as they deliberated upon that subject. Nor was the princess mistaken in her reliance on the affections of the people; how-

(A) William's genius was vast and comprehensive. Though he had never been in the field, he was deemed a great general, inheriting the qualities of a hero from his ancestors, which he improved by the closest application and most intense study. His constitution was saturnine, his silence remarkable, and all his passions absorbed in that single one of ambition. His person was not only handsome and elegant; but the features of his face beautiful and manly. At his death, he was only in the twenty-fourth year of his age, yet he had made great progress in the mathematics, fortification, and all the sciences, at the same time that he spoke fluently the Latin, English, French, Italian, Spanish, and High Dutch. In a word, he was a prince, who, had he been seated on a throne, would equally have commanded esteem and respect (1).

a ever they were disgusted with the ambition of the late prince, they loved the family, and regarded the infant as the only remaining blood of those heroes who had rescued the provinces from tyranny, misery, and oppression, and the peculiar gift of heaven, to secure their religion and liberties against future encroachments. However, the states general contented themselves with a promise to the princess, that they would forward her letters to the provincial states, though they could not but think creating a new stadtholder unseasonable, as the youth of the prince required a lieutenant.

b WILLIAM III. like Hercules, was from his birth to encounter difficulties. The first disputes arose about his baptism, the next about his tutelage, and the third, which threatened the dissolution of the government, appeared on his entering upon the administration. Deputies from the states general, from the states of Holland and Zealand, and from the cities of Amsterdam, Leyden, and Delft, offered themselves as sponsors for the infant. This honour was accepted with pleasure, and followed by magnificent presents to the young prince and his family. The princess royal, his mother, was for calling him Charles, in compliment to the memory of her father; but the grandmother objected to that unfortunate name, and preferred the name of William, as the most popular and auspicious. The pomp with which the child was baptised, was censured by the more prudent republicans, and many persons were offended at the old dowager's desiring that the duke of York might not be present at the ceremony.—With all her sense and manly ideas, that princess was tinged with a truly feminine superstition.

c THE ceremony of the prince's baptism had occasioned contentions only between the grandmother and mother; but the choice of his guardians was a matter of greater difficulty. The honour was claimed by a variety of princes, who hoped by this means to come in for a considerable share in the government of the republic, and to exercise the functions of the stadtholder. The candidates were Don Emanuel and Don Lewis, princes of Portugal, descended from a daughter of William I. Philip-Lewis, prince palatine of the Rhine, likewise descended from a daughter of the same prince of Orange; and the prince palatine, of the family of Deux Ponts, who claimed an affinity to the young prince. He offered to reside at his own expence at the Hague, should he be appointed to the office of guardian: his proposals were favourably received by the grand council; but they d could not be complied with, out of regard to the elector of Brandenburgh, who had married the eldest daughter of prince Frederic-Henry. Both the grandmother and mother sent in their several claims on this occasion, as the most legitimate and natural guardians; but as they could come to no understanding among themselves, the council declined deciding in favour of either. At last, a will of the late prince's being presented by his secretary, turned the scale in favour of the princess royal, though neither seal, name, or date appeared to the testament. In this rough draught William's intentions were visible; his princess was nominated guardian to the infant, in case she should happen to be with child at his death; and fifteen thousand pounds sterling were assigned for her jointure. The old dowager and the elector of Brandenburgh violently opposed any decision upon proofs e so uncertain; the dispute ran high; it was submitted to a court of judicature, and at length compromised in the following manner: That the princess royal should be chief guardian of her son, and have the disposal of all offices about his person; that the elector of Brandenburgh should be joined to assist her in the management of the young prince's person and affairs; and that the princess dowager should inspect and superintend their conduct. The two latter appealed to the grand council, and the decree was altered; it being now determined that the princess royal, as mother to the infant, should be guardian on the one hand, and the princess dowager, elector of Brandenburgh, and count Landberg; on the other, as representatives of the father s.

f THE ensuing year commenced with a grand assembly of the states general, on the eighteenth day of January. Here they deliberated on the means of maintaining the union of Utrecht, and the reformed religion established by the synod of Dordrecht, on the election of a stadtholder, on subjecting the army to the orders of the council of state, on preventing the effects of corruption in the states general, on the requisition of the province of Brabant of sending deputies to the states general, on a general amnesty, and several other particulars. With respect to the first point, the states general went over to the sentiments of the states of Holland; and it was resolved, that the choice of all officers and magistrates should be in the disposal of the cities, and that not only the common soldiers and the forces in general, but even the prince's guards, should take an oath of fidelity to the states general, and the states of Holland. In a word, the business of the assembly was to g heal the wounds of faction, unite parties, consolidate the republic into one homogeneous tnafs, and ſecure public liberty againſt all future attacks, by revoking all the powers and prerogatives formerly beſtowed on the ſtadtholders.

Arrival of the Portugueſe
ambaffador.

WHILE the ſtates general were occupied in eſtabliſhing the tranquillity of the ſtate, and fixing the plan of government, Don Antonio de Suſa Macedo, arrived in the quality of ambaffador from his Portugueſe majeſty. On his taking his ſeat in the ſtates general, he complained that the republic had violated the rights of nations, in obliging him to enter the Hague privately, and refuſing him an audience for months. He recapitulated the ſervices done the republic by king Sebaſtian, and ſaid, that notwithſtanding her ingratitude, the king was now taking meaſures for re-eſtabliſhing the antient amity between the ſtates, not from weakneſs, but from an inclination to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian blood. He concluded with giving an eſtimate of the forces and ſhipping of Portugal, and demonſtrating to the republic, that this was the ſureſt barrier againſt the encroachments of his Catholic majeſty. Immediately the deputies entered into ſeveral conferences with him, and demanded reſtitution of all the forts, ſettlements, and territories of which the republic was deprived in courſe of the war, from Rio-real to Siara, including all the ſlaves, cattle, ſugars, and other effects; indemnification for the loſſes ſuſtained by the interruption in commerce, and ceſſion of the iſland of St. Thomas, and the African coaſt from cape Lepo Gonzales, to the river Coanza. Incenſed at theſe extravagant demands, the ambaffador quitted Holland precipitately, without the ceremony of taking leave, or notifying his intentions to the ſtates.

THE diſputes with the Portugueſe miniſter were followed by violent contentions in the cities about the election of magiſtrates. Dordrecht in particular was all in motion, and the nobility augmented the public confuſion, by chuſing this particular time for reviving the claims to the antient right of ſeats in the provincial aſſemblies. They produced ſeveral antient acts, proving that the ſtates were formerly compoſed of the nobility, clergy, and the deputies of the cities; and Maximilian of Burgundy pretended, that, as the moſt antient of the nobility, he had a right to repreſent the whole body, to the excluſion of all the other members. This diviſion among themſelves weakened the weight of their influence, and the ſtates gladly embraced this opportunity of rejecting their pretenſions.

merce.

AMIDST all theſe civil diſſentions, commerce flouriſhed more than ever, and the republic engroſſed the trade of Europe, as England had not yet recovered the calamities conſequent on the entire revolution in the government, and France was wholly employed in diſputes between the crown and the princes of the blood, and the nobility ſtruggling in defence of the relics of liberty. Yet it received ſeveral interruptions from the attacks of the corſairs of Tunis, and rovers of Algiers and Salée. Even the French privateers made no ſcruple of attacking the Dutch merchantmen; but thoſe piracies were ſoon ſuppreſſed by the public ſpirit of two merchants, who equipped a ſquadron of ſmall men of war at their own expence, cleared the ſeas, and ſufficiently reimbursed themſelves by the great number of captures: but the greateſt obſtruction to trade aroſe from England. His Catholic majeſty had diſpatched an ambaffador to the parliament, offering to puniſh the murderers of the English reſident at Madrid, to admit the English ſhipping into all the ports of Spain, and to exclude the fleet under prince Rupert. He likewise acknowledged the ſovereign authority of the parliament; all which was conſtrued into an oblique reflection on the dilatory conduct of the ſtates general, who had hitherto declined puniſhing the murderers of Doriſlaus, or acknowledging the ſovereignty of the parliament. Zealand preſſed with eagerneſs, that all manner of ſatisfaction ſhould be given to the parliament, and the titles and authority of this illegal government acknowledged; but the arguments of the deputies made no impreſſion on the other provinces. Determined upon revenge, the parliament, on various pretences, ſeized upon the Dutch ſhips trading to the ports of France, Spain, and Portugal. They inſiſted likewise upon ſearching their men of war; they forbid their trading to the Caribees, and took other violent meaſures, which ſeemed to threaten an open rupture. To repel theſe injuries and protect the trade, admiral Van Tromp was ſtationed with a ſquadron off the Scilly iſlands, which raiſed apprehenſions in the parliament, that the ſtates had a deſign to ſeize upon them as a convenient ſtation for incommoding the English commerce. In this ſituation, Cromwell, perfectly maſter of the art of diſſembling, ſent an ambaffy to Holland with overtures of a treaty offensive and defensive between the two republics. The duke of York was at this time at the Hague, where St. John, the English envoy, had the preſumption in a public walk to diſpute the precedence with him; which being obſerved by the prince palatine, his generous mind was fired at the indignity, he pulled off the envoy's hat, and bad him reſpect the ſon and the brother of his king. St. John put his hand upon his ſword, reſuſed to acknowledge either the king, or duke of York; but the populace taking part with the young prince, compelled him to ſeek refuge in his lodgings. Complaints were made by the ambaffador to the a the states general, who advised the duke of York to retire to one of the prince of Orange's palaces in the country, and expressed their sorrow for the accident in an apology to the English minister. Ommersen, and six other deputies, were now appointed to deliberate upon the instructions sent to St. John and Strickland, who first demanded in high terms satisfaction upon the murderers of Dorilaus, which had been so long neglected, through the dilatory forms of the Dutch government. This the Dutch answered, by presenting a long list of debts due, on account of the depredations of the English. The English ambassador immediately rejected the account, because it chiefly consisted of Dutch vessels taken in an illicit trade with the revolted English plantations. A continuation of the queen of Bohemia's pension was likewise demanded by the Dutch, for the payment of which the states general stood engaged; but this was also refused, the ambassadors alledging, that the pension was granted by the late king, without the consent of his parliament. A variety of other demands were made; but all of them received with so insolent an air of superiority by the English, that nothing could be expected from this negotiation, as it was not imagined the Dutch would tamely recede from so many demands<sup>b</sup>.

Disputes with the English envoy.

But perhaps the greatest obstruction to the treaty arose from cardinal Mazarin, who above all things dreaded the alliance mentioned in the life-time of the late prince of Orange, between England and Holland. It is true, the prince was too intimately connected with the royal family of England, to suffer a project so detrimental to their interest to take effect; before his death, he concluded a treaty against Spain with the cardinal, on condition that the French minister should assist in the restoration of the Stuart family. Thus the intrigues of Mazarin, and the friends of the house of Orange, effectually impeded the proposed union between the two commonwealths, which was only proposed by St. John, and never taken into serious consideration. Irritated at this disappointment, at the disrespect shewn in many instances to their ambassador, at the partiality of the Dutch in their demands, at their refusal to make the required satisfaction for the unatoned barbarities committed at Amboyna, soon after the establishment of the English and Dutch East India companies, the parliament resolved to chastise the states general, and evince their superiority by the most vigorous measures. These notions were confirmed by St. John, who laboured to give Cromwell and the people a disadvantageous opinion of the Dutch, to persuade them that nothing was so desirable to Holland as an opportunity of disputing the sovereignty on the ocean assumed by the English.

Obstructions to the treaty proposed by the English.

WHAT the Dutch regarded as the first step towards a rupture was the act of navigation passed in England. This, though one of the most salutary laws ever proposed in the English parliament, was highly prejudicial to the Dutch commerce; and its taking place at this time, when the minds of the people were heated by a variety of other accidents, could not but be regarded as an harbinger to further declarations. Abstracted from other considerations, the act was in itself alarming to the provinces, as it prohibited all nations from importing any merchandize in England, but what was the produce of the country to which the ship belonged; and the commodities from Asia, Africa, or America, to be imported in any other than English bottoms. This blow levelled directly at Holland, as the Dutch traffic consisted wholly in transporting foreign commodities from one country to another. Ambassadors were immediately dispatched to England; and they were received with great formality by the new commonwealth, which had by this time granted letters of marque to divers merchants, who complained that their ships had been unjustly confiscated in Holland, though in fact they were only detained by way of reprisal. It was easy to discover from the tone of the Dutch ambassadors, that they were apprehensive of a rupture, and powerfully awed by the commonwealth. The English rose proportionably in their demands, insisted not only upon satisfaction for the barbarities at Amboyna, but on the sum of two millions, to repair the losses they had sustained from the Dutch in other parts of the East Indies, in Persia, Muscovy, and Greenland. They also demanded the punishment of the murderers of Dorilaus, reparation of the insults offered to their ambassador, and an apology for the intercourse carried on with the late king, during the civil war<sup>c</sup>.

The two republics on the point of coming to a rupture.

DEMANDS so insolently made, and exorbitant, fired the republic, and convinced the states general, that vigorous measures alone could bring to reasonable terms the new commonwealth. They could not brook the homage required by the English at sea, and their vain-glorious pretensions to the sovereignty of the ocean. The mere striking to their flag was in itself trifling; but the uncertainty, whether they might not desire to extend their right, appeared to the states a matter of importance, which ought to be checked before precedents were established. The English had already claimed the right of examining, not only their merchantmen for illicit goods, but even the Dutch men of war; they might in course of time assume the power of directing the destination of their fleets, and even prescribing whether the republic should maintain any fleets at all upon the ocean. The tribute demanded by the English for the liberty of fishing on the British coasts, appeared unreasonable to the Dutch, though this perhaps was the justest demand of the parliament. For time immemorial, a fortieth herring had been granted; but now the number was augmented, and the tribute rendered exorbitant. To oppose those encroachments on the rights of nations, the states equipped with the utmost expedition a prodigious fleet, consisting of one hundred and fifty ships of war, part of which they sent under the command of Martin Van Tromp into the Channel, to convoy their homeward-bound merchantmen (A).

THE first hostilities previous to a declaration of war, were commenced by the English. One of their ships of war falling in with a fleet of Dutch fishermen, demanded the usual tribute and homage; which being refused, the man of war sunk one of the Dutch ships, with all its crew; a fact that is variously related, just as it happens to suit the purposes of the different parties. Complaint of this action was immediately made to the English; and the states resolutely declared, unless the captain was punished, they should be forced to make reprisals. As no notice was taken of the demand, they immediately laid an embargo on all the shipping in their ports. Tromp, before his departure, desired the minutest instructions with respect to his conduct towards the English. He acquainted the states, that, during the late king's reign, it was usual to pay homage to the English flag upon the British coasts, and in the Channel; but that scarce an instance occurred where this compliment was required on the open sea. To avoid therefore the necessity of entering upon any disputes, or of acknowledging the superiority of the parliament, the states ordered he should not approach the English coasts, unless forced by circumstances. Lord Clarendon alledges, that the admiral had instructions to answer the English, if they demanded a compliment to their flag, that the states had out of respect paid homage to the king's flags, from a desire of maintaining a good correspondence with that court; but that circumstances being altered, they now thought themselves at liberty to act otherwise. Should this reply prove unsatisfactory, his orders were to defend himself with vigour. These instructions, he says, were issued from the admiralty; but his lordship seems mistaken in the powers of that board.

The battle of the Downs.

AFTER Van Tromp had cruised on the coast of Scheveling, he was driven by a violent northerly wind towards Flanders, where, for the security of his fleet, he sailed for the Channel, and stationed himself between Dover and Calais; but in passing the Downs, where admiral Blake lay with a fleet of six and twenty men of war, he was saluted with a discharge of cannon, without shot, as a signal for him to pay the compliment of lowering his topsails to the English flag. Dutch writers affirm, that, previous to this, he dispatched two of his captains with compliments to Bourn, the English commodore, and to assure him that he had been driven to that station by stress of weather. Be this as it may, it is certain that Tromp paid no regard to the signal made by the English admiral, who upon this fired a ball at him, which he returned by a whole broadside. Immediately an engagement ensued, which was maintained for the space of four hours with the utmost fury and conduct. Commodore Bourn arrived critically with eight ships to the assistance of the English; upon which Tromp retired behind the Goodwin-Sands, with the loss of two ships, one of which was sunk, and the other taken. No Dutch writer of authority pretends to affirm that the loss of the English was equal, though they alledge, that the reasonable interposition of night probably saved the enemy from destruction. Nor is this at all impossible, considering the great superiority of Tromp's squadron, and his own ability, which was in no respect inferior to that of the Englishman. Van Tromp, in his letter to the states general, reflects severely on the insolent carriage of Blake, which reduced him to the necessity of returning his fire; and alledges, that he bore two broadsides from the English, by which several persons perished, before he gave the signal to engage. In proof of this, his biographer quotes a letter from the English admiral, in answer to a message sent by Tromp to demand the prisoners; and it must be confessed, that here Blake has shewn his high untractable spirit, assuming to himself such an air of superiority as afforded suspicion that he was the aggressor. It is however impossible to ascertain the truth, except on presumptive evidence, the accounts on both sides being so diametrically opposite and contradictory<sup>1</sup>.

a In London, the news of this battle so exasperated the populace, that they insulted the Dutch ambassadors, who were forced to shelter themselves under the protection of the parliament. They endeavoured to appease the public resentment, by demonstrating that Tromp had no orders to fight; that he stood only in his own defence, and could not, without hazarding his reputation, avoid repelling the gross insult offered. The states likewise sent Adrian Pauw, in quality of ambassador extraordinary, to confirm this allegation, by laying before the parliament Van Tromp's letter to the states, and likewise the insolent answer he received from Blake before the battle. He conjured them to enquire dispassionately into the particulars of the affair; assuring the commonwealth, that if it appeared their admiral had actually refused to compliment the English flag, he should be punished by the states general for his presumption. Certain it is, that now the Dutch sincerely wished an accommodation. They intreated the parliament, by the common ties of religion and liberty, to set on foot a negotiation; but possibly the boldness of Blake had shook their resolution, and convinced them by this first trial, that England was not to be reduced to reason by violence. No regard was paid to the ambassador's remonstrances; on the contrary, the government of England affected to slight, in the most contemptuous manner, the solemn assurances of the states general, and to construe their earnestness of avoiding a rupture into dread of the English courage. Cromwell and Bond were sent to Dover to encourage Blake and the seamen, to thank them for their delicate regard to the honour of the commonwealth, and to provide the fleet with every necessary.

c This conduct, and the orders issued for augmenting the navy with forty more sail, could not be regarded by the states general in any other light than an open defiance, and declared resolution of coming to a rupture. In consequence they recalled their ambassadors, and published a manifesto, specifying the injuries they had sustained, which was answered by another from the parliament. Little stress can be laid on those declarations, in which both sides assert hardily, and suppress every circumstance that reflects light on their real intentions. Sufficient it is, that Cromwell possibly imagined it necessary to divert, by a foreign war, the attention of the people, from considering the ambitious scheme of sovereignty he had projected; and that the Dutch, grown rich by commerce, elated with prosperity, proud of liberty, and insolently confident of their naval force, were rejoiced at an opportunity of asserting an equality with the English commonwealth.

The Dutch prepare for war.

d The Dutch ambassadors having in their return met with Van Tromp off Ziriczee, Pauw advised him to attack Ascough on his way from Barbadoes, with three Dutch prizes richly laden. This measure was embraced, but disconcerted by violent contrary winds, in which Van Tromp's fleet was shattered and dispersed, many ships not having been able to join him in the Texel for several weeks after. Van Galen, however, was sent with a squadron to the Mediterranean, to oppose in that sea the English commodore Bodely. Blake, ever vigorous and alert, seized the opportunity of Van Tromp's absence, to assert his country's right to the British fishery. With this view he steered to the northward, attacked the Dutch fisheries off Shetland, took their whole convoy of twelve men of war, but suffered the fishing buffes to escape, on a promise never to return, without leave from the English parliament; an act of generosity highly blamed by the historians of that country. Van Tromp pursued Blake to the north; but his squadron suffered a second time in a hard gale, just as he had given the signal to engage, as if the elements had conspired against the glory of this hero.

Van Galen defeats Bodely.

e VAN TROMP's misfortunes rather animated than discouraged the states general. They promoted de Ruyter, afterwards so famous in history, to the command of a separate squadron, consisting of fifty sail, ordering him to protect a rich fleet of homeward-bound merchantmen. Ruyter was of obscure birth, and he had raised himself to distinction by dint of extraordinary merit, from the rank of a cabin-boy, unsupported by patronage, or those specious qualities which sometimes secure the friendship of the great, to the undeserving. He now first appeared in quality of commander in chief, and his conduct soon justified the election of his countrymen. Near Plymouth he met with admiral Ascough, with whom he began a furious cannonading about four in the afternoon, alone sustained the whole fire of the admiral and vice-admiral for an hour, and at length, by an extraordinary effort of intrepidity, disengaged himself, joined the rest of his squadron, and renewed the attack with such impetuosity, as obliged the enemy to retire, after most of their ships had exhausted all their ammunition. Ascough had a squadron little inferior to de Ruyter's; he behaved with the utmost gallantry, was once surrounded with nine of his ships by the Dutch, extricated himself by a desperate push, which broke the enemy, tore their ships, and gained the weather-gage; but still he was constrained to confess his inferiority by withdrawing from the battle. Next day, being reinforced, the engagement was renewed with redoubled eagerness; both sides suffered extremely, and at last the squadrons separated, as if by mutual consent: on the third day, each admiral claimed victory, with almost equal justice. Both laboured under disadvantages, Ascougb wanted ammunition, <sup>a</sup> and Ruyter's orders were disobeyed, either from want of skill or courage in his officers; but the greatest proof of the advantage gained by the Dutch, was, that the merchant-fleet under Ruyter's conduct arrived untouched at Amsterdam, and the English took shelter in Plymouth. To this victory, if it may be called one, succeeded another, not less bloody, but more decisive. Van Galen had attacked Bodely in the Mediterranean, and with great valour fought and defeated his squadron, though he lost his life at the close of the engagement <sup>k</sup>.

Holland.

MEANTIME Ruyter was under great perplexity. The last action, though upon the whole to his advantage, was however a convincing proof of the enemy's skill, courage, and obstinacy; while it afforded but too strong conviction of the want of discipline and <sup>b</sup> valour among his own officers. He doubted not but Blake, with a superior fleet, would revenge the cause of Ascougb; and that admiral's vigour and impetuosity were evinced sufficiently in the affair with Van Tromp. Under these apprehensions, he acquainted the states general with his situation, and the probability of his being soon attacked by the enemy's united squadrons. The states immediately resolved to send Van Tromp to take the chief command, and join Ruyter with a strong reinforcement; but Tromp's late undeserved misfortunes, had rendered him unpopular. Without being able to tax his conduct, the people had murmured against the event of his two last expeditions. The ruin of the herring fishery had excited commotions in Zealand and Holland; Van Tromp was like to fall the sacrifice of ignorance, while his character was adored by all men of under- <sup>c</sup> standing. In despite of his services in quality of lieutenant-admiral for the space of fifteen years, it was with difficulty he could justify himself sufficiently, to be retained in the command. Fear of the people, or envy of his glory, had even raised him enemies in the states general, and the colleges of the admiralty. The public discontent was augmented by the great losses sustained in trade, the English having taken and destroyed a fleet of forty sail from Spain and Portugal, and six sloops richly laden from the East Indies. Now Van Tromp was divested of his command, without which the mob was not to be appeased, and de Ruyter was removed to make way for admiral de Wit. Even this promotion did not give universal satisfaction; the sailors loved their two gallant officers, and though they had the utmost confidence in their new leader, yet did they grumble at the sacrifice <sup>d</sup> made of two heroes to a faction. Those who had set foot on shore, refused returning to their ships, unless half a year's wages were advanced, and their comrades on board mutinied against the orders issued to prevent their landing; all, in short, refused to obey the instructions of the admiralty, and the magistrates of Amsterdam. Vigorous measures were necessary to suppress a sedition of such dangerous consequences. A party of soldiers was marched against the mutineers, who were forced on board, after leaving two of the ringleaders in the hands of the magistrates, who immediately gave orders for their execution. This struck a terror into the seamen, and produced the desired effect; the sailors returned to their duty, and an amnesty was passed to secure their gratitude, by an act of kindness and lenity; but unhappily this well-timed act became the subject of fresh disputes, <sup>e</sup> because the provincial states insisted, that the magistrates of Amsterdam had usurped their prerogative, by assuming the power of pardoning. It were easy indeed to justify the conduct of the magistrates, upon the principle of necessity. The exigency was pressing: it would not admit of time to assemble the states; yet, after some altercation, they were obliged to make satisfaction, and acknowledge publicly that they had, in critical circumstances, presumed upon exerting an authority which did not belong to them<sup>1</sup>; one of the greatest inconveniences of a republican government, where the variety of different rights and departments render them perplexed and dilatory.

In compliance with the humour of the seamen, and from a just sense of his extraordinary merit, Ruyter was again restored, and associated with de Wit in the command. Their <sup>f</sup> fleets joined off Dunkirk, and it was conceived they should sail in quest of the English admiral, the intrepid Blake, who was equally impatient to come to an engagement. By this time the English admiral was returned from the north, and his fleet being refitted with astonishing dispatch, he was steering in pursuit of the enemy. The vast booty he had taken in his late fortunate cruizes, served only to whet his ardor; and as he had acquired immense wealth without danger, he now resolved to obtain glory, without the least view to private advantage, or sordid purposes. With these generous sentiments on both sides, the fleets came in sight of each other; which determined Ruyter to make use of a stroke of policy, which, if approved by his colleague, might have been fatal to the English. He drew up behind a sand-bank, in such a manner as secured him from the larger English <sup>g</sup> ships, and obliged Blake to attack with manifest danger and disadvantage. The utility of a this measure was apparent the moment the attack began. The enemy divided into three squadrons, bore down with the admiral, in the Sovereign, at the head, but this ship with three other first rates struck upon the Kentish Knocks. Encouraged by an accident which greatly diminished the English strength, de Wit abandoned his situation, and determined to engage on the open sea, where he hoped to give a better account of the enemy, than if separated from them by a mound. Ruyter objected to his proposal; but de Wit, who had more ardor and courage than naval skill, pursued his own resolution, and soon perceived his error. A furious battle was joined, during which the commanders on both sides performed the most gallant actions; the sailors too of each nation fighting with surprising courage and perseverance. The English ships got off the bank, and de Wit found that he had made a false estimate of their strength; but relying upon the ability of Ruyter, and the intrepidity of the seamen, he fought with the utmost obstinacy, until night separated the combatants. Though the Dutch beheld with horror the slaughter made by the Sovereign, in which Blake fought in person, and though they were equally astonished and abashed by the courage of the English, yet de Wit proposed renewing the engagement next morning, in hopes the superiority he had in point of number would in the end prevail. Ruyter, however, better acquainted with the disposition of the English, opposed this resolution, and both at last agreed to make all possible sail for the coast of Holland, though they saw the enemy draw up in line of battle. The Dutch rear-admiral was taken, but he had the satisfaction of seeing the captor sunk soon after; another Dutch man of war was shattered to pieces, and sunk by the Sovereign: their loss was greater; but both sides so artfully dissembled this circumstance, that to ascertain the truth, at this distance of time, would be impossible. Upon the whole, it cannot be denied but victory declared clearly in favour of the English, who not only offered battle next day, but pursued the Dutch with their frigates, until they run into the Goree m.

The Dutch oversted in another sea fight.

In this, as in the preceding engagements, heavy complaints were made against the captains and inferior officers. The admirals no sooner touched the shore, than they accused their officers of cowardice and neglect of duty, while the officers recriminated, by charging de Wit with misconduct and rashness, to which they attributed the loss of their shipping. The states endeavoured to reconcile the parties, and restore peace and unanimity. They perceived that de Wit's ardor occasioned his throwing blame on those whose caution he construed into timidity; that the admiral was chiefly in fault, but that his error arose from an excess of intrepidity, and a glorious resolution of signaling himself in the cause of his country; a spirit, which, at this juncture, was rather to be cherished than repressed. It was therefore the endeavour of the government to excite an emulation, to remove all cause of contention, and preserve the utmost harmony among the officers. Their zeal proved successful; never did there appear such an universal spirit of revenge, and national honour: the crews of merchantmen offered their services to the republic; and in a few weeks the losses sustained from tempests and battles, were repaired by the equipment of a formidable armament, consisting of seventy-two fine ships of war. Van Tromp was restored to the command, both in justice to his reputation, and because de Wit was confined by illness; and he had orders to convoy a fleet of three hundred merchantmen to the Lizard. Between Dover and Folkstone he descried the English fleet, amounting only to forty large men of war: he bore down; and Blake, with his usual intrepidity, seized the occasion of joining battle. On the twenty-ninth of November the fight began, at eleven in the forenoon, with inexpressible fury, and continued to six in the evening. The first fire from the English admiral was sustained by vice-admiral Evertzon, and Ruyter, who were a-head of the fleet, and in the most imminent danger, when Van Tromp came up to their relief. The scale was now turned against Blake, who found himself surrounded, and in great danger of falling a victim to his impetuosity, had he not fortunately been rescued by the intrepid efforts of two of his captains, who broke through the enemy, sustained their whole fire, and carried the admiral out of danger. In the end victory declared for the Dutch admiral; Blake was wounded, his own ship shattered, two others taken, as many burnt, and one sunk; and this with the loss only of one ship of the Dutch squadron, which was blown up by an accident. Van Tromp's conduct was gallant; but his victory was obtained by numbers, and we may venture to say that he blighted his laurels by his vanity; having, after the retreat of the enemy, proceeded in his voyage with a broom fixed to his main-top-mast, intimating that he would sweep the Channel clear of the English.

Tumults in Holland.

Van Tromp defeats the English admiral.

g As this war was wholly naval, the operations of the contending parties were not confined to the Channel. Both had armaments in the Mediterranean, and the Dutch supplied the loss of Van Galen, by appointing admiral Cats, an officer of merit, to the command of his squadron. On his arrival at Leghorn, Cats found that captain Appleton, with eight ships, had taken shelter in this neutral port. He desired the duke of Tuscany would withdraw his protection, and suffer him to attack the enemy in the harbour, or force them to the open sea. To this the duke answered, that he was at peace with England and Holland; both their squadrons were welcome to his ports; but hostilities committed there would be a gross violation of the laws of nations, and the highest insult to his sovereignty. Not satisfied with this, Cats was preparing to attack the English, when, under cover of the night, Appleton, who was greatly inferior in strength, quitted the port, and steered, with a favourable gale, clear of the enemy. But the Dutch were obliged to combat not only the open force of England, but the pirates of the French nation, to the incredible damage of their commerce. The civil disorders of that country gave existence to a swarm of privateers, who pillaged the ships of all nations without distinction, but chiefly of Holland, because the trade of the republic was the most flourishing, and the ships the richest. M. Boreel had orders to complain to the French court, to demand redress, and to intimate that a strong squadron was equipping to retaliate. At the same time admiral Cats had instructions to clear the Mediterranean of privateers, and to protect the Dutch commerce, without respect to the flag of neutral nations. Cats executed, perhaps exceeded his orders; for, after taking several privateers, he drew up before Toulon, and menaced the governor with a bombardment, if he permitted Dutch captures to be carried to that harbour. The Christian king resented the remonstrance of Boreel, and was highly incensed at the insolent conduct of admiral Cats; but, unable to redress himself otherwise, he demanded payment from the states general of several sums due to his crown since the war between Spain and the United Provinces. This demand was contested, as the money was advanced by treaties formed for the mutual advantage of the contracting parties, and, after some sharp altercation, dropped for the present<sup>a</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING the late victory gained by Van Tromp, the success of the Dutch arms was not answerable to the sanguine expectations of the republic. The sailors, accustomed to wealth and victory in all their encounters with the Spaniards, were disappointed in not reaping the same emolument from their bloody disputes with the English. Here fortune was various; they had been oftener defeated than victorious, and even their successes were diminished by the terrible slaughter with which they were obtained. Several of their richest merchantmen had fallen into the hands of the enemy, and an entire stop was put to the beneficial herring-fishery, by which so many poor families were supported. This begot discontent, which soon produced faction and discord. One party demanded a stadtholder, and another remained fixed in their resolution of opposing invariably the ambitious designs of the house of Orange. The former asserted, that the war could never be pushed with vigour until a stadtholder directed the operations; and the other asserted, that the restoration of that dignity would be the ruin of liberty. Tumults arose in Zealand, and in particular at Middleburgh, where the mob assembled in a riotous manner, and demanded a captain-general of the house of Orange. They were instigated by the clergy, the fast friends of that family; and the disorder came to so dangerous a height, that the magistrates of Flushing, Middleburgh, and other towns, were deposed. Nothing was worn but the Orange livery, and there was no security in the streets without a scarf of this colour. Necessity obliged the states of Zealand to fall in with the humour of the people; besides, the influence of the house of Orange was so considerable in this assembly, that it was supposed their inclination likewise led them to represent the necessity of this measure to the states of Holland. The infancy of the prince of Orange was, however, an objection to the proposal; but this might be removed by substituting his cousin, the count de Nassau, his lieutenant. Aware of the consequences of popular commotions at so critical a juncture, the states of Holland sent four deputies to Zealand; but before their arrival at Middleburgh, the states of Zealand had adjourned. They demanded that the assembly should be convoked; the people, apprehensive of the consequences, opposed it, and besieged the deputies in their houses. At length they were forced to retire privately in the night, to avoid being sacrificed to popular rage and fury<sup>b</sup>.

WHEN the states of Zealand again met, the deputies returned, under the escort of a party of soldiers, who conducted them safe to the assembly, and took possession of the doors, to keep off the mob. They laboured, with all the powers of reason and oratory, to display the fatal consequences of vesting any single person with the executive power, and the command of the sea and land-forces, at a time when faction ran so high as to endanger public liberty; but they could not obtain the concurrence of the states of Zealand, who appeared overawed by the people, and influenced by the family of Orange. They departed with a general answer, and happily escaped being insulted by the people, who were brought a into good humour by the resolute behaviour of the states. The dispute now lay between the two provincial states, and became so warm as to threaten a dissolution of the union of Utrecht. As to the other provinces, they appeared divided among themselves, some towns requiring one thing, some another, though a majority declared for a stadtholder, under limitations and restrictions; which were absolutely rejected by the Zealanders. At length, as if by mutual agreement, these civil contentions subsided, and yielded to the general ardor for prosecuting the war with vigour, and opposing the formidable armament equipped by the English to revenge the late disgrace.

TOWARDS the close of the year Tromp arrived in Holland, with a prodigious fleet of merchantmen under his convoy; and his gallant conduct obtained him the thanks of the states general. It was resolved to keep him in the command, and to augment his fleet with all possible dispatch. The enemy had called forth all their force, and the best officers in the kingdom, Monk and Dean, assisted Blake in the command. Ruyter was joined to Tromp, and they set sail, to convoy through the Channel a vast fleet of merchantmen homeward-bound. It was the intention of the English to intercept this valuable convoy; accordingly they steered towards the isle of Rhé, where, on the eighth of February, they discovered by break of day the Dutch squadron. The fight began under Blake and Dean, seconded by twelve more ships, and the charge was furious, this small division standing the whole fire of the enemy. Never was any engagement more terrible or obstinate: the honour of both nations depended; Blake fought to retrieve the reputation he had lost, and Tromp to maintain the laurels he had won in the last battle. Neither side would yield the victory; the engagement was renewed for three days successively; the sea was covered with wrecks, the sun obscured with smoke, and the air pierced with the dreadful shouts and shrieks of the combatants, and the terrible thunder of the cannon. For whole hours the ships engaged board-and-board, and a dead calm happened, as if nature had suspended her operations to attend the event of the battle. After the utmost exertions of skill and intrepidity on both sides, Tromp, towards the evening of the third day, drew off his fleet, but in such good order, that he seemed rather to decline the further effusion of human blood, than yield the victory. His loss, however, amounted to eleven men of war, two thousand men were killed, and fourteen hundred taken; but the English fleet was in so shattered a condition, as prevented the admiral's pursuing. Besides, his loss was nearly equal to the enemy's, and though he maintained his station, he could not be said to have gained a victory. The English however claimed it; and Blake, in his letter to the parliament, asserts that, by the blessing of providence, he had gained a victory, and taken a great number of prisoners. Bonfires were lighted in all the towns, and the Dutch prisoners conducted in triumph to Canterbury: yet, after all, it must be confessed that there was little cause for rejoicings, or any pretensions to victory. Van Tromp's fleet was inferior in number, as he was forced to leave one division for the protection of the merchant-fleet, his powder and shot were exhausted, and the merchants clamorous to get out of the reach of danger: these were the reasons for his retiring; and he had sufficiently obtained his purpose, in frustrating the scheme of the English to crush, at one blow, the United Provinces, by the total destruction of their commerce.

A. D. 1653.

A sea-fight continues for three days.

ON this occasion, Charles king of England wrote to M. Boreel, requesting, that the states general would supply him with a squadron, in which he would embark with the officers round him, and either gain a victory or a period to all his misfortunes from the hands of his rebellious subjects; but little regard was paid to this compliment, which produced no great utility to the republic. The states preferred the thoughts of peace to proposals from which nothing could be expected, besides the fruitless honour of having a king fighting their battles. A thousand difficulties, however, obstructed this laudable scheme. The English were endeavouring to draw the queen of Sweden into an alliance against the republic, and Van Buiningen found that princess and her ministers violently prejudiced against the Dutch, on his arrival in Sweden. He proceeded, however, to lay his instructions before the Oxenstierns, father and son, representing to them, that the treaties between the crown of Sweden and the republic engaged them mutually to support each other's interests. The Swedes, replied, that the Dutch were the aggressors, and the authors of the war, by the treatment which the English ambassador had met with in Holland; an alliance purely defensive could, therefore, lay the crown under no obligation of engaging in this war. Buiningen endeavoured to set the chancellor right in this particular, and opposed with all his might the intention of the court to send an embassy to London. He even threatened to quit Sweden if this resolution was persisted in; but he was given to understand the queen was not to be directed where she sent, or to whom she paid her compliments. All that the Dutch ambassador could obtain was, a kind of promise that Sweden would observe a neutrality.

Negotiations with Sweden and Denmark.

FINDING all his endeavours to procure a renewal of the treaty of 1640 fruitless, Buiningen turned his thoughts to the court of Denmark, where he promised himself more success; because it rarely happens but the crowns of Sweden and Denmark embrace opposite interests. Christina, jealous of his negotiations with her rival, now offered her mediation to procure peace with England and the republic. Buiningen listened to the proposal, but at the same time privately pursued his application to the court of Copenhagen, in which he met with greater difficulties than he imagined, from the extreme circumspection of the king and ministry. These the Dutchman strove to remove by a stratagem, which might have proved a severe blow to the English commerce. A fleet of above twenty ships of that nation was then to return from the Baltic, laden with naval stores. Apprehensive of being intercepted by the Dutch squadron cruising in the Sound, the captains desired permission of the king to shelter themselves in the harbour of Copenhagen. Leave was accordingly granted, and the Dutch envoy had influence enough over the sovereign, and so thorough a knowledge of his prevalent passion, avarice, that he persuaded the king to seize the ships, and confiscate their cargoes; hoping by this means to produce an irreconcilable breach between Denmark and England. Some writers indeed charge the whole transaction on the king's own perfidy and avarice; but Basnage affirms, and circumstances corroborate the allegation, that it proceeded from the persuasion of the Dutch envoy. The spirited conduct, however, of the parliament deprived the Danish monarch of the fruits of his treachery; an English squadron appeared in the Baltic, and soon forced him to make restitution; which at the same time retarded his declaration in favour of the republic. Christina likewise co-operated to frustrate the proposed alliance, and used every intrigue and chicane of the cabinet, in favour of the parliament; but in the end, M. Keiser, the Dutch envoy, who succeeded Buiningen, surmounted every obstruction, and finished the treaty with Frederick III. In consequence, the king stipulated to equip twenty ships of war, and the states general to pay an annual subsidy of one hundred and eighty thousand rixdollars. The treaty was offensive and defensive, it being agreed, that neither party should conclude peace without the consent of the other; and the Dutch drew this advantage from it, that the English were excluded the benefit of trading to the Baltic, and of buying up supplies of naval stores, the king of Denmark having the absolute command of the Sound, and of course of the Baltic. In other respects the alliance proved useless; for the king was so apprehensive of his own coasts, that he would never permit his ships of war to join the Hollanders, or proceed to any distance against the common enemy, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances and complaints of his allies. A number of other circumstances likewise contributed to destroy the expected effects; but we shall avoid mentioning them, as they will more properly be recited in the history of Denmark.

Treaty with Denmark.

De Wit made pensionary.

Negotiations
for a peace
with England.

SUCH was the situation of the republic with respect to the North, when Cromwel rejected the proposed mediation of the crown of Sweden, when it was generally believed that all thoughts of peace were laid aside; however, the universal discontent that reigned in the provinces, and the elevation of M. de Wit to the office of pensionary of Holland, in the room of M. Pauw deceased, made great changes in the politics of Holland. M. de Wit was the son of that burgo-master of Dordrecht, imprisoned by the prince of Orange. He was the staunch friend of liberty, a personal enemy to the house of Orange, and a strenuous advocate for peace with England, which he knew to be the most effectual method of curbing the ambition of this family, and silencing the public clamours for a stadtholder. On his first coming into the administration, he applied diligently to carry this important point, and to finish a war which answered no purpose but exhausting the finances, and ruining the commerce. For the greater security, he exacted an oath from all the deputies, that they would religiously keep secret the propositions he was about to make; after which he proposed entering upon a negotiation with the parliament of England, without imparting the design to the other provinces. Holland supported the great burthen of the war; it was therefore but reasonable this province should have a principal share in negotiating a peace; but it was necessary to take some steps, before the design should meet with obstruction from the other provinces. De Wit's proposition was admitted more readily than he could expect, on M. Doleman's shewing letters which he had received from general Monk, assuring him that overtures of peace would be well received at the court of London. Leyden alone opposed the measure, urging that it was a gross violation of the treaty of Utrecht; but this objection was superseded, and the states of Holland wrote privately to the parliament, lamenting that two powerful maritime powers, connected by the ties of liberty and religion, should employ their whole force in destroying each other. "What a triumph" would this be to the enemies of the reformation, and to those who hoped to lay the foundation of a naval power on the destruction of the masters of the ocean." A variety of other reflections were added; and the states concluded with requesting, that the

- a parliament would please to appoint the time and place for a negotiation ; otherwise they must commit their cause to providence, and leave the event of a just and necessary defence to the Almighty, who would not fail to punish that pride and ambition which should occasion the effusion of so much christian blood. All the Dutch writers unanimously deny, that the republic supplicated peace at this time, as is asserted by the English historians ; they proposed it indeed, but spoke with the freedom and manly courage of equals, whose moderation, more than their inability or fear, rendered them desirous of terminating a ruinous quarrel, in which both sides were losers. They deny that any letter was ever sent to Lenthall the speaker, such as afterwards was privately handed about, under the title of, The humble supplication of the states of Holland, praying the English parliament to grant peace.
- b This, they alledge, was an artifice of Cromwel's, and an impudent forgery to answer his own particular designs upon the parliament. It is, however, a strong argument in favour of what the English writers relate, that no reason can be assigned why Cromwel should take the trouble of such a forgery, as it was certainly his interest that the war should go on, the army become necessary, and the legislative power subject to the executive ; which accordingly happened about this time. Some Dutch writers also insinuate, that Cromwel, when this negotiation was set on foot, tampered with the envoys about a treaty with the states against the parliament ; an insinuation that has not the least shadow of probability ; for now Cromwel and the army had actually dissolved the old parliament, and substituted a wrong-headed set of fanatics, entirely at their devotion, as a nominal legislature. The truth is, the states of Holland wished for peace, de Wit proposed it, and the letter we have mentioned was sent ; but the republic was not yet sufficiently humble to talk in the petitionary stile of that supplication mentioned by the English ; it was not before the death of her brave admiral, and the destruction of her fleet, after the most obstinate and bloody battle recorded in history, that she had recourse to prayers, entreaties, and the clemency of the council of state : but as this event happened nearly about the same time, authors have confounded the dates, and mistaken the petition to Cromwel and his council, for the letter addressed to Lenthall, the speaker of the house of commons. This, however, we must allow, that the states appointed three deputies, Beverning, Nieuport, and Vander Peter, to negotiate a treaty with Cromwel, without consulting the parliament ; but before the embassy set out, or the instructions were drawn up, admiral Tromp, with above ninety ships of war, fell in with an English fleet of the same number, but greatly superior in size and weight of metal, under the command of Monk, Dean, Pen, and Lawson. Before he set sail, he complained of the inequality of his strength, the chief part of his fleet consisting of eight merchantmen, converted into men of war, and commanded by the very officers who had been taxed with cowardice in former engagements. To shew his obedience and desire of serving his country, Tromp accepted the command ; but acquainted the states that he could not answer for the consequences of a battle. His remonstrance produced a resolution to equip with all expedition a squadron of thirty large ships ; but before this armament was got ready, Tromp's fate, and that of the republic, were decided.
- c His instructions were, to take under his convoy an outward-bound fleet of merchantmen, and to escort back to Holland another fleet of near three hundred trading vessels. This commission he executed with so much address, that not a single ship fell into the enemy's hands, though he was closely pursued to the height of Aberdeen. Piqued at their disappointment, the English wreaked their vengeance on a fleet of fishing-boats, and spread terror along the coasts of Holland. Van Tromp, determined upon retribution, sailed for the Downs to fight the enemy ; but not finding them in that station, after sustaining a warm fire from Dover castle, he sailed for the coast of Flanders, where the English fleet was descried. They immediately engaged with equal alacrity, and fought with incredible fury till night interposed. Dean was killed in the beginning of the action, but his loss was concealed with admirable presence of mind, and the battle renewed next day with fresh vigour. Lawson charged with the blue squadron, consisting of forty stout ships, with such impetuosity as forced the Dutch line, and would have taken de Ruyter's ship, had he not seasonably been relieved by Van Tromp, who pierced through the thickest of the enemy's fire to his assistance. Tromp was engaged by Monk, and the battle raged from morning to night, each party being ignorant of the loss they sustained amidst impenetrable clouds of smoke. At last ammunition failed, and the Dutch gradually slackened fire, and at last withdrew, all Tromp's menaces and persuasions being unable to bring his officers back to the charge. Their fury sunk beneath the well-conducted ardor of the English, the weight of whose metal gave them great advantages. Tromp had been twice taken, but his own and de Ruyter's bravery rescued him ; six of his best ships were sunk, two blown up, and eleven taken ; yet only the want of ammunition, and of spirit in his captains,

Mistake of the Dutch writers.

Another sea-fight, in which the Dutch are defeated.

prevented his renewing the fight, and accepting the cartel offered next day by the English.<sup>a</sup> All the English historians agree that the Dutch slackened fire, and withdrew by three in the afternoon; but it is certain that night separated the combatants, and possibly saved the Dutch fleet from entire destruction, as it furnished Tromp with the opportunity of taking shelter behind the banks of Weilingen, where he could not be pursued.

Complaints of the Dutch admirals.

Now the victorious enemy rode triumphant before the Texel, until the Dutch fleet assembled at Flushing, from whence Tromp and Ruyter sent remonstrances to the states of the inequality of their strength. They desired either to be recalled, or put upon a footing with the enemy in weight of metal, and force of ships; and also that store-ships might attend the fleet, as the want of ammunition had caused the loss of the two last battles. They desired payment of the seamen's wages, a recompence for the wounded, and rewards for those who had signalised themselves. Ruyter, in particular, declared, that he would no longer hazard his reputation, until the fleet was augmented with large ships; and vice-admiral de Wit expressed himself in the strongest manner in the assembly of the states of Holland: "Why, said he, should I conceal from you, who are my sovereigns, that the English are our masters, and consequently lords of the ocean?" The states promised to pay due regard to the remonstrances, and immediately sent to the other provinces, to borrow a sum sufficient for equipping thirty first-rate ships, for which the admiralty had order to provide seamen, stores, rigging, and other necessaries, and to be directed in those particulars by Tromp, Ruyter, and de Wit.<sup>b</sup>

Tumults in different parts of Holland.

YET could not these vigorous resolutions appease the murmurs of the people. The provinces were overwhelmed with consternation, on seeing the armament they deemed invincible, defeated, shattered, and blocked up in their harbours. Van Tromp's complaints, and the instigation of the Orange party, increased the popular discontent; and it was insinuated, that the republic was betrayed, and an unequal force sent against the enemy, only to shew the necessity of making peace upon any conditions. To this, the negotiation entered upon with Cromwell, by Buiningen, added fuel, and the flame now burst out with such violence as threatened the ruin of the provinces. The enemies of the house of Orange durst not presume to mention peace, for fear of exasperating the people; and the states, contrary to inclination, were forced to proceed with redoubled vigour in repairing the fleet, as the best means of appeasing the public discontent, and obtaining reasonable terms from the enemy.<sup>c</sup>

BUT what chiefly excited public commotions, was the opposition made by de Wit and the Louvestein party to the creation of a stadtholder. This faction wished for a peace, for the protection of France, and the friendship of England; they were consequently enemies to the house of Stuart; but Van Tromp was popular, he espoused the house of Orange, wished for a stadtholder, and the continuance of the war upon such a footing as would give some chance to his talents, and an opportunity of retrieving his glory. An accident happened that gave vent to the popular discontent. The young prince of Orange was to return from Breda, and the children at the Hague formed themselves into companies, with Orange standards, and proceeded to meet the prince on his journey. As the prince did not arrive on the expected day, the young soldiers separated at night, and retired quietly to their several houses: however, that they might not entirely lose the expences bestowed in colours, standards, and military ensigns, they assembled next day, and appeared in arms before the palace. The magistrates gave orders they should be chastised; their parents flew to the assistance of their children; and, in revenge, attacked the house of M. de Wit, whom they imagined the most violent enemy of the house of Orange. The tumult could not be suppressed without application to military force. A party of soldiers was called in, and crowds of the mutineers, men, women, and children, were thrown into prison. Now the whole province was in a flame, and it was necessary to keep strong guards in the towns, to awe the multitude, who threatened destruction to all government.<sup>e</sup> At Sluys all precautions proved fruitless; the herring-fishers, incensed at their being deprived of bread by the English, took arms, seized on the arsenal and magazines, mounted the cannon on the ramparts, fired upon the troops brought to quell the mutiny, and shut the gates against Brederode, marechal of the camp, sent by the states to apply effectual remedies to this dangerous disorder. In this situation stood affairs for several days, without any possibility of gaining admittance into the town. At last a happy stratagem put an end to a riot, which might have produced the most fatal consequences. A messenger from the states came to the gates, pretending that he was charged with a special commission, upon which he was introduced to the town-house, and the people were summoned by the alarm-bell to attend. They all flocked from their houses and posts, eager to hear the propositions; and while the messenger was, in a loud voice, reading a paper he held<sup>f</sup>

a in his hand, nine companies of foot seized on the gates, entered the town, took prisoners the ringleaders, without resistance, and terrified the inhabitants into submission before they had exchanged a blow. Some of the seditious gave out that designs were formed upon their privileges; but their voice was drowned in the general consternation, and the assurances given by the chief officer, that nothing more was intended than to restore the public tranquillity.

b This tumult was no sooner suppressed, than another appeared in the Texel, where the count de Nassau arrived, on advice that an expedition was preparing in England against this island and the Brille. He was received by the people as their deliverer, and crowds of men and women went to meet him, strewing the way with flowers. These honours shewn the count, and the liberty he had taken of assembling some troops without their orders, gave umbrage to the states of Holland, who beheld with surprise the authority he assumed in a province where he had no legal power. The prudence, however, displayed by the count satisfied the states; for he retired upon finding that his presence had given offence, and assured the states, that his intention was only to animate and rouse the drooping spirit of the people, terrified at the thoughts of an invasion.

c THESE tumults had one very unexpected consequence. It inspired the magistrates of Haerlem with the resolution of electing a stadtholder. They accordingly instructed their pensionary to lay before the states their determination, to desire their concurrence, and to assure them it would not be long possible to withstand the eagerness of the people in favour of the house of Orange. The states were surprised at seeing a pensionary imprisoned by the late prince of Orange, charged with instructions which they believed inconsistent with his principles, and demanding the re-establishment of a stadtholder. But his conduct soon effaced their suspicions. He communicated his instructions to M. de Wit before he laid them before the states, and was convinced by the arguments of that able statesman, that he changed his sentiments, and prevailed on the magistrates of Haerlem to drop their intention.

d THE Zealanders were more firm and resolute in their proceedings. The preceding year they had demanded a stadtholder, persuading themselves they would be supported by the states of Friseland and Groningen. They even doubted not but these provinces would thank them for so reasonable a proposition. The dispute was carried on with greater violence than the preceding year; but the address of de Wit, and the firm opposition of the states of Holland frustrated all the endeavours of the Zealanders. But to enter justly into the politics of Holland, it will be necessary to take a short view of the state of England, and the intrigues of Cromwell. The old parliament was now dissolved, and the legislative power in the hands of Cromwell, and the council of state. Beverning, and the other Dutch deputies, had made him frequent overtures of peace; but his behaviour was always supercilious, and his answers equivocal. Notwithstanding this, no sooner were the deputies gone from his presence, than Cromwell's agents insinuated, that the Dutch were not to judge of his sentiments from his exterior appearance, which he adapted to circumstances. Ignorant of the true meaning of this duplicity, the deputies were, above measure, confounded to find, after a tedious negotiation, that all their pacific conditions were rejected, and they were told that no peace was to be expected, until the Hollanders consented to unite both states so closely, as that they might become one people, and form one united commonwealth. This proposition appeared equally absurd and insolent. One of the deputies, Nieuport, observed, that it seemed to be exactly copied from the parliament's instructions to their commissioners in Scotland; concluding that Cromwell proposed treating the republic as the parliament had done the Scottish nation. It was Cromwell's design to prevent the election of a stadtholder, and to procure the dismissal of Van Tromp, whom he knew to be a strenuous partizan of the house of Orange. He therefore intimated, that an accommodation might be effected on these conditions. He hinted, that if the Dutch consented to the union proposed, an immediate cessation of hostilities would ensue, a free trade be restored, and the privileges of fishing adjusted to the entire satisfaction of the United Provinces. Some writers pretend to treat this whole negotiation as ideal; but what proves its reality, is the advice sent to the states by the commissioners, of all the proceedings with Cromwell's agent, and the consequences of that notion, which had almost defeated the whole design. The correspondence was discovered by the Orange faction; and Cromwell concluding it could not be long kept secret in England, where it might ruin him with his party, assumed a more severe brow, and next time he met the commissioners, declared, that such was the situation of affairs in Holland, that England could have no security in treating with the republic. Nor was it long before the commissioners received from the council of state an explicit explanation of the former demands, in the following terms: That the two republics should coalesce, the whole united dominions be subject to one government, composed of the natives of both countries, in such a manner as should be to their mutual advantage; and that each should, without any distinction, enjoy the same privileges and immunities with the natives and inhabitants of the respective countries, as to houses, lands, possessions, commerce, fishing, and every other particular. Such was the scheme of this political age, mad with projects, and inventive in plans of republican government, which, if possible, they would have established over the face of the whole earth<sup>a</sup>. It is sufficient for our purpose, that the proposal was highly resented by the deputies, who regarded it as throwing ridicule on their character, or the scheme of an enthusiast. Without, however, giving Cromwell a definitive answer, they acquainted the states of Holland with the offered conditions of peace, and patiently waited for further instructions.

It was during this suspense that the famous battle was fought, which brought the war to a speedy issue. After the last action de Wit and the Dutch government made surprising efforts to recover the severe blow then received, and put the fleet in a more respectable footing than before. Several large ships were added, and all more completely manned and provided; every pretext for quitting the service was taken from Van Tromp and the other admirals, who now took the command of a fleet of one hundred sail of fine vessels, all fit for action. No motives either of hope or fear were wanting to the sailors, their pay was doubled, the ships were crowded with volunteers of the first fashion, and nothing less was expected than that the enemy would be obliged to screen themselves in their harbours. Young Van Tromp, who had destroyed an English man of war in the Streights, and distinguished his intrepidity and valour, was ordered home with his squadron, and every measure pushed to the utmost, to oblige the haughty usurper to hasten to reasonable proposals. The enemy still blocked up the Texel, the coasts of Holland were besieged, and the harbours so narrowly watched, that all the merchantmen fell into the hands of the English. It was of the utmost consequence to oblige them to retire, as they equally distressed trade and the government, by exciting clamours among the people, who exclaimed, that they were sacrificed to the treachery of the states, and cowardice of the naval officers; a reflection that was pointed at the heads of those captains who had been accused of negligence in the last engagement. The Dutch armament was now in two divisions, under Van Tromp and de Wit, in different harbours; and the great difficulty was how to effect a junction, without being separately attacked by the enemy. Before they set sail great debates arose in the states concerning the instructions to be given their admirals: some opposed venturing another engagement, and urged it would be sufficient to convoy the homeward-bound trade, and particularly the rich fleet from India, which would enable the republic to equip such a navy as the enemy could not presume to face: others pressed hard for an engagement, affirming that the public murmurs were only to be silenced by the din of war, and the roaring of cannon: a victory, they said, would infallibly restore peace and tranquillity. The latter opinion prevailed, and Van Tromp had orders to fight the first opportunity. With eighty-five sail this admiral steered along the coast of Zealand, and on the thirty-first of July discovered the English fleet, consisting of ninety-four fine ships, under the conduct of Monk, Lawson, and Penn, at the distance of five miles a-head. By the shifting of the wind the enemy gained the weather gage, which determined Van Tromp to avoid an engagement, make all possible sail for the Texel, and there join the division commanded by de Wit and Ruyter: happily for him a storm arose, which prevented the English from forcing him to an engagement; and he embraced the opportunity to effect the intended junction. His fleet was now augmented to one hundred and twenty sail, with which he proceeded in quest of the English, descried them on the sixth of August between Scheveling and the Meuse, and immediately gave the signal for battle. Tromp took his station on the right, Ruyter led the left, Evertzen was in the center, and the command of the rear was assigned to de Wit. At seven in the morning the two fleets engaged, with equal ardor, within sight of the shore, which was crowded with inhabitants, eager to be spectators of an action, which should determine the fate of the republic. Both behaved with wonderful address, and fought with such prudent and subdued courage as never before appeared in any sea-fight. The cannon of above two hundred men of war fired incessantly; the sea was covered with blood, and wrecks of ships, either burnt or shattered to pieces. Tromp, agreeable to custom, pierced the enemy's line, and put it in confusion; but, on his return, encountered admiral Goodson: here he was surrounded by the enemy's ships, and deserted by his own; but he fought with such desperate fury as would have extricated him from this difficulty, had he not been unfortunately shot dead with a musket-ball, as he was gallantly giving his orders on the quarter-deck<sup>b</sup>. His last words were, Take courage, my boys, I have run my course with glory. Bredrode took the

- a command, concealed the admiral's death from the rest of the fleet, and behaved in a manner worthy of the successor of the brave Van Tromp. The Dutch fire-ships made great havoc among the enemy, and a terrible conflict happened between the divisions commanded by Lawson and Ruyter. At last the Dutch admiral's ship was shattered to pieces, she was towed out of the line, and Ruyter, shifting his flag to a frigate, returned to the battle: but all his efforts could not restore the spirits of the seamen. It was now known that Tromp was dead, and an universal despondency succeeded, as if victory depended wholly upon his arm; several ships fell back from the line; the whole was in confusion, a rout ensued, and terrible slaughter of men, and destruction of ships. Agreeable to the best Dutch attested accounts the Dutch lost twenty-six men of war, four thousand men were killed, seated.
- b and two thousand taken prisoners, half of whom the humanity of the conquerors saved from being swallowed up by the ocean. In a word, the victory was complete, but purchased at a high price. Most of the English ships were disabled, some were entirely destroyed: they had six hundred men killed, and near a thousand wounded, many of whom never recovered, and the whole fleet was in so wretched plight as to be unable to pursue the blow, and destroy the broken remains of the enemy in their flight. The Dutch indeed assert, that the losses were nearly equal; but the consequence demonstrated that they were defeated. The United Provinces were overwhelmed with grief and consternation, while every town in England blazed with bonfires, and rung with rejoicings. The loss of Tromp was alone sufficient cause of mourning; but as that hero had many enemies, the
- c universality of the despondency evinced, that it flowed from more general misfortunes than the death of a private man, as much feared and detested by one party, as he was adored by another (A).

- THE republic had paid dear for the freedom of trade and navigation of the Texel; but they resolved to profit by it. The English fleet withdrew from the coasts of Holland, in consequence of the late battle; and Ruyter was now ordered to convoy a vast fleet of merchantmen out of the Channel. This prospect of reviving commerce fortified the Dutch against every misfortune, and the flattering promises of cardinal Mazarin inspired them with courage, under the pressure of a signal defeat, to dispute the terms prescribed by England before the last battle. Yet Cromwell was apprised how impossible it was for
- d the Dutch government to continue the war, while the republic was divided by faction, and the people clamorous for a stadtholder. All their preparations gave no disturbance to the penetrating usurper. He beheld with unconcern their efforts to repair the fleet, the promotions among general officers, the rewards given to merit, the generous flame that seemed to warm every breast, and the appointment of the celebrated Opdam, to the command of lieutenant-admiral, in the room of the deceased Tromp. If he regained the advantages which Mazarin had lately acquired over the balance of Europe, he was sensible that all his other wishes would follow. The states perceived his design; they knew his ability, perseverance, and courage. They saw his great preparations, and resolved to anticipate consequences. Accordingly two deputies were dispatched to London, with orders,
- e however, positively to reject the scheme of union proposed by Cromwell. When Nieuport, Beverning, and Jonquestal, had laid their instructions before the council of state, they were agreeably surprised to find Cromwell relax considerably with respect to the coalition of the two nations, and in some other severe demands; particularly as to the right of fishing upon the British coasts: but two very disagreeable articles were now added; viz. that the states should engage to exclude the prince of Orange from all the employments held by his ancestors, especially those of stadtholder and captain-general; and that they would limit the navy of the republic to a certain number of ships, not to be exceeded without leave from England. These points were disputed by the commissioners, with all the arguments in their power; but finding the protector inflexible with respect to the article regarding the prince of Orange, they desired leave to lay the state of the negotiation before their constituents; for which purpose Beverning returned to Holland.

PEACE with England was the wish of every dispassionate lover of his country, and the chief object of the attention of the states general. The Zealanders, however, still insisted on the re-establishment of a stadtholder, and a close union with France, by which they imagined the war might be conducted to advantage, and the haughty enemy reduced in a short time to the necessity of relaxing in the rigid conditions prescribed; but Holland constantly opposed this measure, as dangerous to liberty, and unprofitable to the republic.

(A) No sooner did the fleet arrive in port, than the states ordered Ruyter and Evertzen to attend, in order to be minutely informed of the circumstances of the engagement, and the state of the losses. From the examination which passed on this occasion, it was obvious, that the Dutch believed all their officers had not performed their duty, though the public thanks of the assembly were returned to Ruyter, Evertzen, and other admirals, for their gallant behaviour; and they were exhorted to continue their services, with the same zeal, intrepidity, and fidelity, they had hitherto displayed.

The states general perceived the difficulty of equipping an armament, able to cope with the English. They were aware of the inconveniences under which a republican government laboured in all disputes with a despotic enemy. Cromwell, though his situation in the supreme power was unsteady and irksome, yet managed with such address, as to acquire an absolute authority. The legislative and executive power being vested in the same person, action was as quick as thought, and the measure no sooner dictated, than it was executed with the promptness peculiar to monarchy; for in this light England was now to be regarded. Besides the inability of bringing the war to a happy issue, they were sensible of the inconveniences of the attempt, which would be violently opposed by a strong party, unless their favourite views of restoring the stadtholdership were indulged. In a word, they had a moral certainty, that the prosecution of the war could only terminate in the ruin of the finances; in the destruction of commerce, and the harmony of the people, without a single counterpoising advantage. It was upon this account, the return of Beverning, with proposals of peace, gave great satisfaction; and the exclusive article respecting the house of Orange, was kept a profound secret. The mysterious behaviour attending this article, gave rise to an opinion that it was supported, if not originally proposed by the pensioner de Wit; but when the affair came to be publicly known, he cleared himself of this accusation, and proved that peace was to be purchased on no other condition.

WHEN the commissioners arrived at the Hague, they found the states disposed to accept peace, even with this limitation, provided Cromwell would relax in the article which restricted the number of shipping which the republic was allowed to maintain; however, the consent of the other provinces was absolutely necessary, though the negotiation had been set on foot without their knowledge. As the ceremony of assembling all the provincial states would be tedious, the states of Holland sent Beverning back in the same frigate which had brought him from England, that the ardor of Cromwell for peace might not cool, or any obstruction be thrown in the way of the negotiation. This measure gave offence to the other provinces, who thought themselves entitled to an equal share in the conduct of this important affair. They accused the states of Holland of an infraction of the treaty of Utrecht, by separating themselves from the other provinces in the close, as they had done in the commencement of the negotiation; and Beverning was regarded in England, not as the ambassador of the republic, but of one province only. Though he had been only a few days absent, the court of Cromwell put on a new appearance, and the general voice of the nation seemed to declare for the prosecution of the war. Thurloe complained, that the Dutchman was in no character, had no instructions, credentials, retinue, or compliment, in the name of the republic, to the protector on his elevation; and Beverning desired that this might be imputed to the earnest desire of the states, to lose no opportunity of promoting peace, and stopping the effusion of blood, and destruction of the human species.

It was, perhaps, a lucky circumstance for the Hollanders, that Don Alonzo de Cardenas, the Spanish ambassador, endeavoured by all possible intrigues to thwart the negotiation. Cromwell, who had his designs upon Spain, proposed no advantage to that court, from the ruin of the trade and navigation of the United Provinces. The Spaniard offered large subsidies to the protector, and gave him hopes that Dunkirk would be put into his hands, if he continued the war. He doubted not but such propositions would prove flattering to Cromwell's pride; but he was mistaken. The protector amused with Spain, only to procure the better terms from Holland, and demonstrate to the republic, that he could balance the alliance of France, by opposing to that nation the whole power of the Spanish monarchy.

WHILE matters were in this train, commissioners were appointed in Holland, to examine the propositions brought by Beverning; but after they had reduced them to tolerable order, and made them consistent with the articles drawn up at the Hague, St. John and Strickland, the English envoys, raised up fresh difficulties. New instructions were sent to Beverning, and he had orders to solicit the ratification settled at the Hague, and have it inserted in the treaty; and at length, the provinces finding that Spain had made overtures to Cromwell, determined to vest Nieuport, Beverning, and Jongstal, with the character of ambassadors and plenipotentiaries, in order to flatter the pride of the new protector. The chief remaining difficulty, was the exclusion of the prince of Orange, without which Cromwell declared he could think no engagements with the states secure. The ambition of that house, and their connections with the Stuarts, would always give disturbance to the republic and England, unless the prince was effectually cut off from all expectations of ever filling the offices held by his ancestors. So little hope was there, that the provinces in general would ever be brought to consent to this article, that it was religiously concealed from Jongstal, who was a Frislander, and transacted between Cromwell and Beverning, <sup>a</sup> ing, the latter promising in the name of the states of Holland, that they would never consent to the elevation of the prince to the stadtholdership. Cromwel thought himself secure of the republic, once he obtained the promise of Holland, the most wealthy and powerful of all the provinces; it was, however, certain, that Holland alone could not resist the other provinces, without a direct breach of the union; and exposing the republic to the most dreadful calamities of a civil war: if they strenuously persevered in having a stadtholder, Holland must yield, or the republic must fall; and possibly it formed a part of the protector's policy, to light the sparks of civil division, by which he might be able to extend his own influence over the whole <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> At length, after tedious conferences, the following articles were signed by the Dutch ambassadors; that the republic should in no shape assist, aid, or abet, the house of Stuart, or the adherents of that unfortunate family; that her ships should pay the required compliment to the British flag; that due punishment should be inflicted on the cruel perpetrators of the horrid massacre at Amboyna*; that eighty-five thousand pounds should be paid to the English, as an indemnification of their losses; that the island of Polirôn should be restored to the East India company; and that commissioners should be sent to London, to adjust farther particulars, relative to the tragical affair in the East Indies, for which reasonable satisfaction had never yet been made to England. The ratification immediately succeeded the signing the treaty; but now the mystery between Cromwel and the provinces of Holland was to appear, with respect to the exclusion of the prince of Orange. Some writers assert, <sup>c</sup> that the secret lay between Cromwel, de Wit, and Beverning, having never been communicated to the deputies of the cities, who expressed the utmost astonishment when it was mentioned by the pensioner, for their approbation. The peremptory tone of Cromwel vindicated the conduct of the pensioner. His envoys told the states, that as they accepted or rejected this condition, they chose peace or war; either was in their option: such was the protector's categorical answer. De Wit enlarged upon the subject, with all the arguments of reason and rhetoric, he shewed the necessity of peace, and the impossibility of obtaining any mitigation in this article. At length he carried his point by a majority, and a solemn act was passed, whereby the prince of Orange was excluded the stadtholdership, and the other high offices, held with so much dignity by his ancestors. This act of exclusion <sup>d</sup> was sent to England; but de Wit, foreseeing it would one day involve his country in civil dissension, charged the ambassadors to make one last effort to satisfy Cromwel, by a general treaty, without particularizing the exclusion of the prince of Orange; but all remonstrances on this head proved fruitless. The act was no less necessary to the politicks of Oliver, with respect to the Stuart family, than to the completion of his triumph over the house of Orange, and the republic of the United Provinces. In this manner was peace concluded, signed, and ratified, little to the honour or advantage of the republic, as it laid the foundation of those unhappy divisions, which had almost involved the provinces in ruin.

<sup>e</sup> THOUGH the exclusion-act was kept as profound as could possibly be expected, where the affair was entrusted to the discretion of near one hundred different persons, yet it could not be long concealed from the Princess Governante of Orange, who was so deeply interested. It even took air in the cities, and occasioned some popular commotions at the Hague. No sooner was the princess acquainted with this article of the treaty, than she presented a strong remonstrance to the states general, signed by herself, the grandmother, and all the guardians of the young prince. There they expressed their astonishment at the unprecedented, unprovoked injury done to the prince, in excluding him from an authority possessed with so much glory and advantage to the republic, by his ancestors. They represented in the strongest terms, the violence offered to the treaty of Utrecht, the privileges of the other six provinces, and particularly the insult offered to the tender age of the prince, and to the sex of his female guardians. They exhorted their high mightinesses to interpose in behalf of the infant, and prevent so gross an affront to a child of his birth, expectations, and promising qualities, the representative of those heroes who had spilt their blood in the glorious cause of liberty, and defence of the freedom and religion of the provinces. They concluded with observing the applauses which such an act of justice would meet with from the world and their own consciences, the unhappy consequences which it might obviate, and the retribution they might expect as soon as the prince was of sufficient age to thank his protectors. To the same purpose was a letter sent to the states by his electoral highness of Brandenburgh, but neither produced any effect. The resolution was taken; it was powerfully supported, and was now irrevocable, unless they run the hazard of incurring the resentment of Cromwel, and of being taxed with levity and want of firmness and constancy. <sup>f</sup> contented.

BUT the remonstrances of the princesses, though not to be disregarded, were of less importance than the discontent of the people, and the violent opposition of the provinces. All protested with one voice against the act of exclusion. The deputy from Friseland entered a protest, with the secretary to the states general, against the secret negotiation with Oliver, and the iniquitous exclusion of the prince of Orange, by which Holland had given a violent stroke to the liberties of the republic, the articles of the union, and had shewn herself equally unjust and ungrateful to the house of Orange. This protest was, however, condemned by the states of the province, though they were prevailed on soon after, by the influence of the count de Nassau, to enter another more bitter and severe, in which they complained of M. de Wit personally, as the first author and projector of this iniquitous act, as they were pleased to term it. Zealand shewed no less vivacity and attachment to the house of Orange; Guelderland was more moderate, but in the same interest; Overysel, though torn by domestic broils, entered into the sentiments of the other provinces, and Utrecht embraced the same cause, though with less warmth, and with more caution and reserve. As to Groningen, we are not told what part this province took in the dispute <sup>1</sup>.

Negotiations
with Crom-
wel.

HOLLAND opposed itself vigorously to this combination, which threatened the dissolution of the union, the being of the republic, by exciting a general ferment in the minds of the people, and commotions which it would be difficult to appease. Before the states entered upon any opposition, they sent instructions to the ambassadors in London, once more to try their influence with Cromwel, to procure some mitigation in the act of exclusion, thereby to restore tranquillity to the provinces; but the protector was so incensed at further applications, and what he regarded as an equivocation of the treaty, that he threatened to renew the war unless the act was immediately put into his hands, which was accordingly done to prevent worse consequences. The next step was to procure a letter from Cromwel to the states of Zealand and the other provinces, demonstrating the necessity as well as the utility of the peace; but this epistle produced no effect, and it was fully answered by the Zealanders, and afterwards sent for the perusal of the states general. Holland objected to this unheard-of proceeding, affirming, that the protector's letter ought to have been communicated to the states before an answer was returned; presuming it now could answer no purpose, except that of blowing up the sparks of discord.

In order to regain some degree of popularity, the states of Holland went to make an apology to the princess of Orange, assuring her highness that no disrespect to the family, but the urgent necessity of the state, had forced them into such a measure, equally disagreeable to them as to the warmest friends of the house of Orange. She received the apology in the most gracious manner, and returned such an answer as gave the states the highest opinion of her moderation, prudence, and sweetness of disposition. Far from reproaching them with what was now irrevocable, she only lamented the unhappy circumstances that rendered such a measure necessary, and exhorted the deputies to apply their utmost endeavours to restore the public peace and tranquillity. Not satisfied with this, the states appointed commissioners more accurately to examine this affair; and, soon after, their apology was published, by the name of Deductions, or Inferences from the state of affairs. In this piece was examined, whether Holland had a power of entering upon a separate negotiation with Cromwel, and how far this province had the right of sovereignty, independent of the other provinces included in the union? The whole design was to prove the affirmative from positive facts, and the particular declaration of the king of Spain relative to this province. Though the discourse was laboured, and the arguments specious, the wrong principle upon which those opinions was founded, was obvious to every attentive reader. By acknowledging that the abdication of the Catholic king vested this province with sovereignty, they acknowledged the hereditary right of the kings of Spain, and which could not be destroyed by any act of a particular prince, who had no power to give away the right of his successors. Besides, what had this abdication to do with the article of the union of Utrecht, whereby all the provinces were bound not to enter upon any separate war or peace, treaty or alliance, negotiation, alienation, &c. without the joint consent of the other provinces. Such were the objections to these deductions, as they were called, though they at that time escaped observation. It is true, this writing was severely censured, and several bitter criticisms upon it were published; but no one thought of attacking the foundation and demonstrating the fallacy of the principles, Guelderland, Friseland, and Zealand, taxed the states of Holland with ingratitude and arbitrary proceedings; they retorted the charge; the provinces were filled with factions; the republic on the brink of dissolution; and the ambassadors, who had carried on the negotiation, and signed the treaty, in the most mortifying disgrace <sup>m</sup>.

- a In this situation of affairs, happily for the provinces, the conduct of the king of Denmark engaged a part of the public attention; and diverted it from a dispute, which, from its warmth and acrimony, threatened danger to the state, and particularly to de Wit, the ambassadors, and the projectors and agents in this new treaty. It was before observed, that king Frederick had not complied with a single article of the treaty of alliance formed with the republic, notwithstanding he received punctual payments of a large subsidy. He now added ingratitude to treachery. To extricate the king from the difficulties in which he was engaged with the parliament of England, by the seizure of a fleet of merchantmen belonging to that nation, the states general indemnified the English merchants, in hopes thereby of more easily attaching that monarch to their interest, and enabling him to execute the treaty with the republic. Frederick, however, not only evaded the treaty, but the payment of the money advanced for his use and conveniency; after which he entered into a close alliance with Cromwel, leaving the states general to exclaim against his injustice and perfidy. In a word, this double dealing of the king of Denmark proved of the greatest advantage to the United Provinces; it silenced their private animosities for a time, though it by no means removed the cause; or extinguished those sparks of discord, which flamed out with redoubled vigour after the prince of Orange came of age, and Lewis XIV. had invaded the Netherlands.

S E C T. XI.

The history of the United Provinces continued; the particulars of the second war with England, and other transactions, to the invasion of the Netherlands by Lewis XIV.

- c NOTHING occurred to disturb the tranquillity of the United Provinces until the year 1657, when a violent war was kindled in the north, and pursued with such inveterate animosity between the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, as foreboded the destruction of one of the parties, and proved highly prejudicial to the commercial interest of the republic. Charles Gustavus had scarce ascended the throne of Sweden, when his politics gave great uneasiness to the states general, at that time incumbered by a war with England, and a fruitless but close alliance with Denmark. Though the exclusion of the prince of Orange, and the little regard paid to the remonstrances made by the electress of Brandenburgh in behalf of the young prince, had produced a coldness between the electoral court and the republic; yet that wise prince was sensible he could not more effectually fortify himself against the grasping views of the Swedish monarch, than by entering into an alliance with the United Provinces. The states general had one reason for embracing the overtures made by the elector. It was their interest with respect to the public trade, to provide that the Swedes did not gain possession of the ports of Prussia; and though the duke of Newburgh, and the emperor, advertised them that such an alliance would give umbrage to all the claimants to the duchy of Cleves; yet their regard to trade prevailed over every other consideration. In effect, an offensive alliance was concluded, whereby the states undertook to protect the elector's dominions, including his coasts, and the duchy of Cleves, against all enemies whatsoever; while the elector engaged, in return, to defend the republic and her commerce in the Baltic against all attacks, and to give the shipping of the republic free entrance into all his ports in Prussia and Pomerania. This treaty gave offence to the elector of Saxony, to whom the Swedish ambassador insinuated, that it tended to cut off his pretensions to the duchy of Juliers.

respect to Sweden, Brandenburgh, &c.

- d DURING these intrigues count Koningsmarck had great success in levying troops in the duchy of Bremen, which gave the alarm to the states general. To obviate danger, they formed a body of horse and foot, which they cantoned on the borders of the Yssel, under Brederode. Another corps, led by the count de Nassau, was posted in such a manner as to cover Emden, Coeverden, and other towns of West Friseland; but on Koningsmarck's passing the Elbe, and joining the Swedes, these troops had order to return to winter-quarters. Thus the Dutch were eased from the apprehension of an immediate attack. After the Swedes had taken the capital of Poland, and forced king Casimir out of his dominions, the conquerors were penetrating to the provinces of the elector of Brandenburgh, which obliged him to enter into negotiations with the Swedish monarch. He offered to join his forces to the Swedes, provided the king would abolish the homage for Ducal Prussia required by the Poles; but the treaty with Holland proved a great obstruction to his designs. At length a treaty was concluded, whereby the elector acknowledged himself a vassal of the crown of Sweden, for Ducal Prussia, and the ports of that kingdom and of Pomerania were opened to the Swedish shipping. Thus the treaty between Holland and Brandenburgh was rendered rendered useless, and the republic was exposed to all the vengeance of Charles Gustavus, irritated at her engagements with Denmark, and the late treaty with the court of Berlin, formed evidently against the crown of Sweden. To prepare against accidents, oblige the Swedes to return to their own ports, and secure the navigation of the republic, the states general resolved to equip against the spring a squadron of fifty ships of war. The Dutch commerce in the north was interrupted by a Swedish fleet which blocked up Dantzick, where no vessels were suffered to enter, except upon certain conditions; and Gustavus had imposed a duty on all merchandise sent to Pillau and other sea-ports of Prussia. This conduct he justified by the example of the Hollanders, who had prohibited the Swedish ships from entering the ports of Flanders during the war with Spain, although they themselves were furnishing the enemy with ammunition and provision; and likewise by their conduct in the late war with England<sup>a</sup>.

An embassy to Sweden and Denmark.

THIS last transaction it was that determined the states general to dispatch M. Van Buringen to Copenhagen, to engage his Danish majesty to declare openly against Sweden; but that prince dreaded the victorious arms of Gustavus. They likewise made some overtures to Cromwel with respect to the situation of affairs in the north; but Charles Gustavus had anticipated them in their designs on the electorate. He had sent an ambassador to England to explain his reasons for declaring war against Poland, to propose means for preventing the Dutch from trading to the Baltic, under pretence that it was injurious to the English commerce, and to settle a treaty of commerce with respect to the imports and exports of the two kingdoms in their mutual trade.

ALL this time, M. Nieuport continued in London, in quality of envoy from the states, to regulate the affairs of the Indian trade, the disputes relative to Amboyna, and to study the protector's disposition towards Sweden. Commissioners were appointed by the two East India companies for adjusting their disputes; but the limited time elapsed without their coming to any agreement: upon which the Protestant cantons of Switzerland were chosen arbitrators; the worst they could possibly have thought of in commercial affairs. The Swiss no sooner opened their mouths as umpires, than they betrayed their profound ignorance of trade and navigation; upon which the contending parties perceiving their error, prolonged the space allowed for the negotiation. It was not the desire of giving satisfaction to England, but of obtaining redress, that made the Hollanders solicitous about this negotiation. The English East India company accused the Dutch commissioners of shuffling and duplicity in the restitution of Polexon, and indemnification of the losses sustained by the company in India; and the commissioners wanted to balance this against the losses of the republic, in consequence of the seizure of their ships by English privateers before and since the war. They plied Cromwel with remonstrances upon this head; for still the grievance was sorely felt, and their merchants daily plundered in the high seas by swarms of privateers fitted out against the Spaniards, with whom Cromwel was now at war. In the end, these altercations subsided in a treaty between France and England, in which the republic was included, after which, both nations sent fleets to the Mediterranean, to suppress the Algerine corsairs, who had given abundance of disturbance to their commerce<sup>b</sup>.

Dissensions among the provinces.

WHILE the republic was fortifying itself against the designs of Sweden on the one hand, and of England on the other, a variety of circumstances contributed to disturb the internal tranquillity of the provinces. One of the chief was the project concerted by M. de Wit, for bringing the revenue into proper order, by the reduction of interest paid by the government; but the great address of that statesman surmounted all difficulties in this affair, in a manner altogether unexpected, and convinced the creditors, that it was more to their advantage to receive four per cent. than to withdraw their money; because by this means the foreign debts might be paid off, and the interest of their own loans increased as the capital debt diminished. This was de Wit's project, and not what we are told by some English writers, of equal assessments on all the provinces, which would have proved the severest oppression, considering their inequality in point of wealth and ability. To this was added another subject of debate. The death of Brederode, marechal-general of the camp, raised up a variety of candidates for that employment. Those of most consideration were both of the house of Orange. Maurice claimed it as the right of seniority and long services; and William, governor of Friseland, founded his expectations on his own influence and avaricious connections. All the partizans of the Orange family sided with the other; but the province of Holland patronized the former, out of personal pique to prince William. The states of Holland had not forgot the attempt upon Amsterdam, nor the violence with which William had opposed the exclusion-act. The count would have carried his point in the assembly of the states general, were it to be decided by a majority of voices; but here unanimity was necessary, and Holland affirmed, that the office was

- a dangerous in time of peace, as it constantly gave the command of the army to the same person, who might thereby acquire an undue influence. M. de Wit presented a memorial, which he hoped would reconcile all differences, but it rather served to quiet for a time, than remove the dissensions; for the office in dispute remained vacant, and the candidates soon after resumed their pretensions. Next followed some altercation about the manner of educating the young prince of Orange. Some were for appointing a minister of the gospel for his preceptor, that he might be early instructed in the principles of the reformed religion. This opinion was supported by Zealand; but the states of Holland opposed it, from an apprehension that the clergy would blend politics with religion. The princess governante requested that the prince might be put under the tuition of certain members of the states general, and the courts of justice, that his tender mind might receive deep impressions of the constitution and form of government; but the states general fearing that she intended by this compliment to gain an influence over the most considerable members of their body, declined the honour, under pretence that they could not decently interfere with the proper business of the prince's guardians. This debate renewed in some provinces the old affair of the stadtholdership; particularly in Overyssel, where the towns and villages were filled with riot and confusion. As usual, a thousand other points of altercation arose from this single question; and the point now was not, whether there should be a stadtholder, but whether certain cities enjoyed certain privileges? It was a dispute between one city and another, about points which had no relation to the general plan of government, and therefore scarce worthy of notice in a general history.

We shall conclude the year, with observing that a violent plague appeared in Leyden, which swept off near four thousand of the inhabitants; but was happily prevented by the diligence of the magistrates from spreading itself further into the provinces; and next, the magistrates of Amsterdam laid the foundation of that immense pile of building, since universally known by the name of Stadhuse. A plague at Leyden.

- THE new year produced fresh causes of apprehension, that the Dutch commerce might suffer from the rapid conquests of the Swedes, as the states were upon very indifferent terms with that crown. They had fitted out a large squadron for the protection of the Baltic trade; but the assurances given by the Swedish ambassador lulled the states into security, and prevented the sailing of that powerful armament. Now the duties laid by the king on all Dutch traders to Riga, again roused the republic, and determined her to act vigorously. With this view, she sent ambassadors to Copenhagen and Stockholm; to the former, with intention to excite his Danish majesty against the Swedes; and to the latter, to remonstrate on the injury done to their commerce by the late unwarrantable and arbitrary impositions. The envoys were arrested at Lauwenburgh, through which they proposed passing in their way to Dantzick, but afterwards released, and apologies made to the states general: however, this conduct served only to inflame their animosity. In consequence, admiral Opdam received orders to sail directly for the Baltic, to protect all the Dutch shipping, and lay every possible obstruction in the way of his Swedish majesty, if he resolved upon the siege of Dantzick. Oliver Cromwell interposed, exhorted the states not to break with Gustavus, and offered his mediation to reconcile their differences, under pretence of a zealous regard for the Protestant religion; but his intentions were suspected. Cromwell was well known to have used religion as a mask, to conceal the most daring and villainous designs; the states persuaded themselves, for this reason, that he must have some other object in view, than the good of the church. In their answer, therefore, to the protector's letter, they warmly applauded his piety; but in such a manner that Cromwell should perceive they were not blinded by his affected concern for religion; adding, that, far from having any intention of coming to a rupture with Gustavus, they had sent ambassadors to renew the antient alliance between the crown of Sweden and the republic. A. D. 1656.

- ABOUT this time Gustavus turned his thoughts towards Denmark. He sent M. Durell to the court of Copenhagen, in hopes of persuading the king to join with him in opposing the entrance of admiral Opdam into the Baltic. Previous to this, the senate of Denmark had remonstrated to the court of Sweden on the consequences of the war with Poland; but their letter produced no effect, as the king was then absent. This affair M. Durell had instructions to take into consideration; but the king of Denmark declared, that he could not treat with Sweden without the consent of the Dutch ambassador M. Van Buiningen. Durell insisted that no strangers should be admitted to the conferences; the Danes took the part of Buiningen, and the dispute rose high, about the time that Opdam arrived at Dantzick, where he was received as the saviour of the city. Sweden insisted that the republic could lend no assistance to the magistrates of Dantzick, without violating the treaty of 1640, and Opdam pleaded his instructions. At last, conferences were appointed at Elbing, where The Swedes arrest the Dutch envoy.

this affair was to be maturely discussed. In consequence, a treaty took place; the treaty a of 1645 was renewed; the commerce of neither party was to be disturbed in the Baltic by the war between Sweden and Poland; a tariff was established, and the duties on trade regulated upon the former footing. The kings of France and Denmark, the protector of England, and the elector of Brandenburgh, were likewise included in this treaty. The city of Dantzick also had permission to continue subject to the king of Poland, provided the magistrates afforded no assistance against Sweden <sup>d</sup>.

THE treaty of Elbing gave satisfaction only to the parties immediately concerned. The king of Denmark could not persuade himself that the Dutch, after the expence of equipping so considerable an armament, would return to their ports, upon no other security than general promises set down on paper. M. Buiningen took fire at Dantzick's being deserted, b and wrote in the most pressing manner to the pensionary de Wit, to procure an order from the states general for admiral Opdam to seize upon some of the islands of the Baltic, where the fleet might winter, under the direction of the king of Denmark, who had it in his power to serve the republic effectually. Notwithstanding this application the fleet returned, the public exclaimed against the unnecessary expence of the armament, and the states vindicated it, by demonstrating, that to it was owing the treaty of Elbing, which they affirmed was equally advantageous and necessary to the republic.

WHILE the states were endeavouring to vindicate the measures they had taken for securing the trade of the Baltic, the loudest complaints were made to the several colleges of the admiralty, against the depredations committed by the English privateers. De Ruyter c was ordered to put to sea with a respectable squadron, for the protection of the Dutch commerce; but he soon found the office extremely disagreeable, and remonstrated to the states upon the liberty assumed by the smallest English frigate of searching the men of war of the republic. Alarmed at this report, Ruyter had orders to restrain the English from committing violence, or any way injuring the subjects of the states; but he was likewise cautioned to avoid, at all events, the necessity of coming to a rupture with Cromwell, by shewing the English the clearest proofs in his power, that none of his ships under his convoy were engaged in an illicit traffic. They likewise remonstrated to the protector; but Cromwell knew his own superiority, and gave no ear to their complaints. He was now deeply engaged in the means of gaining possession of Dunkirk, the price of the assistance d given to the French against the Spaniards, and consequently not at leisure to examine trifling matters, regarding Dutch traders. As the states knew their inability to redress themselves, they were forced to support with patience insults which they could not repel.

A. D. 1657.
The states refuse to ratify the treaty of Elbing.

NEXT year produced some new difficulties with respect to the affairs of the North, and the treaty of Elbing, which the states general, after long delays, refused at last to ratify. The king of Denmark exerted his utmost influence to prevail on the Dutch not to consent to a treaty so inconsistent with their engagements to him; and the maritime provinces likewise exclaimed against it, as it disappointed their mighty expectations from Opdam's expedition. Neither were the Dantzickers at all pleased with a measure, which tied them down to the necessity of giving no opposition to the ambitious views of Gustavus, although they e had no other security than a general promise for his not attacking their city. As to the king of Denmark, he resolved to profit by the present situation of Sweden, involved in a war with all her powerful neighbours, for executing certain designs he had formed on Schonen, Norway, and Germany. It was of the utmost consequence to engage the republic in his interest, and this he laboured by his ambassador at the Hague; but found the states little disposed to accept the proposed defensive alliance. However, the negotiations upon this subject retarded the ratification of the treaty of Elbing, and gave the Danish monarch hopes, that he might at length be able to succeed. There was, besides, another objection to the treaty. It was, that some of the articles were by no means clearly expressed, particularly those relative to the duty on merchandize. The king of Sweden insisted on the f execution of the tariff, and the regulations made in 1640. To this the Dutch answered, that all the subjects of the United Provinces, who built ships in Sweden at their own expence, were intitled to all the privileges of natives of that kingdom. This the king denied, unless they fixed their residence in Sweden, and became subjects of that crown. It would, he affirmed, be attended with the worst consequences to his people, to suffer strangers to cut down the finest forests to build ships, perhaps to fight against their own king and country. In a word, he reasoned this point so strongly, that the Dutch ambassadors were silenced, and forced to content themselves with a general reply, that they would wait for farther instructions from the states.

A fresh quarrel with Sweden.

THOUGH the states were unable to answer the arguments urged by Gustavus, they nevertheless withheld the ratification desired, and strongly insinuated that this could only g

- a be obtained on the conditions mentioned. It was not the business of Gustavus to drive the Dutch into the arms of Denmark. He was sensible of this, and tried every expedient to gain them to his own interest. He made divers specious proposals, all of which the states rejected, as they knew well the terms that would be expected. The true interest of the states consisted in suffering the northern princes to exhaust each other by wars and bloody battles; for this reason it was, that M. Van Buiningen was blamed for animating the states of Holland against the king of Sweden, by representing the advantage they might deduce from the alliance of the crown of Denmark. By his instigations the city of Amsterdam, of which he was pensionary, inclined strongly to the crown of Denmark, and had already supplied that kingdom with a great number of armed ships to serve against Sweden under
- b Danish colours. Several deputies of the states general were accused of corruption, and this matter was put beyond doubt, by letters from the Swedish ambassador at the Hague, which were intercepted by the king of Denmark, and sent over to Holland. Here the Swedish minister appeared perfectly acquainted with all that passed in the assembly of the states general, and had likewise acquainted his master that divers of the deputies received pensions from the crowns of Spain and Denmark. He even went so far as to specify the sums, and the channels of payment and intercourse. Complaints were made of the Swedish ambassador for the liberties he had taken with the reputation of their high mightinesses; and he vindicated himself, by affirming, that he was only answerable to the king his master for the contents of his letters, and that his Danish majesty had violated the laws of
- c nations, by intercepting the letters of a prince with whom he was not at open war. Not satisfied with this, he wrote a sarcastic epigram upon the states, which had more wit than prudence. Irritated at his conduct they refused to enter into conferences with him; upon which his Swedish majesty declared he would hold no communication with the deputies of the states, and accordingly refused them audience, though they bore the character of ambassadors extraordinary. This encreased the animosity. The states resented his Swedish majesty's putting their ambassadors upon a footing with his minister, vested with no higher character than that of a resident: they wrote to the king, and he replied, that he was astonished to see a people who had but a few years before granted precedence to the envoys of electors, talk in so high a strain about the dignity of their ambassadors. The province of Holland immediately sent orders to the ambassadors to return, unless the king apologized for the conduct of his resident, or granted them an audience. Three of the provinces opposed this resolution, which they feared would produce an open rupture; upon which Holland relaxed, and consented that the resident should be referred entirely to his Swedish majesty, either to acquit or condemn his conduct, as he thought proper; in hopes that this instance of moderation would work a proper effect at the court of Stockholm. Gustavus did not fail to decide the dispute in favour of his resident, though he at the same time acknowledged the civility of the states, by immediately granting audience to their ambassadors. The truth is, he still regarded the republic as a concealed enemy, overawed by fear and interest; the event justified the king's opinion.
- e DENMARK having now come to an open rupture with Sweden, general Bilde traversed Holstein, passed the Elbe, and poured in with a Danish army into the duchy of Bremen. After Wrangel had defeated part of his fleet before Stade, he was more sensible than ever, that the assistance of the Dutch was absolutely necessary to the success of his measures. With these sentiments he offered terms to the states general, so advantageous as subdued all objections to coming to a rupture with Sweden, and entering on engagements with Denmark. The states were, however, so cautious as to contract only a defensive treaty, whereby the parties agreed to assist each other, if attacked, with a body of six thousand men, and a squadron of ships, or a stipulated sum of money, as an equivalent. The difference compromised.
- f IMMERSED in the politics of the North, the states did not neglect their connections with the other maritime powers. Repeated complaints had been made to Cromwel of the depredations committed on the high seas by his privateers; but all were disregarded, at least no satisfaction could be obtained. The Dutch commerce suffered equally from the swarms of small armed vessels that issued out of the French ports, and preyed upon the vessels of the republic. The Dutch merchants computed that three hundred and twenty-eight of their ships had been taken by those privateers. M. Boreel, the Dutch envoy, applied to the French court for satisfaction, and above fifty arrets of council had passed, to oblige the captors to make restitution, but without effect. At Marseilles they attacked the Dutch consul publicly, covered him with wounds, and left him wallowing in his blood, because he had attempted to enforce the ambassador's orders, and the king's arrets. Disputes between the court of France and the republic.
- g This last violence so incensed the states, that they sent instructions to de Ruyter to take all ships coming out of Toulon. The admiral had not long received his orders before he met with two Toulon privateers, the one mounting forty, the other fourteen guns. These he took, removing all the prisoners on board his own ships, where they soon introduced a contagious disorder, of which the greater number of themselves, and many of the Dutch sailors died. It was well known that these ships had been built in Sweden; that they belonged to the French king, and that cardinal Mazarin had procured commissions for the reputed owners, on condition that he shared in the captures. They were the finest going ships of France, and had made an infinity of prizes in this cruise. Mazarin was incensed at the presumption of de Ruyter, and the loss of his ships, and the immense sums of money on board. He represented him as a pirate, who, under false colours, made prize of the French vessels. He said, that if the Dutch commerce had been injured by private subjects of the French king, the states ought not to retaliate upon the royal navy, especially as the king had issued arrets to oblige the captors to make satisfaction. It was urged in council, that such an indignity to the crown could only be washed out by the blood of those who had committed it; and that, if reparation was not made, war ought to be declared against the republic, and the whole nation persecuted with the utmost rigour, for screening so notorious offenders, and thereby becoming parties in the offence. However agreeable to the dignity of the French monarchy this spirited conduct might appear, the advice was tempered by the prudence of the chancellor, and the moderation of M. Villeroi, who strenuously opposed the entering upon violent measures: however, they could not prevent the cardinal's issuing an order for seizing upon all the Dutch ships and effects in the ports of France. This was accordingly executed. Alarmed at so unprecedented a proceeding, the states ordered M. Boreel to represent their astonishment at seeing their ships arrested by the king's order, in direct violation of the laws of nations, and without any application to them, to know whether or not they approved of de Ruyter's conduct, without even reflecting whether necessity did not require that a check should be given the privateers, as they had assaulted the Dutch consul, in contempt of the king's own authority.

BOREEL did not wait the orders of the states to fulfil the duties of his office. He demanded an audience of the king, which was granted. He remonstrated with great spirit and intrepidity, though he was thrice interrupted by the cardinal, who said, "his speech was not the declaration of a minister, but the declamation of a rhetorician." Boreel's reflections upon the minister were indeed so free and severe, that he could expect no extraordinary effects from his remonstrance. All he obtained was a tolerably silent hearing from the young monarch, guided intirely by his prime minister. Nor did Mazarin content himself with paying no regard to the representations of the Dutch ambassador. He sent M. de Thou to the Hague, to demand satisfaction for the insult committed by Ruyter, without so much as releasing the Dutch shipping. De Thou entered into a detail of Ruyter's conduct, which he affirmed, before the states, was contrary to the custom of civilized countries, and highly injurious to the honour of the republic. It deserved the severest chastisement, as treachery was added to injustice. He had hoisted the English flag, and deceived the French under false colours, which was never done, except by barbarous nations and Turkish pirates, when they lay in wait for their Christian prey. He had likewise shewn the utmost treachery to the sieur de Lund, captain of the largest frigate, by writing him a civil letter, which induced the unsuspecting Frenchman to visit de Ruyter on board, where he was detained prisoner. He aggravated the offence by a thousand additional circumstances; and concluded with requesting their high mightinesses to reflect well upon the consequences of such usage to the servants of a great king, and protesting that his instructions would allow him to enter upon no other business, or receive any propositions, until he received a definitive answer to his demands. To this M. de Ghent, who presided in the assembly of the states general, replied, that the Dutch had so evidently a right to make reprisals, that his excellency, who was himself a lawyer, if he would reason impartially, could not but acquit de Ruyter, and justify the conduct of the states. Two days after an order was issued for stopping all the French ships and merchandise in the ports of Holland. To be in a condition to maintain this vigorous resolution, it was proposed to augment the navy with twelve capital ships, and to block up the coasts of France so closely as to prevent all attempts of a revenge, and render useless the swarms of privateers with which the ports were crowded. The states of Holland, who had projected these spirited designs, represented them to the states general; they applauded the conduct of Boreel, who had supported his character with dignity, and even justified de Ruyter. Several of the provinces were for coming to an open rupture with France; but the states general were more moderate. Their first care was to guard strictly against corruption, as it was insinuated that M. de Thou was charged with large sums of money for this purpose. With this view an oath was drawn up and sent to the states of all the provinces, obliging the members to accept of no presents, strenuously to stand up in the interest of their country; to be biased by no private designs, and not only to reject all overtures that had a tendency towards obtaining a taining an undue influence, but to render public every such proposal. At last the states general and the states of Holland, each in a body, gave their final answer to the ambassador. They complained of the depredations, piracies, and robberies, committed by the subjects of the French king, for which no satisfaction was made by the government. They demanded the execution of the arrears granted by the council, restitution of the ships and effects seized by order of the king, and an apology for the indignity passed on the republic in the person of her consul at Marseilles, particularly for the liberties taken by the commissioners at Rouen, and other places, of examining the papers, sealing up the chests, and taking possession of the warehouses of Dutch merchants.

b DE THOU, finding he could effect nothing by a high hand, wrote to his court for more moderate instructions; and he was ordered to assure the states they should have ample satisfaction, upon restitution of the two frigates taken by de Ruyter, after which a treaty of navigation and commerce should be settled. Even this proposition was rejected; upon which the ambassador declared the king would be contented with a promise of restitution, as an equivalent for the ships, and he would in the mean time give all the satisfaction required. From such ample concessions, it was imagined the affair was happily at an end; but the cardinal neglected the ratification of these preliminaries: upon which the states took fire a second time, prohibited all intercourse with France, and gave orders to the naval officers to take French ships wherever they were found. Never had the states displayed more firmness and intrepidity than upon this occasion; but though they bid defiance to all c menaces, they were easily appeased by concessions. The king wrote them a letter, which intirely subdued by lenity that spirit which seemed to rise with opposition.

THE constancy of the republic was, in a great measure, owing to her ignorance of the treaty in agitation between Cromwel and Mazarin. Mean time, an accident happened, which had almost destroyed the effect of the king's letter to the states, and the treaty concluded in consequence. Ruyter, then upon a cruize, was informed by the Dutch consul at Leghorn, that five French ships of war had put into Via Reggia, a port belonging to the little republic of Lucca: thither he pursued them; but being driven out of his course by a storm, they had intelligence of his design, and made the best sail for Porto Lunæ, a harbour in the Genoese dominions. Here they were blocked up by de Ruyter, who, though he was d not at liberty to attack them in a neutral port, found means so to distress them, that they were on the point of surrendering at discretion, when advice arrived from the states of the treaty signed with the French monarch. De Ruyter's conduct was so much approved on this occasion, that the states, to shew their sense of his merit, complimented him with a gold chain, in testimony of their regard.

SCARCE had the republic got clear of these disputes with the court of France, when she was involved in others with that of Portugal, about their several pretensions in Brasil. Mess. Tenhoven and de Wit were sent envoys to Lisbon to adjust the affair, and present the overtures of a treaty of accommodation. The Portuguese ministry were equally astonished at the propositions made, and the powerful armaments with which they were accompanied. c Not a moment was lost in taking every measure for the security of the kingdom; the guards at Lisbon were doubled; all the captains of ships had orders to prepare for action, and a body of infantry was encamped on the shore to watch the motions of the Dutch fleet. After these vigorous steps had been taken, the ministers ventured to acquaint the Dutch deputies, that the court would not listen to proposals made with such an air of defiance, and with all the rigour of conquerors. This was highly resented by the Hollanders, who, in the heat of passion, expressed themselves in disrespectful terms of the royal family, and de Solas, secretary of state; upon which orders were issued to seize upon all the Dutch merchantmen in the Tagus. To such open violences a declaration of war must necessarily ensue; the deputies quitted Lisbon without taking leave, and de Ruyter took several Portu- f guese ships in the mouth of the river.

Disputes with Portugal about the Brasils.

BEFORE their departure the Dutch commissaries had left a declaration of war, sealed up, in the hands of Don Pedro de Sylva. Ruyter now thought himself at liberty to act offensively: accordingly he divided his fleet into three squadrons, and resolved to cruise in certain latitudes for the Brasil fleet, daily expected in Europe. His own division fell in with a fleet of forty sail; but the haziness of the weather concealed them from his view. Only five ships were taken, and it was from the crews of them he learnt that the fleet was so numerous. Another fleet, homeward-bound from Brasil, was every day expected; but the scarcity of provisions obliged Ruyter to quit his station, and return to Holland.<sup>b</sup>

WHILE the states were thus engaged in an open rupture with Portugal, an affair happened, at first of seemingly trivial moment, but in the end of serious consequences, with the neighbouring princes of the Rhine. The electors of Mentz, Treves, and Cologne, the duke of Neuburg, and the bishop of Munster, were desirous of entering into a strict alliance with the republic, for their mutual defence. Their overtures, however, were coldly received by the states of Zealand and Friseland, though the province of Holland approved of a treaty of commerce, respecting the navigation of the Rhine, upon the terms proposed a few years before by the elector of Cologne. This point was under deliberation when the bishop of Munster, quarrelling with his own subjects, interrupted the negotiation, and made the republic and the princes, instead of joining in an alliance, embrace opposite parties, and fight with all the bitterness of inveterate enemies. Bernard Van Galen, for so the bishop was called, had some years before got possession of the see of Munster, by a stroke of policy. His uncle, who had bred him up from his infancy, reckoned himself secure of being elected, when he found himself outwitted by his nephew, and disappointed in his expectations. The pope refused to confirm the election of Van Galen; but that bold enterprising genius, spurning difficulty, maintained his ground, in despite of all opposition, rendered himself respectable, and even formed vast projects for extending his power and dominions. His wearing the mitre did not prevent his understanding the sword. By nature he was intended for a soldier, and he followed his inclinations as soon as opportunity offered. He entered into all the intrigues of his neighbours, to whom he hired out his courage and his troops. When he was reproached for meditating such vast designs with such slender forces, he replied, That little saints frequently wrought great miracles. Besides the large sums he drew from the neighbouring princes, he levied heavy taxes upon his subjects for the support of the army, and, when they murmured at the oppression, was used to say, That a warrior should have no more compassion than the devil. He soon began to practise this maxim upon his own subjects. Like most other bishopricks in Germany, the see of Munster is subjected to the bishops in temporals as well as spirituals, the prelates uniting in the mitre the crozier and the sceptre. Some towns, within their jurisdiction, however, maintained their privileges, and amongst these was the city of Munster. The burghers insisted, that they were not obliged to receive the bishop's garrison, but that the sole command of the city belonged to the inhabitants. Two years before the bishop had introduced a body of troops, as necessary to the security of the place; the burghers complained loudly, and the dispute was referred to the assembly of the provincial states, who decided in favour of the burghers. Van Galen refused to stand by their award, submitted it to the imperial verdict, and obtained six months delay, to produce new arguments in support of his pretensions. Alarmed at this proceeding, which plainly indicated a bias in favour of the bishop, the magistrates sent a deputation to the Hague, requesting the republic to include them in the treaty lately made with the Hans towns. The grand pensionary de Wit, who foresaw the issue of entering upon such engagements, would do nothing without consulting the states, particularly those of Overijssel and Groningen; but their deliberations were so tedious, that the opportunity slipped of strengthening the frontiers towards that quarter. The bishop invested the town with his own forces, and a body of auxiliaries, and bombarded it with such fury, that in the space of a few hours above two hundred houses were set on fire, two churches demolished, and a priest, as he was administering the sacrament at the altar, swept off with the consecrated bread, by a cannon-bullet. This terrible sacrilege, committed by a bishop, roused all the fury of the townsmen; they sallied out vigorously on the besiegers, and slew great numbers of the prelate's forces, while their wives and daughters, forming themselves into companies, resolutely defended the walls. The electors of Bavaria and Saxony interposed, as vicars of the empire; the pope, as father of the church, reprehended his warlike son, and blamed the bishop's ardor to take arms upon so slight an occasion; but more effectual remedies than pontifical exhortations were requisite.

WHEN it was known in Holland that a war broke out between the bishop of Munster and his flock, the republic immediately put her frontier into a posture of defence, and sent two members from the states general, and one from the council of war, with offers of her mediation. The deputies were received civilly by the bishop; but their mediation was rejected, the prelate excusing himself, under pretence it would be an affront to the states of the country, and the princes of the empire, to submit to any other arbitration than theirs: nor would he suffer the deputies to enter the city, lest their presence might help to animate the burghers. This conduct incensed the states general, and determined them to succour the besieged; but four towns in Holland opposed this resolution, which, however, did not prevent the troops from beginning their march. The command was given to M. Rhingrave, commissary-general of the cavalry, and governor of Maestricht, as prince Maurice of Nassau was at that time in Friseland.

VAN GALEN had minute intelligence of all that passed in the states general of the United Provinces. He perceived that this affair would soon take a very serious turn. He made some rigorous proposals to the besieged, which were rejected. However, the nobility, who feared to see their country made the theatre of war, used all their influence a with the burghers to accept of an accommodation; and the bishop, who apprehended he should in a few days be forced by the Dutch to raise the siege, relaxed in a variety of articles. A compromise was struck up, the gates were opened, and the prelate made his public entry in the beginning of December, but without being honoured with the usual rejoicings and acclamations. The Dutch were piqued that their mediation was rejected, and the bishop was irritated at not being received with the accustomed honours by his subjects, and at the march of the Dutch forces<sup>1</sup>; he resolved secretly to embrace the first opportunity of being revenged on the republic, and the inhabitants of Munster. We shall see, in course of our narrative, how he accomplished his purposes.

b THOSE foreign disputes in which the republic was engaged, did not prevent domestic Civil divisions. broils. The province of Overijssel was involved in violent altercations about certain privileges, for some years past, and there appeared no prospect of an issue, when suddenly the parties came to a resolution of referring their differences to the prince of Nassau, stadtholder of the province, and M. de Wit, grand pensionary of Holland, by whom they were happily terminated. But this affair was no sooner ended, than the election of a mareschal de camp became a new subject of dissension in the provinces. The states general had appointed to this office, and the states of Holland opposed the election, insisting that the states general assumed an illegal authority. In fact, they apprehended that the influence of the house of Orange would be strengthened by the renewal of an office which had for years been abolished; and that was the true reason of their opposition. The affair was agitated with c great heat, until the rapid progress of the Swedish arms, and the miserable situation of the king of Denmark, called for the interposition of the United Provinces, and diverted their attention from an object which might have laid the foundation of a civil war, and the destruction of the republic<sup>2</sup>.

FORMER engagements to the king of Denmark, the ballance of power in the North, and the commercial interest of the United Provinces, all required that Sweden should not become too powerful. As Copenhagen was now invested, the states general proposed sending immediate succours to Frederic; but the provinces of Zealand, Friseland, and Guelderland, insisted upon first creating a mareschal de camp. However, this point was dropped, upon the general resolution that was taken of only sending a naval force. Gustavus had given d the states the strongest assurances that he would never molest their commerce; he had likewise remitted large sums of money to his ambassador at the Hague, to be duly applied, in order to retard the assistance intended for Denmark; but all his endeavours were frustrated by the vigilance of de Wit, and the spirit of the people, who unanimously resented the encroachments of this enterprising prince. A large fleet accordingly set sail, early in the spring, for the Baltick, under the conduct of admiral Opdam, who had orders not only to protect the ships of the republic, but to assist, by every possible means, the king of Denmark, and fight the Swedish fleet the first opportunity: if Cronenburgh and Copenhagen should be in the hands of the Swedes before his arrival, his instructions were, to assist, aid, and abet, all the enterprizes of the Danish monarch, and with his fleet to block up e such places as the king might chuse to invest by land. In a word, the republic seemed determined to keep no bounds with Sweden; and Van Buiningen, who still resided at Copenhagen, contributed to spur on the states, by representing the infamy and danger to the republic that would ensue, from deserting Frederic in his distressed situation, and the benefits she might receive from his gratitude, if a timely vigorous diversion was made in his favour. That minister had great weight with the pensionary de Wit, who entered the more readily into his measures, because he was under no apprehensions from France or England.

AFTER Opdam had long struggled with adverse winds, he arrived in the Sound, where the Swedish fleet was immediately descried; upon which he assembled a council of his officers. It was carried by a majority to attack the enemy; but contrary winds kept the fleet f back for four days, and the Swedes shewed no inclination to become the aggressors. At last a fresh gale sprung up, and Opdam advanced in three divisions, while the Swedish admiral, Wrangel, was drawn up in the same order to oppose his passage. Gustavus was in the castle of Cronenburgh, a spectator of the action, and witness to the conduct of his admiral, who had already won so many laurels. The heat of the engagement fell upon Opdam and Wrangel; both fought with equal skill and courage; their strength was equal, but not so their fortune. Wrangel was forced to retreat under the cannon of the fortrefs, and yield a victory which he sold at the expence of a multitude of lives. The carnage indeed was dreadful in both fleets: the Dutch lost two admirals, de Wit and Florizen, they suffered greatly in their rigging, but the enemy lost more private men, and suffered greater damage in their hulls. Wrangel's own ship was pierced through and through: and when he g quitted the engagement, he had nine feet water in his hold. Three Swedish ships were taken, the same number sunk, and four more were driven ashore; but what gave Opdam clearly the advantage was, that he landed two thousand men, military stores, and provisions, in Copenhagen, by which the city was saved. Swedish writers have disputed the victory, only because it was not pursued, and because a process against Opdam was commenced on his return, for not having destroyed the Swedish fleet at Landskroon<sup>1</sup>.

THIS engagement gave great disturbance to Gustavus, as it seemed the harbinger of a declared war with the United Provinces. It was debated in his council, whether he should dissemble his resentment at this act of hostility, or denounce war openly against the states. A variety of reasons were offered in support of both opinions, and the arguments appeared so equal, that the king took more time to deliberate. In Holland the people reasoned differently. It was not thought sufficient to have afforded the king of Denmark the slender assistance of two thousand men, when by treaty they were engaged to assist him with double that number: it was therefore determined to augment the number of auxiliaries to six thousand effective men. Only one difficulty remained, and that was with respect to the payment of this corps. Some of the deputies proposed, that his Danish majesty should put Gluckstadt into the hands of the Dutch; but de Wit answered, that this would excite the jealousy of France and England, who were already displeased with the conduct of the republic, as was obvious from the remonstrances of M. de Thou, the French ambassador.

The states jealous of the protector of England, and the king of France.

IT was the first intention of the states to leave only a squadron of six or seven men of war in the Baltick, because it was not doubted but Copenhagen, with the succours thrown in by Opdam, would be in condition to defend itself for the winter; but upon advice that England was about to declare for Sweden, the admiral had orders to remain with his whole fleet, to winter in Denmark, to follow the instructions of Frederic, to oppose the passage of the Swedish forces from Holstein, and pursue every measure which could contribute to the common interest of the allies, and disappoint the schemes of Gustavus. It is certain that Cromwel harboured designs against Denmark and Holland, but a variety of domestic occurrences prevented his carrying them into execution. He had now got possession of Dunkirk, which had lately been taken from the Spaniards by the joint forces of France and England. Surrendering Dunkirk to the protector was equally irksome to France, Spain, the pope, and the United Provinces; but Cromwel carried the point with a high hand. The Dutch in particular had reason to complain. They saw the English in the quiet enjoyment of a port, which would serve as a retreat for their privateers, and in a short time be filled with the pillage of the Dutch shipping. The states had rather see Dunkirk in the hands of the Spaniards than of the English; for the interest of the former, with respect to commerce, began now to be re-united to those of the provinces. They now saw France and England strongly cemented by this bond of union, and began to apprehend that Furnese, Graveline, Menin, Ypres, and Oudenarde, were likewise in danger. M. de Turenne was fixed upon by the cardinal to quiet the emotions of the republic, and to assure the states, that the king had no other view in the conquest of the Netherlands, than to oblige the inhabitants to throw off the Spanish yoke, and to unite in a form of government similar to that of the United Provinces. He added, that if a republican government was once established, the king would willingly restore all his conquests since the commencement of the war, not excepting the capital of Artois. The friends of France looked upon this proposal as so equitable, that they pressed the states to second the designs of the most Christian king; but M. de Wit headed the contrary party, from a conviction that Mazarin's design was only to sow dissension among the provinces, and to extend the frontiers of the kingdom, at the expence of the Netherlands. But while this point was agitated with great warmth, the sudden illness of the French king introduced a great change into the politics of the court; and the states were relieved from their apprehensions on the side of England, by the death of the enterprising, the ambitious, the successful, and the splendidly wicked usurper, Oliver Cromwel; at the same time, the horror, the terror, and the admiration of all his neighbours. The vacancy in the imperial throne likewise made considerable alteration in the state of affairs, and Holland was forced to change her system with the circumstances of Europe.

Proposals made by the king of France.

IT was evident that the United Provinces were deeply interested in the fate of the candidates to the imperial diadem, which was claimed by the archduke Leopold, the king of Hungary, the elector of Bavaria, and the duke of Neuburg. It was contrary to the interest of the republic, to see the power of the house of Austria enlarged, and the empire made hereditary in that family; because the states were not so thoroughly reconciled to Spain, but that some articles left undetermined by the treaty of Munster might still be disputed. On the other hand, it was apprehended that any opposition to the claims of this ambitious and powerful family, might kindle a war, which would necessarily spread itself a to the provinces. The present situation of the republic required that France should be assisted in setting upon the imperial throne, a prince less powerful than Leopold. However, all their designs, whatever they might be, were anticipated by the election of Leopold, without bloodshed, or scarce any opposition in the diet<sup>m</sup>.

LEOPOLD, immediately after his election, sent M. Trequet in quality of envoy to the Hague, to acquaint the states with his elevation, and to solicit their close alliance with the house of Austria. This minister hoped the more readily that his commission would be successful, because the union tended to assist Denmark, and oppose the growing power of Sweden. Besides, as the states were on the point of sending another fleet to the Baltic, he presumed they would have no objection to act in concert with the imperial arms; though b indeed this proved diametrically opposite to their designs, which were to assist Denmark, but not to allow the house of Austria any footing in the islands of the Baltic. Yet the republic made no difficulty of renewing her treaties with the imperial court, and of compromising some disputes about certain frontier towns with the Spaniards.

It was not so easy to make up the breach with Portugal, as the republic continued to demand reparation of her losses, and satisfaction for the injuries sustained by her subjects. The king of France offered his mediation, and de Thou exhorted the states to consent to a suspension of hostilities, in order to settle the preliminaries of a treaty. Accordingly the states general granted an armistice for two months, on condition that his Portuguese majesty should send an ambassador into Holland, to treat with the states, and that in failure c of his arrival, the war should go on with the usual vigour. In the mean time the admiralty was busied in preparing for the worst, and equipping such a fleet as it was hoped would oblige the Portuguese to listen to reason. This fleet set sail under de Ruyter in the month of June; but that admiral never met with an opportunity of exercising his valour; though his constancy met with severe trials in a terrible storm, which overtook the fleet soon after it quitted the coast of Holland. At length he arrived in a shattered condition in the Tagus, which rendered the Portuguese more averse to an accommodation, relying upon the divisions among the provinces, the incumbrances on the India company, and the engagements of the republic to the king of Denmark, that would prevent their paying the necessary attention to the affairs of Brasil. The commissioners met, and disputed, but d settled nothing<sup>n</sup>.

STILL the war between Sweden and Denmark raged with unremitting fury. Copenhagen A. D. 1646: was besieged by land, and blocked up by sea, while the Dutch and Danish fleets were locked up by the ice, and the Swedes making vast conquests over every part of the Danish dominions. At last, the allies broke the ice, and made way for some of their ships to put to sea. Early in the spring they encountered six Swedish men of war, who valiantly sustained their first attack, though pressed with the utmost vigour and impetuosity. After an exceeding obstinate engagement, they were forced to yield to the weight of a greatly superior strength, and retire with the loss of two ships of fifty guns each, one of which was taken, and the other sunk, leaving a complete and decisive victory to the Hollanders.

e THIS defeat, the vigorous descents of the Dutch fleet, and the treaty concluded between France, England, and Holland, to restore the tranquillity of the North, operated powerfully on the mind of Gustavus, who had still obstinately persevered in besieging Copenhagen, and ruining the dominions of his adversary. To give more weight to the treaty, the republic sent de Ruyter with another fleet to the coasts of Jutland, and communicated to him the articles entered upon with France and England, as the clearest explication of his instructions, and rule for his conduct. His Swedish majesty now entered into negotiations with the Dutch deputies; but the arrival of an English fleet in the Sound, and the ambiguous conduct of that nation, fluctuating, unsteady, and unhinged in its internal government, disconcerted all the measures of the Hollanders, and broke off the negotiation after f it was far advanced. Ruyter and Opdam even apprehended an attack from the English, until they received the most solemn assurances to the contrary from the lord Montague; whose departure from the Sound disappointed all the hopes of the Swedish monarch. No sooner were the Dutch left there at entire liberty to act, than they renewed their operations, harrassing the enemy by descents on every side. It was by the desperate courage of a body of soldiers, headed by de Ruyter, that the victory at Funen was gained, which gave the first shock to the fortune of Gustavus; for as to the advantages gained over his fleets, those were regarded as of less consequence. In a word, the diligence, vigour, and intrepidity of the Dutch, first disposed the king of Sweden to listen to reasonable conditions, which he was on the point of accepting, when he was seized with a disorder that proved g fatal.

Peace restored to the North.

THIS event produced various effects; Charles Gustavus was deeply regretted by all the a Swedes, while the Danish monarch, and the city of Copenhagen, could not refrain from indecent transports of joy. In the end, however, it proved fortunate for both sides, who were almost reduced to the verge of desperation, by their obduracy and implacable animosity. A peace, under the mediation of England and Holland, was concluded, and repose once more restored to Denmark, which for near the space of two years had been the theatre of a bloody war, productive of every species of distress and misfortune to the truly miserable inhabitants. Yet in one respect the people were losers, as their gratitude for the valiant and persevering defence of the king, moved them to compliment him with their liberty, and render him one of the most despotic princes in Christendom°.

The Dutch
take the island of Ceylon.

CARDINAL Mazarin now offered his mediation to reconcile his Portuguese majesty and b the states general; but the negotiations proved more difficult than the preceding year. When this matter had been before agitated, the only obstruction was the indemnification required by the Dutch for the loss sustained in the Brazils; now the India company had driven the Portuguese from the island of Ceylon, thereby engrossing the most valuable of all c the India spices, the cinnamon, which constitutes one of the most essential articles of their commerce. This invaluable acquisition was due to the diligence and valour of *M. Goben*s, counsellor of state at Batavia, who first made an attack upon some of the smaller Portuguese factories in the island; and encouraged by his success, and the invitation of the natives, grievously oppressed by the tyranny of their old masters, ventured upon an attempt in Jaffanapatan, the head settlement of the Portuguese. The situation of this place rendered a formal siege impracticable; however, by the force of bombs and red hot bullets, the Dutch forced the great lords of the country to abandon their magnificent palaces, and take shelter in the Portuguese fort, which was in a short time reduced by famine to extremities. In about fourteen weeks after the city was first invested, the besieged desired to capitulate, and the Europeans were permitted either to remove to Goa without their effects, or remain in the country in subjection to the conquerors. The king hated the Portuguese; but he was alarmed at the rapid progress the Dutch made, and the lofty manner in which they treated the vanquished Portuguese and the natives. He accordingly determined to crush them in the infancy of their establishment, raised an army for that purpose; but was overawed, and forced to relinquish his design, by the Dutch squadron. In the end, d he compromised matters with the company, and left the Hollanders in full possession of whatever the Portuguese had claimed in this delicious island.

THOUGH the articles of pacification with Portugal were rendered more intricate by the late conquest in Ceylon, yet it contributed to make his Faithful majesty more pliant. He found he could not with impunity attack the company, or avoid making restitution of the lands and merchandize taken from the republic in Brazil. Sensibly touched with the loss of the valuable settlements in Ceylon, he sent an ambassador to Holland with fresh proposals; and to facilitate the way to an accommodation, he applied to Mazarin for the mediation of the court of France. Mazarin committed this affair to M. de Thou, resident at the Hague; and that minister acted so warmly in the affair as to incur the displeasure of his e eminence, who apprehended that Spain would reject his taking part in the affairs of Portugal, at a time when the two courts were settling preliminaries for a durable peace, after a tedious, bloody, and ruinous war. Such was the situation of Holland with regard to Portugal, when fresh occasions of discontent arose. The Portuguese Jesuits traded, under a variety of shapes and disguises, to a prodigious extent in the East Indies. By a thousand arts and machinations they obstructed the Dutch commerce; and by the esteem in which they were held in the different countries of India, not only forestalled the markets, but even so far prejudiced the natives, that in many places they refused to hold any intercourse with the Hollanders. They not only insinuated themselves into the court of the emperor of China, by their address and skill in geometry, astronomy, and mechanics, but made pilgrimages to every kingdom in India, particularly to Dehli, where the grand mogul resided, and to Golkonda, whence they returned loaded with diamonds of the best water and size, and the most precious jewels. The arts used by the Dutch to counteract them, were not very justifiable. They were, however, perfectly consistent with the genius of this people, who stick at nothing to promote their interest. They are accused, and the charge hath never been disproved, of arresting clandestinely the Jesuit pilgrims, and strangling them privately: they are even charged with using poison in the most base and insidious manner. We have already explicitly related the progress of the Dutch commerce in India°, and it is not agreeable to us to repeat facts which disgrace humanity, and so deeply stain the character of a whole nation. Sufficient it is, that by a series of the darkest arts and f g a intrigues, the Dutch firmly established themselves, ruined their adversaries, and formed a variety of advantageous treaties and alliances with the natives (A).

THE revolution which now happened in England, and the king's restoration, affected the politics of the states general, who had never been cordial with Cromwell, and since his death, were in a state of uncertainty about the conduct they were to observe to his son Richard. How differently now did they behave to Charles II. to what they had done some years before, when that fugitive monarch was in his deplorable condition denied the protection of the republic, and was forced to quit the court of his cousin the prince of Orange, without knowing where to find another retreat. The transactions in England were

b tion to congratulate him on his happy prospect, and welcome his majesty into the dominions of the republic. This deputation laid the foundation of a violent altercation between the states general and the states of Holland, the former insisting not only upon their precedency at Breda, but even in the province of Holland, as the representatives of the seven provinces, and the sovereign authority in the republic. Both resolved to have the lead in the intended public entry of the king into the Hague; but Charles interposed and happily reconciled the contending parties. He was oppressed with honours and civilities during his stay in Holland; and upon his departure, was followed by a splendid embassy to his newly recovered dominions. M. de Beverwert was appointed the first in this embassy; and a present, which was made by the king to the son of that gentleman, became the c subject of debate among the divines and politicians of the United Provinces. Beverwert acquainted the states with the present made to his son; but he said, it could not be regarded as a gratification to the ambassador, in any way contrary to the oath he had taken of receiving no bribes or presents, which would have the least tendency to bias his integrity. It was the king's unrelative gift to the son, from a mere regard to the person of that young gentleman, as some affirmed; while others were equally confident that the son and father were both included in the present, and incapable of being distinguished in any mark of respect. We mention this circumstance only to shew the delicacy of the government respecting the conduct of ambassadors. It is also a proof that the public had d nothing of considerable importance to gain attention, else it would not have canvassed so rigidly a trivial affair, while the most flagrant corruptions had been winked at in the assembly of the states, and in all the embassies during the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell <sup>a</sup>.

It was this year that the French king had taken violent possession of the principality of Orange, upon an antient claim which princes always find means to prove by the longest sword. The disputes between the princesses dowagers furnished a pretext for resuming this claim, and Lewis did not chuse to lose so fair an opportunity of extending his dominion. He alledged, that the princess governante had shewn him many instances of disrespect during the minority of her son the prince of Orange. He likewise maintained that he was performing a signal service to the prince, by easing him of the load of useless expensive garrisons. This opinion was supported by the enemies of the house of Orange, e who insisted that the finances of that family had been so mismanaged and misapplied since the regency, as to render the burthen of maintaining guards, garrisons, and fortifications, quite intolerable. They could not therefore conceive what design Maurice could have in fortifying, at the price of two millions, a place situated in the heart of the French dominions, which could prove of no use to the republic, as a barrier against the encroachments of France. Very little encouragement from the prince's enemies in Holland was sufficient to determine the king to undertake an enterprize to which he was before disposed. He was at that time in Provence upon other affairs, and resolved to seize this opportunity of making himself master of the principality of Orange. M. de Milet was sent to summon count Dobna to surrender his trust to the king, as mediator of the differences between the f princesses dowagers, and legitimate tutor, and protector of the young prince. Upon Dobna's answering, That he would only act by the orders of the princesses, who had vested him with the office of governor; Milet replied, That he was astonished at his presumption, in refusing obedience to the command of the king his master, adding, that the most Christian king would support his right with the irrefragable proof of twenty thousand men, who would make him repent his obstinacy. The count, without being moved at this menace, persevered in his duty, and sent notice of his situation to the Hague. The court of the young prince was instantly alarmed at the danger which threatened the here-

(A) The treaty with the king of Maccassar was not concluded till the year 1662; but we have here mentioned all the transactions in India under one head, the better to preserve the connection, and avoid transitions to subjects that bear not the least relation to each other.

ditary dominions, and the friends to the family laboured to reconcile the princesses, as the only means which could ward off the impending blow; for as the king had made their differences the principal argument for his own proceedings, it was hoped their reconciliation would take away all pretext for so unjust and oppressive an invasion on the rights of a minor. Mean time the garrison was unprovided with stores and every necessary of a siege, while the king's army under the marechal Plessis Pralin, advanced to the gates of Orange. The count de Dobna, unable to make any defence, capitulated; and, with the consent and advice of the magistrates, delivered the keys into the hands of the marechal. The king promised to exercise justice in the prince's name, and to restore the principality, with all the stores, cannon, effects, &c. as soon as he arrived at age; or in case of his death, to the electress of Brandenburgh, or the nearest heirs: but he took care immediately to demolish the citadel, erected at a vast expence by prince Maurice. Dobna was accused of having yielded to the force of corruption, and the princesses exclaimed violently against the king's arbitrary proceedings, throwing themselves upon the protection of the states general, and imploring the aid and assistance of their high mightinesses, in defence of an helpless injured minor. They had no bounds to their complaints; they wrote in bitter terms to the king, accused him of violating the laws of nations, and taking advantage of a child, and the weakness of two women, his only protectresses.

LEWIS's designs were too evident, and the case of too much importance for the states to pass it over unnoticed; but they dreaded the effects of the king's displeasure. However, instructions were sent relative to the principality, to their ambassadors in France and England. The princess herself visited England, not only to congratulate the king her brother upon his restoration, but to intercede with him in behalf of her son, his nephew. Before her departure, the states of Zealand shewed their attachment to the family of Orange, by proposing that the prince should be declared the first nobleman in the provinces, and vested with the authority of stadtholder, captain-general, and all the other titles and prerogatives held by his ancestors, and a pension of one hundred thousand florins. They also demanded that he should immediately be admitted a member of the council of state, in order to be early instructed in the arts of war and government, and the other qualifications necessary to his high birth and rank in the republic. They however allowed, that he should not enter upon the functions of his office, until he attained the age of eighteen years; and that neither the stadtholdership, nor any of the other prerogatives, should in the mean time be exercised by a lieutenant. To give more weight to their proposal, the zealous states of this province went in a body to the Hague, and presented themselves in a cavalcade of twenty coaches to the states general. M. de Wit, their pensioner, recited in a long-laboured oration, the services done the republic by the house of Orange, and the reason why the states of Zealand thought the acceptance of their proposal necessary to the security and quiet of the provinces. He did not omit a single argument that could enforce his subject; and his views were seconded by the states of Friseland and Overyssel. Holland however and the other provinces kept aloof; yet to shew their respect to the princesses and the king of England, they assigned the prince a yearly revenue of forty thousand florins, to support the dignity of his house, and the expences of his court and education. They even proceeded so far as to abolish the act of exclusion, which had raised such dissensions in the provinces, and was passed merely out of dread of Oliver Cromwel. In this manner did the complaisance of Holland prevent the other provinces from pushing their designs further at that time, and open the way to the young prince of Orange, to all the honours and dignities of his illustrious ancestors.

A. D. 1661.
Treaty with Portugal.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Dutch had been extremely successful in the war against Portugal, though they had obtained all they could propose to themselves by the sword, and though the king had no hopes of recovering his losses by the continuance of the war, yet no peace had been concluded. As the hostilities were confined entirely to a distant country, it could not be expected to be carried on with the same vigour as if Europe had been the theatre of war. The difficulty of transporting troops into those remote regions, and of meeting with other fleets in that vast expanse of ocean, rendered their mutual operations languid, and decisive blows unfrequent; yet both parties were of opinion it was high time to sheath the sword, and turn their thoughts to a solid durable reconciliation. The Dutch especially gave way to these pacific sentiments, from a desire to taste the sweet fruits of their conquests, which could not be done with security, while the rupture continued with a kingdom still powerful by sea, though greatly declined; and the crowns of France and England promised their good intentions, from views widely different. His Christian majesty rejoiced at having this thorn in the side of the Catholic king, and was desirous by taking off the Dutch, to give Portugal weight in his negotiations for a peace

- a with the court of Spain; while the king of England, who was upon terms with Catherine, the infanta of Portugal, was eager to render so signal a service to a family with which he was soon to be linked in the closest alliance. The news of this intended marriage was received with more chagrin than surprize in Holland. It was obvious that such engagements must necessarily cement the king of England to the interest of Portugal. The states represented to the king by their ambassadors, the injustice done them by his Portuguese majesty, in refusing to make restitution of Brasil; but their remonstrances were coldly received; Charles even declared, upon hearing that great preparations were making in Holland, his intentions to assist the crown of Portugal. Though he expressed himself in polite and friendly terms, it was plain that his answer contained a menace, if the Dutch should longer pursue their resentments. At the same time he offered his mediation, which however was too much suspected to be cordially accepted. The truth was, the crowns of France and England were both meditating the means of supporting Portugal; while the minister of Alphonso VI. was diligently negotiating a peace at the Hague, where he had gained over a great number of friends. The great obstacle was the restitution of Brasil. This the states had long demanded in vain; it was now determined to relinquish the project, rather than prosecute hostilities against a crown so powerfully supported by France and England, and on the point of being reconciled with Spain. Four provinces, however, opposed this resolution upon late assurances from the Spanish court, that they were determined to come to no accommodation with Portugal, and that Brasil should be restored to the republic the moment his Catholic majesty should again become possessed of the kingdom of Portugal. Zealand in particular insisted, that, by the treaty of Utrecht, this resolution could only be carried into execution by an unanimity of voices, which was requisite in all matters of so high importance as the making peace or war. The debate was pushed to a great length, but it never broke off the conferences with the count de Miranda, the Portuguese minister. At length a treaty was concluded, by which his Portuguese majesty promised to pay the republic five hundred thousand livres annually, in money, sugar, and salt; and a million of money to indemnify her losses in the Brasils. He likewise consented that the Dutch should enjoy the same privileges of trade to Portugal, Brasil, and the coast of Africa, as the English. Hostilities were to cease in Europe two months before the exchange of ratifications, and in the Indies, immediately upon public notice of the treaty in those parts.

- ENGLAND* had already manifested no favourable disposition to the interest of the republic, in the bias the king plainly shewed for the court of Portugal: the intentions of that court became still more obvious by the proposal that was now made, of a triple alliance between the crowns of England and France, and the United Provinces. It was the manner rather than the terms of this proposition, which gave offence. The coldness was increased by the reception which the Dutch ambassadors met with at the court of London, where they were treated with distant respect, and affronted with the revival of all the claims made by the late protector. They wrote back to the Hague soon after their arrival, that their negotiations were likely to prove tedious and difficult, because the king insisted upon the conclusion of a treaty favourable to him, before he entered upon the subject of navigation and commerce. The first obstruction that occurred in course of the conferences, were the rights of fishing for herrings on the British coasts. The next was the prerogative assumed by the English in visiting and examining Dutch vessels at sea, as well as in the ports of the kingdom. It was above all things the wish of the Hollanders to abolish this custom, equally inconvenient to trade, and ignominious to the government; but it was a badge of superiority of which the English were extremely tenacious. The crown-jewels pledged in Holland by the late king, and the not delivering up to punishment all the murderers of the king's father, who had now taken shelter in Holland, together with certain hostilities committed by an English officer on the coast of Africa, all contributed to encrease the coldness between the two nations, and render the disputes of the commissaries fruitless. It was plain from the king's general behaviour, that his designs were rather to avail himself of the power of the republic, than live with her upon the antient footing of friendship. His supporting the claims of his nephew the prince of Orange to the stadtholdership, his reconciliation with the princess of Orange, with whom he had been at variance, and his entering into a closer union with the elector of Brandenburgh, excited the jealousy of the states, and persuaded them that Charles was no way affected to Holland, or disposed to promote the interest of the republic. Both the king and the states courted Mazarin; but in doing this, Charles embroiled himself with the pensioner de Wit, and inflamed the populace of Holland, by distressing their fisheries, at the time too when his nephew most wanted their assistance. But what gave the greatest offence, was the king's insisting that the India company should allow free liberty to the English to trade to all the ports of Asia, not immediately in the possession of the Dutch, even with the kings and princes at war with the republic; and that the English factories should be an asylum for all the natives who sought protection of the British nation. Such demands, from a prince who pretended to court the alliance of the republic, could not but be regarded as acts of that authority which aspiring princes love to exercise over their neighbours, as well as their subjects; but it was the business of the states to suppress their resentment to a more seasonable opportunity. In complaisance to the king, three of the regicides were to be seized, in order to be delivered up to punishment. Downing, the English minister, threatened the deputies with the king's resentment, if they refused to sign an order to that purpose. He obtained the order; but the magistrates of several towns interposed, affirming it would be the greatest injury to the republic to violate the protection granted to all refugees; and that, in this instance, it would for many reasons be base and insidious. In despite however of their opposition, the regicides were taken into custody, embarked at the Brille, and sent to London. De Wit was the principal manager in this transaction, which greatly astonished all his friends, who were no strangers to his declared enmity to the king of England and the house of Orange.

The states of Holland seize upon the papers of the princess dowager.

ALREADY the tutelage of the prince of Orange had given birth to various dissensions, which were now renewed upon the death of the substitutes appointed by the princess, upon her departure for England. That she should nominate the king her brother among the guardians of the young prince, gave umbrage to the rigid republicans. The enemies to the house of Orange, some of whom were the leading men in the republic, resented highly her substituting the king of England, who, they said, would educate the prince in despotic principles, fill all the vacant offices in the towns dependent on the Orange family with his creatures, and sap the batteries they had been for years erecting in defence of public liberty. In a point of so vast importance, they thought themselves justified in exerting any means to ward off the danger, and striking what they called a blow of state. Accordingly they seized upon a strong box which the princess dowager left in her apartment, where they expected to find the clearest information of the intrigues carried on by the late prince, to establish his own sovereign authority, of the enterprize against Amsterdam, and the secret intercourse he was supposed to hold with divers members of the states general. Charles complained that the laws of nations had been grossly insulted by this action: he likewise alledged that his own dignity was affronted, by a violent attempt to extort the secrets of a sovereign family so nearly allied to him, and under the protection of the crown of England. To this the states of Holland, which had authorised the courts of justice to execute this affair, could make no reply, besides the interest they had in all that concerned the prince, and the authority that devolved on them, in consequence of the princess's departure. They found means, however, to shift off the restitution of the papers demanded, and to lodge them in the secretary's office. It is probable, that the occasion which the princess had for the assistance and countenance of the states, in her proposed journey to France, to procure restitution of the principality of Orange, made the king her brother insist less strenuously upon this point.

State of Holland, with respect to France.

THE death of cardinal Mazarin, which happened soon after the arrival of the Dutch ambassadors sent to demand restitution of Orange, occasioned great changes in the court of Lewis XIV. That prince was now, for the first time, actually a king. Every thing was conducted under his immediate direction. He used the assistance of his ministers; but he did not suffer them to govern him, as the cardinal had done: and this he evinced by the sudden disgrace of M. Fouquet, which the Dutch ambassadors were in expectation would turn out to the advantage of the republic. He had always opposed the treaty of alliance and commerce between the two nations; but the views of Colbert, who succeeded, greatly disappointed the hopes of the states general. After this affair had been long agitated, the ambassadors were on the point of departing, without advancing an inch in the negotiation. They perceived that the new sur-intendant had formed vast projects for the extension of the French commerce, which was altogether inconsistent with the treaty they required: however, they found that the interest of M. Leguier, Tellier, and the marshal Villeroi, might be able to procure their demands under certain modifications and restrictions. In effect, they persuaded the king, that it was for his interest to renew the ancient treaties and alliances with Holland; but Colbert guarded against their proving injurious to the commerce of the kingdom, and the design he had projected of raising the French marine to a respectable footing. The treaty of commerce imported, that all piracies should be checked, and the offenders punished; that the merchants of both nations should reciprocally trade to each other's ports, upon paying a certain duty, without any distinction of commodities, except a whale-oil. Great difficulties arose about the king's guarantying the herring-fishery, which the court knew would give umbrage to the English. Lewis, under pretence that he could not guaranty a contested claim, without expressly declaring against one of the claimants, contented himself with general expressions; but the Dutch ambassadors, sensible that a general guarantee would be useless, made pressing instances that the conditions of the king's protection should be minutely specified. In the end, the treaty was signed upon this footing; but Lewis deferred the ratification <sup>b</sup>.

No sooner had the republic secured her commerce against the attacks of French pirates, by the treaty we have just mentioned, than she resolved to check the insolence of the Algerines, who had committed a variety of depredations on the high seas, confiscated the goods and shipping, and enslaved the subjects of the United Provinces, while the states and they were in profound peace with each other. For this purpose de Ruyter was dispatched to the Mediterranean with a powerful squadron. He fell in with a fleet of eight Algerine pirates, which he dispersed, after taking one, and sinking another. A violent storm, that arose in the middle of the engagement, prevented his destroying the whole squadron. It was upon this he received a challenge from the dey of Algiers, couched in the following terms: "Sir, although we differ in religion, I am in hopes we shall agree with respect to the following proposition, and that you will be ready to grant the demand I hereby make. You have three times given me chace; and if I have avoided fighting, I desire you will not attribute it to a deficiency in courage, but to the inequality of my strength. Mine is only a small bark, your's a large ship, and floating castle. It is for this reason I desire you will meet me upon equal terms, that we may prove our fortune and valour. If you conquer me, I shall be your slave; but if fortune should be propitious to my endeavours, I shall rest satisfied with the glory of victory. Grant me this request; and if I prove backward, rank me among the number of timid spirits. Receive the compliments which I send you." Ruyter accepted the challenge, and appointed the time and place for the engagement; but he heard no more of the Algerine bravo. His constancy on this occasion inspired the Turks with the highest opinion of his courage and generosity. They wished to be friends with the man whom they equally dreaded and admired. The prince of Tunis immediately made concessions; but the Algerines would have persisted in their defence, had their ships been any way proportioned to de Ruyter's strength. This inequality alone obliged them to bend the neck, make apologies for their conduct, give security for their future behaviour, and enter upon the strictest engagements not to molest the Dutch commerce <sup>c</sup>.

EVERY foreign occurrence would seem to heal the divisions in the United Provinces; but this was only a temporary, not a radical cure. It suspended the animosity of the parties, but did not remove the cause of their mutual resentment, which gathered strength from their long continuance. The education of the prince became again the subject of vehement disputes between the provinces of Holland and Zealand. Holland insisted, that, by the Roman law, and the particular laws of the Netherlands, the tutelage of a nobleman, or young prince, rightly belonged to that sovereign power in whose obedience the father of the minor was at the time of his death. They affirmed, that Zealand had no pretensions, either by sovereign right, or testamentary election. The Zealanders replied, that the young prince of Orange was not to be regarded as a mere noble minor, subjected to certain laws, and chambers erected for factoring his estate: the prince's chief territories were situated in Zealand; it was therefore reasonable he should have his education under the direction of that province. This dispute begot other subjects of contention, which greatly disturbed all persons attached to the true interest of their country; though de Wit alone, whose influence was every day increasing, laboured to apply the proper remedies. The dissensions were not confined to Holland and Zealand; they spread themselves to Groningen and Utrecht, and at last terminated in an altercation with the duke of Newburgh, which was soon compromised <sup>d</sup>.

FRANCE and Holland appear at this period to have been under the direction of the same spirit, and to have co-operated in precisely the same measures. There subsisted a thorough understanding between the pensionary de Wit and the count d'Estrades: the letters of the most Christian king are full of acknowledgments of the services done him by the pensionary; and, speaking of the treaty in agitation between the crowns of France and England, he expressly declares, that nothing should be concluded in it contrary to the interest of the United Provinces. But this intimate union was neither formed nor continued without warm opposition and loud clamours. The English and Spaniards had each their faction in the states general, and both joined with the Orange family to distress de Wit, who was thus forced into a dependence on France, by which he triumphed for a time over all his adversaries. Spain, jealous of the growing power of France, laboured to form a fœderal union between the republic and the other ten provinces, for their mutual security. This d'Esstrades traversed with all his address and influence with the pensionary. In consequence de Wit drew up a counter-project, the apparent design of which was to graft a new republic upon the old, though the effect would probably have been to gain France possession of the Ten Provinces, without the trouble, hazard, or expence of a war (A). Lewis, however, was unwilling to be put off with the bare possibility of obtaining what he was now contriving to possess: for this reason he continued the negotiation; but found a variety of pretences to avoid bringing it to an issue. When this could no longer be done, without exciting the jealousy of the states, he laid aside the mask and the project together.

Causes of a rupture between England and the United Provinces.

ALL this while Sir George Downing, the English ambassador, was supporting the negotiations of Gamarra, the Spanish minister, to form the league of the Seventeen Provinces we have already mentioned; but, incensed at the secret transactions between de Wit and d'Esstrades, he had instructions to demand reparation of the injuries done by the subjects of the states to the British commerce. A variety of circumstances indeed contributed to bring on a rupture between the two nations, to which this remonstrance was a prelude. They were rivals in commerce, and open enemies in every emporium of trade on the face of the globe. Reciprocal injuries were committed by fraud and violence, and each in his turn became the aggressor. Holland had, it is true, left unperformed several of the articles of the treaty of peace made with Cromwel; but England had ballanced these by similar neglects. One circumstance indeed highly reflected on the dignity of the British crown; namely, that no satisfaction was yet made for the depredations on her commerce in Asia, or atonement for the massacre at Amboyna, except the unexecuted promise of a trifling sum of money. The Dutch contented themselves with penitential protestations on this head, by which even Cromwel had been duped, and prevailed on to withhold punishment, when he had the whole nation at his mercy: can we wonder if the inconstant, irresolute Charles, with all his natural penetration and good sense, which he never exerted, should be over-reached by their artifice? The Dutch, perceiving the humour of the English, knew that the king would be forced into violent measures: they therefore published a long charge against the English East

(A) As this point is curious, entirely omitted by Dutch writers, and only mentioned by the French, we shall present the reader with an abstract of de Wit's project, which was to the following purpose. First, it was proposed, that endeavours should be used to prejudice the provinces under the dominion of Spain, in favour of a free republic; and that assurances should be given them of powerful succours from France and the republic. Secondly, That the revolution however should be effected by the voluntary consent of the inhabitants, and particularly the magistrates of the cities; and that, for this reason, no violence should be used, or arms introduced into the ten Spanish Provinces, as it was the intention of France and the republic to maintain their treaties with Spain. But in case of the king of Spain's death, then the abovementioned provinces should be cantoned by force, if necessary, and formed into a free republic. Thirdly, That to secure the frontiers of the United Provinces against all foreign powers, all possible efforts should be used, in case the scheme for forming the ten Provinces into a republic succeeded, to put into the hands of the most Christian king the cities and places of Cambray, St. Omer, Aix, Newport, Furnes, Bergues, and Linch, with their depending lordships and counties: and into those of the states general of the United Provinces, the cities, towns, and places of Ostend, Plassendal, Bruges, Danme, Blonquenbergue, with that part of Guelderland now possessed by Spain, the four quarters of Outremuse, and the castles of Navaigne and Argentaer, with their dependencies. Fourthly, That if the proposed scheme of cantonment should succeed, either voluntarily before the decease of the king of Spain, or by compulsion after his death, both sides should heartily labour that the said places be put into the possession of France and the states general respectively, as well for the considerations before alledged, as for several other reasons of importance to the common welfare and peace of both states.

The alterations made by the court of France in this project, had an eye to the succession of the Spanish monarchy, and seemed to foresee what happened many years after, when the partition-treaty and triple alliance were formed, to prevent the enormous growth of France, and preserve a just political ballance in Europe. Here the king already set aside the renunciation made by his queen of her right to the Spanish succession, calling it null and invalid, because extorted from her at Fontarabia, before she came to France. He, besides, accused Spain of a breach of contract, and the non-performance of several of the conditions stipulated between the two courts. He alledged, that these truths were so well known in Flanders, that the principal inhabitants had jointly debated upon the means of defending themselves against the impending evils; and the more prudent had proposed, as the most effectual method, to canton themselves into a free republic, allied to France and the states general. The king, therefore, out of his great moderation, proposed, in case of the king of Spain's death, to wave his just claims in Flanders, and be contented that the people, who ought naturally to be under his government, should become free, and allied to the lords the states general, under his majesty's protection, except only some places, which lay commodious to the king, for protecting the frontiers of his kingdom. To this he desired the assent of the states general, and also their concurrence in preserving the treaties with Spain, during the life of the reigning monarch: and he further added, that, in case the succession of Spain devolved upon his queen, before the inhabitants had taken the resolution of forming themselves into a republic, that then his majesty should be at liberty to possess, for the greater security of his kingdom, such other places as might be thought necessary for the protection of his frontiers, besides those specified in the pensionary's proposal. Such was the ideal scheme planned by M. de Wit and the court of France; from which, however, both sides deduced no other consequences than those which publicly appeared. England got scent of those negotiations, and it proved one cause of the succeeding rupture between that kingdom and the United Provinces; for it was obvious that the execution of such a project would greatly extend the power of France, and prejudice the commerce of Great Britain. Lettres d'Esstrades, March 22, 1663.

- a India company, which likewise answered the purpose of an apology for their own conduct; and this was answered by a paper, proving that the charge was a deliberate assemblage of frivolous pretences, and unjust and insolent demands, made without any regard to honour, truth, reason, or the law of nations. Lists of damages were mutually delivered, which both sides supported by several strong memorials. We have already specified these particulars in the history of the East India companies<sup>f</sup>: it will therefore be unnecessary to say any more here, than that Charles declared to M. Cuneas, the Dutch resident in London, that he would receive no memorials from his hands, as he expected the states would send an ambassador in the manner promised by M. Beverwert, when he took his leave. His majesty, besides, laid a great restriction on trade, under pretence of a plague that raged in
- b Holland; and he considered it as a particular mark of his regard for Amsterdam, that he confined the usual time of performing quarantine to thirty days, instead of forty. The precaution would have been just, had the fact been true; but, in any event, it ought to have been extended to all the other maritime provinces as well as Holland, which, on this occasion, was singled out, in enmity to the pensionary and the states of that province.

- DOWNING*, indeed, by his violent remonstrances to the states, and the partial accounts remitted to England every day, widened the breach between the two nations. He insisted, in his memorials, of restitution of two India ships, called the Bonadventure, and Good Hope, as likewise of several other English ships, rather as scaffolds than the building, as collateral circumstances, but not the main foundation of the proposed rupture. This is
- c obvious, from that treaty concluded the preceding year between the two nations, in which not one of the forty five articles of damages now presented was contained. As to the India ships, the English were left, by agreement, to prosecute their claim; and eighty thousand florins were deposited by the Dutch company, by way of indemnification, should the decision turn out favourable to their adversaries. The Dutch alledged, that the English greatly over-rated their damages, particularly with respect to the India ships. They complained that the demand was exorbitant; but this was only a part of the dispute. Perhaps the real grounds of the war are to be found in the natural interest of both parties in the Guiney trade, and the extension of their commerce in America. Sir Robert Holmes had been dispatched with a squadron to the coast of Africa, to assert the rights of Great Britain,
- d and check the encroachments of the Hollanders. This he executed very effectually, by dispossessing them of Cape Verd, and Cabo de Corso; after which he proceeded in his voyage, and rendered himself master of Nova Belgia, since called New York. These hostilities the Dutch commissaries on the coast of Guiney resented, by detaining the English shipping and merchandise in the ports belonging to the republic. These vessels and effects belonged to the new-established Africa company, of which the duke of York was governor. Downing exclaimed against the insult offered to the king and duke, instead of giving satisfaction for the hostilities which had occasioned this retaliation. It is for this reason we cannot join issue with the English historians, who are unanimous in throwing the whole odium of the war upon the states general: Had they attributed it to Charles's resentment of the unatoned
- e barbarities committed in the East Indies upon English subjects, their plea would have been passable; but to charge the Dutch with being the aggressors on the coast of Guiney, evidently proceeds from natural prejudice, and a superficial enquiry into the facts asserted by both parties, and incontestibly proved by the Hollanders &c.

- The grievances of the Dutch were still greater on the side of America. Hudson, an English captain, had made a descent on the Dutch colonies, situated at the mouth of the river which now bears the name of that officer, towards the north side of the continent of America. This was in the reign of James I. From that time the claims of the Dutch and English were extremely intricate. The situation was too remote to admit of a clear state of the objects in dispute. Mutual hostilities passed, and each endeavoured not only to support
- f but to extend their settlements by force, fraud, and violence. Holmes attacked the Dutch by the king's authority; the Dutch West India company therefore carried their grievances before the states general: but before they could take any measures for redressing them, advice arrived that the English had landed on the island Monchattan, and had made themselves masters of the town of New Amsterdam. Downing not only supported this action, by affirming it was a consequence of the insults offered to British commerce on the coast of Guiney; but he so warmly espoused the interests of Sweden and Denmark, with respect to the Baltic trade, that it was manifest no terms could be long preserved. By this means he had the address to involve the states in disputes with the northern powers, the elector of Brandenburg, and even the French monarch, from whom Sweden received a subsidy. His conduct towards the house of Orange had inspired the elector with a personal animosity to the pensionary of Holland; the same cause had irritated the king of England against this minister; de Wit, therefore, conceived the only method of guarding against the impending a blow was to unite closely with France, and sacrifice trivial claims to the real and necessary protection of that powerful prince. The project with respect to the cantonment of the Spanish Netherlands was again renewed; and the occasion seemed natural, as the king of Spain's life was in great danger, and the infanta labouring under an ardent fever. Matters proceeded so far, that four deputies were sent from the Ten Provinces, to confer upon the subject with M. de Wit. At last, after several conferences and proposals, they were dismissed, without coming to any resolution.

Fresh intrigues with the court of France.

No sooner the project of forming a new republic vanished, than another was substituted.
De Wit laboured to conclude a treaty of partition with France, whereby the house of Austria b should be excluded the possession of the Spanish Netherlands, in case the emperor Joseph married the infanta of Spain. This was no other than a division of the provinces between France and the republic. But several difficulties arose in the execution. A mistake committed by d'Estrades, in decyphering a letter of instructions from his court, had almost broke off the negotiation. The ambassador insisted, that Ghent and Mechlin should be assigned to the king, by which means the frontiers of the republic would be exposed to his mercy; but the king cleared up this blunder, by affirming, that he had never demanded the latter, and that his minister had mistaken the former for Cambrey. Now the greatest difficulty was to engage the deputies of the towns in his design, and this the pensionary effected by a very extraordinary stroke of policy, which, at the same time, displays his knowledge of mankind, and the ignorance of the deputies. He insinuated to them his c apprehensions lest the Infidels should, after conquering the empire, penetrate into the Netherlands, and establish a footing in the vicinage of the republic. The court of France laughed at the wildness of M. de Wit's project; but they were astonished when they perceived the effects, and that he drew from it the very consequence he proposed. He persuaded the deputies of the necessity of entering into a closer alliance with the king, whose power alone could stem the torrent of Turkish conquest, and protect the republic of Hol- land. To carry his point more clearly, under pretence of visiting his uncle, he made the tour of Holland, and conferred in person with all the magistrates, while d'Estrades was taking the same measures in some of the other provinces. A fortunate accident to promote his scheme happened at Constantinople, where the Dutch resident was arrested, because a d
Dutch ship, freighted by the grand signor to Alexandria, had fallen into the hands of the Maltese. Warner, the resident, was at length forced to pay the damages, upon which he was set at liberty. De Wit turned this circumstance to his advantage, and enflamed the people to such a degree, that the states laid an additional duty on all commodities from the Levant, until the losses of the resident should be indemnified. All the magistrates of the principal towns were now unanimously of opinion, that the republic ought to enter into the strictest ties with the French king. Some towns, however, opposed the scheme of a partition of the Netherlands, from an apprehension that this must embarrass the republic with Spain and the emperor <sup>h</sup>.

A. D. 1664.

WHILE things were in this train, the rumour of a treaty between France and England, e and of an armament equipping by the former, said to be against the pontiff, excited jealousy in the states, and even alarmed the pensioner, lest France might have secret designs of becoming entirely master of the Netherlands. The Spanish minister at the Hague likewise propagated a report, that a treaty between Spain, France, and England, was likewise in agitation, which produced an extraordinary effect upon the minds of the people. To this we may add, the revival of the old disputes between the provinces of Holland and the states general, upon the variety of topics already mentioned. Both de Wit and the states began to apprehend they might bewilder themselves in such a labyrinth of intrigues, as should incur the displeasure of all the other neighbouring powers, the emperor, the kings of Spain and England, while they could have no reliance upon the friendship of the French f monarch. This determined the pensioner to act with more caution, and to cast about for the means of avoiding a rupture with England, until the republic was fortified by alliances, or at least secured against the resentment of Spain and the empire. But this point was found impracticable. Hostilities had so long been pursued on the coast of Africa, and in America, that both nations were highly exasperated, and there appeared a necessity of terminating the quarrel by the sword. Walchenberg, director-general for the Dutch East India company on the coast of Guiney, had imprudently, not only in the name of the company, but even of the states general, set forth a claim to the whole coast, and prohibited all other nations from settling in that quarter. The insolence of this order extremely irritated the g English in particular. The affair came before the parliament, and that body resolved, that the wrongs, injuries, and indignities, done to his majesty by the subjects of the United

a Provinces, by invading his rights in India, Africa, and America, and the damages done to the English commerce, were the greatest obstructions to all foreign trade; his majesty was therefore intreated to take speedy and effectual methods for redressing the grievances of the nation, the commons assuring him they would assist him with their lives and fortunes.

NOTWITHSTANDING the zeal of the English parliament, and the mutual resentment of the parties, it was still a doubt whether a rupture might ensue, as de Wit strenuously opposed the coming to extremities. The states, however, determined to provide against the worst, and make the necessary preparations for war. The East India company offered to defend the settlements on the coast of Africa at their own expence, on condition they were ceded to them in form. D'Estrades endeavoured to prevail on de Wit, and the leading perb sonages, to embrace the proposal, as the most certain means of distressing the English, and putting the African trade on a respectable footing; but as Ruyter was now upon that coast with a squadron, the states were willing to be first acquainted with the success of his expedition. Mean time, a squadron commanded by admiral Opdam put to sea, and cruised upon the Flemish shore, to watch the designs of the British fleets; but he could not put a stop to the depredations committed by prince Rupert, who, before war was declared, had taken above an hundred Dutch merchantmen, laden with wine and fruit from Bordeaux, and other French harbours. It was this circumstance that determined the states to send Van Buiningen in quality of ambassador to France, to implore a more effectual mediation than the king's promised guarantee, and to signify, that de Ruyter had been sent to the coast of America not c to attack the ships, forts, and settlements of the English, but to protect the Dutch trade, and regain the losses of the Dutch merchants; an artifice which served only to exasperate the English, who now regarded the whole conduct of the states as insidious and designing. In the beginning of the year they had invited Charles to act, in concert with them, against the Algerines. The king complied, and a squadron was sent to the Mediterranean to join the Dutch. On the meeting of the squadrons, some difference arose about the honours of the sea: Ruyter complained that he was affronted; Lawson, the English admiral, denied it; but the Dutchman, under this pretext, parted company, sailed for the coast of Africa, and reduced all the places lately taken by the English, except the fortification at Cape Coast. He besides battered and seized upon fort Cormantin, which had always been an English settled ment. He also seized upon eight English merchantmen just arrived, and appropriated their cargoes to the West India company. To render their treacherous schemes still more unsuspected, they came to a resolution of communicating to the court of London their intention of sending a small squadron to the coast of America, such as could afford no apprehension that they proposed acting offensively. This, at least, is the charge of the English historians; and indeed it must be confessed, that the conduct of the states was extremely ambiguous; but whether from necessity, irresolution, or design, we cannot pretend to determine.

WHILE Europe was in suspense about the issue of the intrigues carried on in France, England, Spain, and Holland, the Dutch, upon the eve of a war with their great rival in e commerce, were disturbed by some alarms from Denmark, the empire, and the busy restless bishop of Munster. The Danes complained that the Hollanders had monopolized the trade of Africa; and every measure which might accelerate and insure the ruin of the republic was eagerly embraced by the court of London. It was artfully insinuated at Copenhagen, that the states proposed excluding all other nations from any communication with the coast of Guinea; the court of Vienna was reminded of the injuries and oppressions sustained by the subjects of the empire, of the enterprising disposition of the Dutch, and their tyranny over all the petty neighbouring princes; and the bishop of Munster was taught, that now the opportunity offered of revenging himself upon a republic, whose meddling policy had obstructed the accomplishment of his favourite projects. The Danes however f were awed by the importance of the Dutch trade to their dominions, and the revenue arising from the duties they paid in the Sound; the emperor's whole attention was employed on the means of repulsing the infidels: he even went so far as to propose an alliance to the states general, which they rejected, from an apprehension it might give umbrage to the French monarch. As to the bishop of Munster, Downing the English minister found him more ready to listen to his projects. This prelate was now engaged in a controversy about some lands, with the prince of Lichtenstein. The process was determined in his favour by the imperial chamber at Spire; and believing it necessary to profit by this award, the bishop used force, and thereby incurred the displeasure of the states general. He surprised fort Eydeler, garrisoned it, and repaired the fortifications. Alarmed at this prog ceeding, the states complained that their frontier was in danger; and the bishop replied, that the republic had no right to the fort, as her borders were sufficiently guarded by other fortifications. France and Spain wanted to accommodate the difference, and offered a their mediation; but the bishop rejected their offers, relying upon the protection of the emperor, who declared he would suffer no violence to be done the prelate, and the approaching war between England and Holland, which he foresaw would give sufficient employment to the states general.

INCENSED at the interposition of the emperor, and his evident partiality in favour of the bishop, the states presented spirited remonstrances to the court of Vienna, and shewed the necessity they were under of securing the frontiers of the republic, keeping at a distance so enterprising a neighbour as the bishop, and depriving him of his late acquisition. As this produced no effect, they wrote to the bishop, that unless he immediately withdrew his troops, they would march a body of forces to invest Eydeler. The firmness of b the states staggered the resolution of the bishop; he now dispatched an envoy to the Hague, begun a negotiation, and had the address to prevail on the states to recall the prince of Nassau, who was laying siege to the fort. However, the conferences were broke off, the war renewed, and the prince of Nassau sent with an army to lay siege to Wilder-skans, a strong place, before which he died of a putrid fever. We shall have occasion to relate the progress of the war in its proper place<sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 1665.
The situation of the republic
at the commencement of the war with England.

THE situation of the republic was now critical. She was engaged in actual war with a bold, restless, ambitious priest, protected by the emperor, and upon the verge of a rupture with England, the most powerful maritime power in Europe. The king of England, instigated by his brother the duke of York, who never forgot the usage he received at the c Hague during his exile, and was besides inflamed with a violent desire of signaling himself against a republic he mortally hated, had now determined to keep no terms with Holland, and to terminate the differences of the two nations by the sword. Mutual animosity rather than interest actuated both parties. Battles fought on land generally brought some advantage, and acquisition of territory to the victor; but the naval engagements which now cost such seas of blood, produced nothing but glory, and terminated wholly in twining laurels round the temples of a few general officers. Every superiority gained was dearly purchased; and it answered no other purpose, besides the destruction of a greater number of the human species, the sinking, burning, and blowing up of vessels, which had been built at the expence of oppressive taxes upon the subjects. The commerce, d even of the conqueror, must suffer irreparably, where the powers at war are upon a nearly equal footing in strength; and it may be questioned, whether the worst peace between trading nations be not preferable to the most successful war. The states were sensible of this truth, perhaps too late; and after the mutual hostilities committed, had fired both nations to a degree of resentment, not to be appeased but by repeated trials of skill and fortune. The prodigality of the king of England likewise urged him upon this expedient; from the supplies which might necessarily be granted for the prosecution of the war, he foresaw he should be able to withhold considerable sums for the support of his pleasures. Besides, that prince had a taste for ship-building, and a passion for equipping such an armament as should give law to all the maritime powers of Europe. e

NOTWITHSTANDING these obstacles, the states solicited the mediation of France, by means of Van Buiningen, whose vivacity, genius, and oratory, began now to give him distinction, and raise his reputation high in the esteem of Lewis. The French king seemed to yield to the intreaties of the Dutchman, at the very time it was suspected he was supplying his brother the king of England with money to maintain the war, which now appeared inevitable. Another circumstance likewise contributed to render the situation of the republic, with respect to France, very dubious. Several French ships, under various pretences, had been detained in the ports of Holland; particularly five large vessels bought up for the service of the East India company. These the Dutch fitted out for the use of their own company; they were reclaimed by d'Estrades, in divers fruitless memorials<sup>1</sup>; f but the states alledged, that the embargo which the approaching war with England rendered necessary, ought to extend to the shipping of all foreigners. Nothing can be more ambiguous than this conduct: the Dutch were soliciting the friendship of France publicly by their ambassador, they were imploring his mediation between them and the king of England, and yet they were privately taking such measures, as they ought to know must have confirmed France in the interest of their enemies. Such unsteadiness can only be accounted for, by the little harmony that subsisted among the different departments of the republic, and the factions supported by de Wit on the one hand, and the friends of the house of Orange on the other. That minister was fixed in the interest of Lewis, while the opposite party wavered between their respect for England, and the necessity of keeping g upon fair terms with France, at the same time that they secretly obstructed the designs a and projects of the pensioner. This explains the detention of the shipping; a measure merely calculated to traverse de Wit's schemes. The nation in general had no opinion of the sincerity of France; they complained, that Lewis only watched an opportunity of seizing upon the Netherlands, and to gratify his indignation, and stop the cravings of his ambition, they joined issue with de Wit about restoring the shipping; which they did in terms the most honourable and submissive<sup>m</sup>.

NOR was this the only difference between the king and the republic. The dispute about the shipping was no obstacle to the negotiations of Buiningen, who kept his majesty steady in the overtures to England, of his mediation. However, the ambassador, by express order of the states, had given such a turn to affairs as highly displeased Lewis. While they pretended to relax in numberless points, they closely adhered in fact to their old terms, which obliged the king to complain, in the most lively manner, that they trifled with him, by offering to England conditions which that court had frequently before rejected; that, in the present state of affairs, he could not afford the least hope of accommodation; and that, if some proposals were not made relative to the future settlement of trade, he should have reason to suspect their designs were to engross the whole commerce of the world. This did not move the resolution of the states: they knew it was Lewis's interest to support the Louvestein faction against the prince of Orange, who naturally claimed the protection of his uncle the king of England; and, in fact, notwithstanding the firmness of the states, and the many causes of displeasure they had given, Lewis, strongly inclined in favour of the pensioner, and particularly respected the creature of that minister, Van Buiningen. Yet he was apprehensive of declaring against Charles, lest he should throw himself into the arms of Spain, whither that prince had now dispatched an ambassador. To gain time, this politic monarch sent the duke de Verneuil, at the head of a splendid embassy to London, with further orders of mediating a pacification; and the duke continued at that court for several months, though his conferences proved fruitless. The truth is, he found that the republic had not prepared a sufficient fleet to oppose the English; he had been misinformed as to the strength of the Dutch naval armament, and had strongly recommended a defensive war, and keeping close in their harbours. It was matter of astonishment to him, to find that the states had actually in commission a fleet of three hundred men of war, besides traders, yachts, and fireships, manned with twenty thousand seamen. The low condition of his own marine, when compared with that of Holland, made him now regard the republic with more respect. To find that such an armament should be equipped without any noise, or extraordinary means, could not fail to inspire him with sublime notions of her formidable naval power, and the vast extent of her commerce<sup>n</sup>.

WHILE the French king was thus ballancing between England and Holland, the duke of York set sail in the month of May, and cruised for fifteen days before the Texel, during which time he took a great number of the enemy's ships, homeward bound, before the Dutch fleet had assembled. On the duke's return to Harwich, the fleets of Holland and Zealand joined; but they were dispersed by a storm, and several ships forced into the English ports. Again they rendezvoused at the mouth of the Meuse, to the number of one hundred and twenty sail, exclusive of fireships, ketches, &c. under the command of admirals Opdam, Evertzen, Cartemaar, and Van Tromp, son to the celebrated Tromp, who had lost his life in the last war. The utmost resolution and spirit appeared in all the officers and seamen, all emulous of the opportunity of signalizing themselves, and of recovering the lost honour of the republic; for such they deemed the humble supplications made to the usurper Cromwel. The pensioner himself went on board the fleet to acquaint the officers with promises of rewards, and he accompanied it in a yacht for two leagues to sea, where he delivered the order of the states to fight the English at all hazards. Opdam, in compliance with his instructions, proceeded in quest of the enemy; but the wind blowing in such a manner as to give the English the weather-gage, he chose rather to deviate from the orders of the states, and bear away for the Meuse, than risk a defeat by fighting under a disadvantage. His conduct incensed the pensioner, whose interest now predominated in the republic. De Wit had resolved to hazard an engagement, knowing that even a defeat would induce France to declare for the states; he therefore obtained an order, requiring Opdam, under pain of death, to seek out the enemy and give battle. The admiral was piqued at instructions that strongly reflected on his courage: he perceived the orders had been dictated by de Wit, who had become his enemy on account of his attachment to the house of Orange, and resolved to take a glorious revenge, by faithfully discharging his duty, and demonstrating the injustice of the aspersions, and the prejudices of the pensioner. With this view he weighed anchor on the third day of April, and in a few hours fell in with the English fleet, of equal force, and under the conduct of the duke of York, the earl of Sandwich, sir George Ascough, and the admirals Pen and Lawson, who had so eminently distinguished themselves under the protectorate. The fleets met between Yarmouth and Harwich; the engagement began at four in the morning, and both sides maintained it with their usual intrepidity, conduct, and animosity. Opdam is blamed for suffering the English to gain the weather-gage, but unjustly; circumstances would not suffer it should be otherwise, and yet he was under the necessity of fighting. He called a council of war, laid his own opinion before the officers, and shewed them his instructions. "We must, says he, pluck laurel or the cypress; there is no alternative." He would even seem to have some foreboding of the unfortunate event, for he sent all the money back to Holland immediately upon his clearing for battle. Never was a sea-fight more confused or terrible; scarce a ship kept to its proper station, yet all were deeply engaged. Both admirals committed egregious blunders, which they endeavoured to regain by valour. The duke and Opdam, by a reciprocal mistake, fought ship to ship with the most desperate firing. Three persons of quality were killed by the side of the duke of York, and his cloaths covered over with their blood; and soon after admiral Opdam, with a great number of volunteers of distinction, were blown up into the air, and crumbled into ashes. Above six hundred men perished by this accident, which arose from a spark of fire falling into the powder-room. His flag was hoisted by Cartemaar, who was soon killed by a cannon ball, that carried away his leg. Still, however, the battle raged with doubtful event, and it is probable the night would have separated the combatants, had not several Dutch captains withdrawn themselves. They had been promoted, by the interest of the prevailing faction, as spies on the conduct of Opdam, without any regard to merit. Many were deficient in ability, and some in courage. The enemy profited by their negligence, and pushed with redoubled vigour the ships that continued in the line. Evertzen, and even Tromp, defended themselves with the utmost obstinacy; but the former was obliged to shift his flag, and have his ship towed away. This circumstance, and the destruction of several of the ships, either devoured by the flames, or swallowed up by the ocean, first introduced confusion, which was succeeded by an unusual despondency: in a word, the Dutch were defeated with the loss of eighteen ships, either sunk, burnt, or blown up in the action, with near six thousand mariners, besides two of the best admirals in Holland. Van Tromp, however, made an admirable retreat, and by his valour, and the skill of his disposition, prevented the enemy from pursuing a victory they had purchased with the loss of the brave admiral Lawson, two thousand seamen, and seven capital ships.

ADMIRAL Evertzen was the first who brought the report of this defeat to the Brille, where the people were so exasperated as to attempt his life, though they had every reason to approve his conduct. It was with the utmost difficulty he could pass under cover of the night to the Hague, to lay the situation of affairs before the states: his narrative overwhelmed them with consternation. The Orange party demanded an immediate peace with England, and the elevation of the prince of Orange to the stadtholdership. M. de Wit was greatly disappointed in his sanguine hopes of victory. However, he supported his opinions with a resolution, that shewed he was prepared for the worst that could happen. He did not, nevertheless, openly oppose the faction; but he answered their demands, by affirming, that now was the time to expect the open declaration of the French king. He procured an immediate order for Van Tromp to keep the sea, with the remains of the fleet, in order to diminish the glory of the conquerors, sustain the reputation of the republic, and persuade the people that the defeat was less decisive than the enemies of the government had reported. Three deputies were accordingly sent to Tromp; but he refused to run further hazards with officers, in whose skill, courage, or fidelity, he could have no dependence. Upon this several captains were tried for cowardice and neglect of duty; three were shot, four had their swords ignominiously broken over their heads by the common hangman, two were superseded and declared incapable of service, and the chief pilot was sentenced to walk under a gibbet with a rope about his neck, after which he was banished.

By these rigid and just punishments the states gratified the officers of merit, answered the public expectation, and inspired the seamen with a spirit of emulation, a dread of the consequences of neglect, and with respect for the officers promoted in the room of the delinquents. The utmost expedition was used in repairing the fleet, as it was known that the enemy lay in wait for de Ruyter, daily expected from the coast of Africa, with his greatly inferior squadron. The armament was manned with little difficulty, but it was no easy matter to fix upon an admiral every way unexceptionable. Van Tromp had skill, courage, and popularity; he was exceedingly beloved by the seamen, but he had disobeyed the deputies sent with orders from the states. He was besides attached to the house of Orange, a which, in rendering him suspected by the pensioner, proved a great obstacle to his elevation. It was not, however, upon this occasion only that de Wit subjected his private resentments to the public good; he had often raised merit without respect to party, though where an equality appeared in candidates of opposite principles, he gave the preference to the friend of his own faction. Van Tromp was now without a rival in talents, and he was set at the head of the navy until the arrival of de Ruyter, an old officer, of at least equal merit, equally beloved by the nation, and particularly esteemed by the pensioner. In this post he had not continued long, when Ruyter arrived, after having happily escaped under cover of a thick fog. He was no sooner arrived in the port of Delfzil, in Groningen, than the sailors mutinied, insisting upon being set on shore and disbanded, before b any orders came from the states. They were disgusted with the toilsome, tedious, and sickly voyage: they dreaded being immediately again sent to encounter with fatigue and danger, and they pretended they were told that the English had used their prisoners, after their late defeat, with great barbarity. At length the confidence, which the admiral reposed in their honour, the leave he gave them to visit their friends upon their promise to return on the first notice, secured them in his interest so strongly, that not an individual deserted.

THE safe arrival of de Ruyter's squadron diffused the utmost satisfaction and spirits; it was particularly agreeable to the pensioner, whose intention was to give him the chief command of the armament now equipping, and to raise him to the rank of lieutenant-admiral-general. The council of state made the proposal to the states of Holland, who c immediately accepted it, ordering de Ruyter to take the oaths, receive his commission, and enter upon his employment. Tromp complained of the preference given to his rival, and refused to serve in a subordinate capacity; but the states sent orders for the fleet to sail immediately to sea, for Tromp to keep the station appointed him, and denounced vengeance against the least opposition to their will, being determined to pursue the general good, without regarding the humours of party, and of disappointed ambition. So impatient was de Wit for the departure of the fleet, that to accelerate matters he accompanied the other deputies on board, though he exposed thereby his fortune and character to the d censure of his enemies, who did not fail to make a handle of his desertion of his proper business on so critical an occasion. The French king was alarmed at so unprecedented a measure; and his own party imagining he intended serving in the expedition, being left without a head, sunk into despondency. His friends applied to him, and M. de Wit's answer plainly indicated what were his resolutions. He resolved to hazard his life, and replied, "My person and my interest are inseparable from the preservation of the state; a second naval engagement will determine the fate of my country. Tromp has ability " and courage; but he may be wanting in obedience to the orders of his superior, and
" in experience to conduct an important action. The impetuosity and ardor of the officers may blind their judgment and occasion the loss of the fairest opportunities, and " those rivalships may generate divisions; I therefore think my honour, my conscience, e " and my duty to my country, require that I should prevent the fatal consequences either
" of too much pride, or too much valour."

DE WIT's inflexibility raised an universal clamour; he was accused of having brought the republic into the most imminent danger, and then deserting the helm, at the moment his steadiness and ability were most required. At Paris it was believed, that he took this step to avoid the persecution of his enemies. The clergy in Holland, always attached to the house of Orange, declaimed violently from the pulpit against the administration, and the states were under the necessity of prohibiting them to meddle with public affairs: however they still persisted, and some of them were suspended by authority. As an addition to the calamities of the state, a mutiny broke out among the sailors, which could f only be appeased by violent remedies, and the execution of the ringleaders. Afterwards the fleet was detained by adverse winds, shallow water, and other accidents, while the king of England was meditating a project, the success of which must deeply affect the commerce of Holland, and strike at the being of the republic. A vast fleet of East India and Turkey merchantmen, having sailed north-about to avoid the English cruizers, put into Bergen in Norway, where they proposed laying until de Ruyter should conduct them to Holland. It was proposed to the king of Denmark, by the English envoy at Copenhagen, that he should seize upon that rich fleet, by way of indemnification of his losses in the Swedish war, in which the Dutch had involved him. The Northern monarch could not withstand the powerful temptation; but he told the envoy, that though he thought the measure g highly prudent and convenient, he was in no condition to execute so important an enterprise. This was directly his language to the Dutch some years before, when they advised the seizure of the English merchantmen put into Copenhagen, to avoid their squadrons. It was giving the envoy an opportunity of making offers of the king of England's assistance, which which he did not fail to embrace; upon this the bargain was concluded, on condition that the prize should be equally divided. Lord Sandwich had orders to sail immediately to Norway to execute the project; but he contented himself with dispatching part of the fleet, under an inferior officer, who attacked the Dutch with great impetuosity. As the governor of Bergen had not yet received orders to join the English, or even remain passive, he thought himself bound by the laws of nations, to protect a fleet that had taken shelter in a neutral port; accordingly he joined the Hollanders, and gave so warm a reception to the English admiral, as forced him, with considerable damage, to abandon the enterprize; both kings reaping only the dishonour of so base a compact.

SCARCE had the count d'Alfeldt delivered the Dutch merchants from the hands of the English, when he put them in equal danger, by the demand of a large sum of money, by way of indemnification of the damage his Danish majesty sustained upon their account. This unjust claim he was preparing to enforce by violent measures, when, fortunately, de Ruyter arrived, and took them under his protection; upon which the whole fleet set sail for Holland. In the voyage they were overtaken by a violent storm, dispersed, shattered, and some of the ships thrown into the hands of the English, the remainder arriving in a wretched plight, in different parts of the United Provinces. The utmost expedition was used in collecting and repairing the ships, so that in a short time a more powerful squadron than the former put to sea, under the same commanders, and with much the same fortune. A storm arose more furious than before, and drove the admiral back into port with his shattered armament.

NOTWITHSTANDING the elements seemed combined against the republic, the states, encouraged by de Wit, resolved upon one more effort, for fear the English, who had suffered in the same tempest, should have time to refit, or before they could be enriched by captures, and the spoils of the Dutch commerce. The vigilance and activity of the pensioner met with the thanks of the states: he was the actuating spring of every motion, and laboured now with the utmost diligence to strike some decisive blow, which might at the same time silence the clamours of his enemies, and oblige the enemy to listen to reasonable terms of accommodation. It must, however, be confessed, that the terrible plague which was at this time desolating the capital of Great Britain, contributed more to the security of Holland, than all the endeavours of the states and M. de Wit. This dreadful calamity, together with the natural indolence of the king's disposition, damped the spirit of the English, enfeebled every resolution, and infused a languor into the councils of that nation.

WHILE the third expedition was preparing, the states general proposed revoking the commission granted to the deputies de Wit, Huygen, and Boreel, to attend the armament, which they believed dispirited the officers, and rendered men who had not studied the art of war, the chief directors of military operations. This was opposed by the states of Holland, who not only refused to comply with the states general, but confirmed and enlarged the former powers of the deputies: however, as the winter was far advanced, the pensioner resigned his naval employment. Ruyter was recompensed for his services, with a present from the admiralty of Amsterdam, and invited to sit as president of that college, until the season permitted his putting to sea.

ALL this time the king of France kept aloof. He apprehended lest de Wit's party should, in his absence, be forced to sink under the weight and popularity of the opposite faction, now greatly strengthened by the pensioner's quitting his civil employment, to act in a military capacity. Van Buiningen plied his majesty closely, and endeavoured by every artifice to draw France into the quarrel; but could obtain only general assurances, until the arrival of M. de Vaal from Bergen, when he ordered his ambassador to declare to the states, that he was determined to keep up to the conditions of the promised guarantee. To give this declaration the stronger air of sincerity, the ambassador presented to the states a memorial, drawn up by his court, respecting the operations of war, should it be found necessary to come to an absolute rupture with England. Here it was examined whether the war ought to be pushed with vigour, and determined by general battles, or spun out, in order to tire the English nation, and rouse the clamours of the people against the government. Lewis hoped, he said, to become master in the Mediterranean, with a fleet of twelve French men of war, joined by an equal number of the ships of the republic. He proposed blocking up Tangier, now annexed to the crown of England, by the king's marriage with the infant of Portugal, and thereby to disturb and annoy the British trade to the Levant. As to the grand fleets, Lewis proposed maintaining a squadron of thirty-two capital men of war, to act in conjunction with the Dutch fleet, which he expected should at least be as numerous as it was before he entered into a treaty of alliance with the republic. A variety of schemes were likewise proposed for distressing the common enemy; though, in fact, Lewis had not yet finally resolved to break with England, and was actually mediating a pacification, by which a which he hoped to obtain greater advantages than if he came to extremities, and forced Charles into an union with Spain.

In this fluctuating situation was France, upon the return of M. de Wit, and his resuming the employment of pensioner. It soon appeared what the presence of one great man can effect in a state, whose councils are languid, and distracted by opposite opinions and interests. The pensioner no sooner arrived at the Hague than the face of affairs were changed, and fresh vigour and spirit re-animated every department of the republic. The murmurs of party were silenced, and all joined in admiring the activity, the wisdom, the policy, and the sagacity of the pensioner, who now was deemed the life and soul of the states. The enemies of the republic were multiplying; but her resources and strength b seemed likewise augmented by the ardour inspired by de Wit, who made sure that his return would engage France openly to declare against Great Britain. Van Galen, bishop of Munster, excited by ambition, and engaged by a considerable subsidy from Charles II. de- War with the bishop of Mun-
termined to pursue his inflexible animosity to the states. This prelate perceived that the whole attention of the provinces was employed in equipping a powerful naval armament, and that they had neglected repairing and garrisoning their strong holds, in order the more readily to man and fit out their squadrons. In Guelderland and Overijssel the fortifications were totally neglected, and all considerations for so petty, though implacable an enemy, as the bishop of Munster, absorbed in the more important object of a vigorous defence against the powerful monarchy of Great Britain. Van Galen resolved either to profit by this c conjuncture, or to lose his life in the attempt. With this view he made an irruption into the province of Overijssel, at the head of eight thousand men, seizing upon Alenelo, and other places, before any measures were concerted to stop his progress. Berkelo alone made any resistance. Here the commanding officer, after a vigorous defence, capitulated upon honourable conditions, which were little regarded by the bishop, who, as soon as he had it in his power, slaughtered in cold blood the soldiers and burghers, without distinction. Terror diffused itself through all the provinces; and the states of Holland, and the pensioner, laboured diligently to apply remedies to a disorder, observed when too late. New levies were made, a treaty struck up with the duke of Lunenburgh, and instructions sent to Van Buiningen to demand of the French king the six thousand auxiliaries stipulated by d treaty.

EVERY day the bishop was increasing his strength, and acquiring fresh vigour by his successes. Not satisfied with ravaging Overijssel, he meditated an enterprize against the city of Groningen, the capital of a province of that name. Leaving a part of his army to resist the forces raising by the dukes of Lunenburgh, Zell, and the bishop of Osnabrug, he marched into the heart of Groningen, with intention first of surprising Delfzil, in which the English promised to assist him; but a party of his troops being repulsed with loss, by a small corps formed out of the neighbouring garrisons, defeated his design. However, he proceeded, after ravaging the territory of Drent, to lay siege to Groningen, into which the princess of Friseland threw herself and family, to animate the garrison by her presence; a e resolution worthy of the daughter of prince Frederic-Henry of Orange. She had sold her plate and jewels to raise a sufficient body of men for the defence of the city, and took such vigorous measures as retarded the operations of the enemy, and gave time for the Dutch forces and the French auxiliaries to come to her relief. In a word, her attachment to her country prevailed over maternal duty and affection, and she was the instrument of the safety of Groningen, expressly contrary to the commands of the princess of Orange, who wished to see the bishop successful, that the administration of the pensioner might become more odious. On the approach of the allied army, the bishop was forced to raise the siege, retire into winter-quarters, and defer his operations to the ensuing campaign.

LEWIS's first step towards a declaration in favour of Holland, was the body of auxi- A. D. 1666.
f liaries he had sent to check the aspiring views of the bishop of Munster. He now went farther, recalling his ambassadors from England, and taking every measure that portended an entire rupture with that nation. The suspense he was under which faction might prevail, and his high opinion of the wealth, and consequently the power of the republic, occasioned his so long deferring his declaration. He feared driving king Charles into an union with Spain; but he now was more apprehensive of the ruin of the republic, since the real state of affairs had been presented to him by the count d'Estrades, who demonstrated, that the strength of a commercial people was not always to be estimated by their wealth, as the king had always before imagined. It was immediately upon this that he recalled his ambassador from London, and in the month of January declared war against England, g though he never entered heartily into the quarrel, or supported his allies with the expected vigour and spirit. The states found means likewise to engage the king of Denmark in their interest, by virtue of a large subsidy; in consideration of which he obliged himself to maintain a fleet of thirty sail for their service. The judicious distribution of their money had indeed wrought a thorough change in their favour; and the bishop of Münster, who had lately been so formidable an enemy, was now flying before the powers raised against him by the republic. Little confidence however was placed in the doubtful conduct of Lewis, who seemed equally inclinable to serve the states, and avoid entering the lists with Charles. Friends and enemies in vain looked out for the French fleet, to give the English battle, and join the Dutch squadron; but the admiral had the address never to be found, while his court was stipulating with the states about the command of an imaginary junction, and whether it should belong to Beaufort the king's admiral, or to the lieutenant-admiral of Holland. The mode of operations were likewise disputed, and at last each determined to pursue their own particular views and interests, without regard to the common cause. It was the design of the Hollanders to come to a general engagement, to which Lewis was averse, lest his own infant marine might be destroyed, or the English power sustain such a blow as would give too great a naval superiority to the republic.

WHEN the Dutch fleet was ready, Ruyter put to sea, in three divisions, assisted by the admirals Evertzen, Tromp, Meppel, Nes, and Vries, the whole fleet consisting of eighty-three capital men of war, besides the ketches, tenders, and fireships. To prevent confusion, each of these squadrons was subdivided under the conduct of an admiral, the signals were all agreed upon, and in this order they proceeded in quest of the enemy. As to the English, they were equal in number; but the duke of York declined taking the command, because his force would be unequal, should the French fleet join itself to the Hollanders: the command therefore was given to prince Rupert, and the duke of Albemarle, the same officer who had distinguished himself by the name of Monk in the last war. On advice that the French squadron approached, prince Rupert sailed with twenty-five ships in quest of the duke of Beaufort, who was said to be cruising off Belleisle, ready to enter the Channel. By this separation the advantage was greatly on the side of the Hollanders: however, Albemarle bravely resolved upon giving battle; for which purpose he bore down upon Ruyter on the first day of June, with the advantage of the weather-gage. The Dutch admirals, no less eager to engage, split their cables, that they might be the more able to close with the enemy. Both sides were determined to exert their utmost valour; and, indeed, the event left it doubtful which had shewn the most skill, obstinacy, or conduct. The battle began with unparalleled fury, and was maintained with unexampled intrepidity. Tromp and de Ruyter were both forced to shift their flags, because their ships had sustained such damage as rendered them unfit for service. While Sir William Berkeley, an English admiral, sailed with his division into the midst of the Dutch fleet, where, after a gallant resistance, he was killed, and his ship taken; Evertzen was engaged in person with Albemarle, and after an obstinate engagement killed, just as two of his ships blew up. Several ships were sunk and destroyed on both sides; yet the battle raged with unremitting fury, until night parted the combatants, leaving the admirals on either side full of admiration of each others ability, intrepidity, and obstinate resistance.

NEXT day the weather proved more moderate, and the fight was renewed with redoubled violence. Van Tromp, as if the preceding engagement had only whetted his ardor, desperately crowded into the midst of the English, attacking with the utmost efforts of valour, guided by conduct; but his strength proving unequal, he was reduced to the last extremity, when de Ruyter, his mortal enemy, generously came up to his relief, rushed in among the enemy, and brought off his rival in glory and interest, with a dignity of mind that cannot be sufficiently applauded. By this time the Dutch were reinforced with sixteen ships, and the English shattered in such a manner, that not above thirty sail remained fit for action. This determined the duke of Albemarle, who, though in the vale of life, had fought with the fire and ardour of a youthful warrior, to make the best of his way for England, and leave the glory of victory to the Dutch, after he had shewn them how deserving their enemies were of the empire of the ocean. He drew off his fleet in the best order possible, and was closely pursued by de Ruyter, when a calm ensued, that prevented the Hollanders from beginning a fresh attack.

Nor all the horrors of the battle, which was desperate beyond description, could discourage the Dutch: they determined to pursue the advantage obtained by their superiority; while the duke of Albemarle, calling a council of flag-officers, was, by their advice, disposing his fleet in a rear-line of battle, to make a fighting retreat. A breeze springing up about four next morning, Ruyter bore down a third time, and begun the action; when the duke discovered prince Rupert and his squadron to the southward, making all the sail in his power to come in for a share in the action. Immediately he hauled upon a wind to join this

- a seasonable reinforcement, and baffled all the endeavours of Ruyter to prevent their junction, though with the loss of a first rate, commanded by admiral Ayscough, that had the misfortune to strike upon the Gallopers-Sands, where she was surrounded, attacked, and taken, after a vigorous resistance. The endeavours of the several admirals to gain the advantage of the weather-gage, by a variety of different motions, consumed the third day; but on the fourth the battle was again renewed with the same impetuosity, as if all the ships had come fresh to the engagement. Four successive charges were sustained and given by both admirals, who, like Cæsar and Pompey, fought as if the one would not suffer a superior, or the other an equal: at last, a thick fog interposed, under cover of which the English retired; but with so formidable an appearance as gave them some title to dispute the victory, which the Dutch claimed. Ruyter twice broke the enemy's line in the last day's engagement, and obtained immortal honour. During the four days he took eleven great ships, and burnt or sunk an equal number. The slaughter on both sides was prodigious, and hardly a ship of either side escaped undamaged: in a word, it was the opinion of de Wit, who was no friend to the English, "That, if they were defeated, their misfortune redounded more to their honour than all their former victories. No fleet but theirs, after the severe usage of the first day, would have continued an engagement for three successive days longer. Englishmen may be killed, English ships may be burned, but English courage is invincible." Such a testimony from an inveterate and judicious enemy, reflects real honour on the nation (A).
- c THOUGH, in consequence of these bloody engagements, neither the English nor Dutch were able to keep the sea, both had vast resources: they exerted them to the utmost, and both fleets soon set sail as formidable as before. De Ruyter had orders to join the French squadron under the duke of Beaufort, who had artfully suffered the two great maritime powers to weaken each other, before he ventured to engage the king's squadron in the quarrel. Even the English themselves allow, that had he joined de Ruyter when he might, the victory must have been decisive, and the consequence fatal to the naval power of Great Britain, which however was by no means the intention of the most Christian monarch. De Wit applied with his usual activity to repair the fleet; and the great object of the states was to destroy the English shipping, in the docks and yards, in the river Thames. With this intention they set sail on the tenth of July; but some accounts received from England, and the ignorance of the pilots with respect to the soundings, obliged him to lay aside the enterprize. It was next proposed to make a descent on the coast of England, near Harwich; but all the places of debarkation were found so well lined with troops, that this scheme too was found impracticable, and a resolution formed to wait for the enemy, and decide the fortune of war by another general engagement. By the twenty-fourth he fell in with the duke of Albemarle and prince Rupert, who commanded a fleet of one hundred sail, while de Ruyter's did not amount to eighty-two men of war and some fireships. Flushed by the late victory, the van advanced with too great impetuosity, and for a time the battle was maintained with equal zeal, emulation, and spirit; but Evertzen, brother to the admiral of that name killed in the last engagement, was at length surrounded, overpowered, and defeated by Sir Thomas Allen, vice-admiral of the white, with the loss of three inferior admirals, and dreadful slaughter of the seamen. Van Tromp, in the mean time, engaged and defeated Sir Jeremy Smith, admiral of the blue squadron; but, pursuing the chase too eagerly, he was entirely cut off and separated from the center, where the battle raged with unparalleled fury between de Ruyter and the duke of Albemarle. Here Ruyter sustained for three hours the utmost efforts of the whole British fleet, maintained the fight with seven ships only in the line, and at last yielded the victory, not until his men were so wounded, faint, and exhausted, as to be unable to work the ships, and keep up a continued regular

(A) Though bonfires were made in London, and thanksgivings for the victory ordered to be observed in all the churches, candor must confess, that victory declared clearly on the side of Holland, though obtained with the most terrible carnage. Three admirals and seven captains were killed; above two thousand seamen were thrown dead into the sea, to clear the decks, and a greater number were wounded. They had no ships taken by the enemy, but seven were sunk, or otherwise destroyed, and the whole miserably shattered. Ruyter and Van Tromp had shifted their flags to six different ships; but the trophies which they earned were thought a full recompense of all the danger and labour they had undergone. Lord Arlington, the English secretary of state, in fact, acknowledges that the king's fleet was defeated.

In a letter to Sir William Temple he expresses himself thus: "Neither do I take pleasure in repeating any thing of this engagement. This advantage, I am sure, they had of us, that they have carried home their trophies; whereas we have not one, what we took being all drowned or burnt." He might have added still more indisputable proofs, though this testimony from a minister will alone appear sufficient. As to what bishop Burnet and other writers alledge, of the pensionary de Wit's being in the engagement, it has no foundation in truth. The pensionary, indeed, visited the fleet before it set sail; but the clamours raised against his last expedition, deterred him from repeating the experiment.

fire. It was now only he made that signal to retreat, which was readily observed by all the fleet, which was saved from destruction by the seasonable calm that ensued. De Ruyter's disposition, however, was so excellent as to deter the victors from pursuing; and indeed his conduct through the whole action was so cool, resolute, and determined, that even his defeat added lustre to his former glory. Had he been duly supported by Tromp, the victory would at least have proved doubtful. a

Now the English crowded in pursuit of Van Tromp, who had been separated from the main fleet ever since that desperate effort by which he broke through their line. They discovered him near Harwich, and attacked him with vigour; but that gallant officer sustained the shock with such admirable firmness as foiled all attempts, and enabled him to retreat with little loss to the Texel: notwithstanding which loud complaints were made by Ruyter to the states, that the loss of the battle was owing to his rashness and misconduct. b The number of killed and wounded was very considerable on both sides: some writers allege, that the Dutch lost above two thousand men, besides three admirals. How warmly Ruyter had been engaged, we may judge from the loss on board his own ship, in which two hundred men were killed, and near an equal number wounded. Twelve captains were besides slain, and seven ships sunk and destroyed, but none taken. Upon the whole, we may judge of the certainty and value of the victory to the English by its consequences. The Dutch took sanctuary in their ports, before which the enemy rode in triumph, terrifying their coasts, and interrupting their commerce. The late rejoicings of the states were turned into mourning; and as the expectations of the populace are always sanguine upon every instance of prosperity, their clamours and discontents rise in proportion upon any change of fortune. To embarrass the government still more, the animosity between the two best admirals of the republic broke out with redoubled violence; their resentments were now implacable, and their hatred mortal. The seamen likewise, entering into the quarrel of their commanders, formed two opposite factions, came to blows, and threatened the dissolution of the government. Tromp was supported by the house of Orange, and greatly beloved, on account of his generosity and valour, by all the seamen; yet had the states courage enough to supersede him, and prosecute his family for a paper they published in his justification, because it reflected on their conduct. The French king, however, did justice to his merit, by sending him the order of St. Michael, his picture finely set with diamonds, and a letter of compliment wrote with his own hand, testifying his sense of that gallant conduct which had brought off a small squadron of no more than eight ships, though furiously attacked by thirty ships of the enemy. It was nevertheless true, that his impetuosity in the beginning of the action had occasioned the succeeding misfortunes, though he now gloriously effaced that error. In his defence he says, "I cannot suffer de Ruyter, actuated by envy and animosity, to stain my honour with so disagreeable a reflection, as to attribute the enemy's success to my wilful misconduct. Errors I may have committed; but my private resentments shall ever yield to the interest of my country. The most glorious triumph I could wish over my rival, would be to approve myself worthy of his esteem and gratitude." c

MEANTIME M. Buat, a discarded domestic of the prince of Orange, had, by the instigation of lord Arlington, the English minister, entered into secret measures for concluding a peace, separating France from Holland, and restoring the prince of Orange to all the honours held by his ancestors. This plot was discovered by a blunder committed by Buat, who, instead of another letter, delivered lord Arlington's to the pensionary. De Wit was astonished with the contents, which were afterwards confirmed by Buat, who was seized, imprisoned, and tortured. While he was upon the rack, he named above sixty accomplices, some of them the principal personages in Holland; but it was thought proper to wink at his information, and attribute it to the criminal's desire of saving his own life, many of the persons pointed out having great influence and popularity. In the end, Buat suffered upon a public scaffold, and the plot was suppressed. d

To fill up the measure of the calamities of the republic at this period, a detachment from the English fleet entered the road of Vlie, under Sir Robert Holmes, piloted by a Dutch skipper, and burned one hundred and forty merchantmen, two men of war, and a village on the coast (B), the whole damage being computed at six millions. It is the opinion of some writers, that this enterprize formed a part of the conspiracy for which Buat was executed; but the conjecture is rejected by the best historians. The merchants, on whom this immense loss fell, raised loud clamours against the government, and endeavoured to e of Schelling, a rich, populous, and flourishing place, containing above a thousand families, all of which were

- a stir up the people to revolt. The Orange faction reared up her head; and it was natural to expect that the republic, overwhelmed with such a torrent of misfortune, would now have humbled herself, and implored a pacification; but the spirit of de Wit was invincible, and the resources of his genius inexhaustible. He applied himself diligently to the means of quieting the seditions in the provinces, and the factions in the government, in order to prosecute the war with vigour. In this design he gained the provinces of Holland and Zealand, and paid little regard to the murmurs of the other provinces, as they contributed but little towards the public expence. He approved himself master of the art of governing parties, by a due attention to their passions and interests. By the proper and judicious distribution of a large sum of money, he appeased all the mutineers in the fleet, and the
- b discontents among the seamen; while d'Estrades, the French minister, was no less successful in his practices upon the states. Had the court of France intended the destruction of the republic, as is intimated by some writers, it needed only to withdraw her countenance upon this occasion. The very existence of the states depended on the pleasure of Lewis; his sentiments determined the fortune of the whole nation. It was his policy, however, to preserve a rival to the maritime power of England: accordingly, the king no sooner received advice of the defeat of the Dutch fleet, and the dispirited condition of the government, than he determined to risque his infant naval force, the first and dearest child of his policy, reared by the hand of the sage Colbert. The duke de Beaufort now had express orders to join the Dutch fleet, and to act in the most vigorous manner against the common enemy.
- c Accordingly he returned to Rochelle, there to wait the proper opportunity of effecting a junction, as soon as the allies of France should be ready to put to sea. M. Bellefonte was dispatched to the Hague, to concert with the pensionary and the count d'Estrades the most probable means of accomplishing this delicate and important measure, with the utmost safety and expedition; yet, after all, de Wit harboured suspicions of the French sincerity, and a warm altercation passed between him and M. de Lionne.

- THESE disputes did not divert the pensioner's attention from the principal object. The fleet was refitted by his indefatigable diligence in an incredible short time. It put again to sea under de Ruyter, with instructions to cruise between the streights of Dover and the mouth of the river Thames, to watch every motion of the English, until it was certainly
- d known in what manner the French king intended to dispose of the duke de Beaufort's squadron. Ruyter set sail on the tenth of September, and had no sooner arrived at his station than prince Rupert's fleet was descried at a distance, bearing down full sail before a favourable gale. The Dutch writers alledge, that de Ruyter had thrown out the signal to engage, and his ships were clearing for that purpose, when the interposition of night, and abating of the wind, obliged prince Rupert to retire. Others go so far as to affirm, that his disposition disconcerted the prince, forced him to retire, and gave Ruyter an opportunity of clearing for several hours; the very contrary of which is reported by English historians. It is certain that a storm came on, which damaged both fleets considerably, and reduced the Dutch admiral to take shelter in St. John's road, near Boulogne. Here he was
- e seized with a fever, and the whole fleet grew sickly; upon which the states sent orders for him to return to Holland. As to the duke of Beaufort, he sailed up the Channel as far as Dieppe, upon a supposition that the Dutch were still in the neighbourhood of Boulogne; and finding his mistake, directed his course to the coast of Britanny, where three ships in the rear of the squadron fell in with the English, maintained an obstinate engagement, and were defeated with the loss of one man of war.

- It was upon the return of the fleet that the states resolved to send three deputies on board, with full powers to regulate the naval operations, with the assistance of a council of the principal officers. The provinces of Zealand and Friseland, which were each to send a deputy, disapproved of the measure. This determined M. de Wit, nominated by Holland,
- f to charge himself with the whole care and conduct of the armament. On his arrival he found Ruyter in so bad a state of health, that he was sent to Amsterdam, where he remained until the month of September. However, the fleet proceeded to sea, under admiral Van Nes, subject to de Wit's orders, arrived on the coast of England, with intention to fight the enemy, and was a second time driven back by a furious tempest, which occasioned the French king to complain that his squadron was exposed to the mercy of the English. In fact, however, the English were incapable of embracing the opportunities that offered. A terrible fire had destroyed great part of the capital; public credit was affected; universal despondency seized the minds of the people, and all was fear, suspicion, distrust, and dissension, the ministry and the nation being divided among themselves. The conflagration,
- g which had destroyed above six hundred streets, was supposed to be the effect of malicious design, and erroneously attributed to the Roman Catholics and the Republicans, as the stream of faction happened to be directed. Hence arose the jealousies and dissensions we have mentioned, which were augmented by the disturbances in Scotland, arising from the persecution of the Presbyterians in that kingdom, and the decline of parliamentary complaisance for the king and ministry. This situation of the British nation was the great security of the republic. Charles, now tired of a war grown irksome to the nation, from which he had not reaped the proposed private advantages, made overtures of peace, and the king of Sweden offered his mediation. Yet still he kept in view the antient pretensions of his crown, and the indemnification required at the commencement of the rupture, for the damages done his trading subjects in India, and elsewhere. He demanded that the states should send their deputies to London, to adjust the preliminaries of a peace. Other marks of submission were besides required, which produced various opinions in the provinces. Some asserted, that the advantages gained by England were not so considerable as to give them a right to dictate; while others thought those instances of an assumed superiority and pride of too little consequence to obstruct a necessary accommodation. The states however declared, that they had no objection to the proposal of holding the congress at London, but the consideration for their allies the kings of France and Denmark, who refused to treat in any part of England. Several towns of Holland and Zealand were earnest for a congress, without regard to punctilios; but de Wit found means to secure the states, and exerted his utmost influence with the court of France to keep her firm in the alliance, and difficult with respect to the terms of negotiation. Lewis, however, had now sufficiently established his credit in Holland, and disappointed the extensive schemes of England. Growing jealous of lord Sandwich's negotiation at Madrid, and that an union between Spain and Great Britain might take place, he resolved to establish peace; and for this purpose not only recommended, but enjoined the states, not to be too delicate about formalities. Nor was this all; he permitted Ruvigny to correspond with the earl of St. Albans, to bring the court of London to the most pacific dispositions; with which view a letter was directed to that nobleman, in such terms as should excite the jealousy of the Hollanders. However, that the states might have no reason to tax the king of France with duplicity, the letter was first communicated to the pensioner, and he found it so general and ambiguous, that it was impossible to make objections. On receipt of Ruvigny's letter, the earl of St. Albans signified to the court of France, that his Britannic majesty was not averse to treating in a neutral place, provided France would preserve a neutrality. The English ministry took advantage of this clandestine correspondence to insinuate notions, that his most Christian majesty was treating without the participation of his allies. This alarmed the provinces in general, and especially the towns and cities of Holland, who cried out, that the republic was betrayed. To refute the report, and stop the torrent of abuse thrown out in Holland against the insidious conduct of his ministry, the king ordered the count d'Estrades to give the states the most solemn assurances of his resolution to adhere strictly to the terms of his alliance, though he was desirous of effecting a peace, in which he should chiefly have an eye to the good of the republic.

A. D. 1667.

In the mean time the king of England, as if perfectly satisfied with the apology made by the states for declining to open the congress in London, immediately veered round, and offered to treat of preliminaries at the Hague, where the ambassadors of the allies then resided. This motion gave the alarm to M. de Wit and the French party, who concluded that it must imply some deep and dangerous scheme to divide the republic, and dissolve the confederacy. The proposal immediately begot dissension, no less than four provinces taking the occasion of expressing their animosity to the pensioner. To oppose so growing and imminent an evil, the utmost address of the French and Dutch ministry were necessary. It was not thought advisable to shew any suspicion of the king of England's design: a letter was therefore sent to him from the states, recommending the choice of Maestricht, Boisleduc, or Breda, for holding the congress, as more convenient and secure than the Hague, which, being an open town, afforded no protection to the ministers of the different powers; that consequently, while those powers were at variance, they were exposed to a variety of fatal accidents, too many melancholy instances of which had already happened, in violation of justice, and defiance of government. They concluded with thanking his majesty for the honour intended them, which they were obliged to decline, for the considerations mentioned. To this letter from the states to the king of England, succeeded one from the French king to the states; in which he enlarges upon the danger, to a popular government, of admitting the ministers of an hostile prince, who would not fail to raise suspicions, foment divisions, and promote cabals, among a people equally open to the impressions of a false and real suggestions. Afterwards he proceeds to recommend Dover, as a place not improper for carrying on the negotiation; though it appears, from Lionne's letter to d'Estrades, that the court was sensible that the proposal would not be relished in England.

It was plain, from the strange conduct of Lewis, that he must have farther designs than mere friendship to the states; and indeed the Orange faction began thus early to declare their suspicions, that he would approve himself more dangerous as an ally than he could as an open enemy. The pensioner was, perhaps, not blind to the motives of the French king; but he was now deeply engaged with that prince, and his countenance afforded the best support against the house of Orange, bent upon his ruin. It was visible indeed to all Europe, that the court of France was paving the way for the execution of their schemes upon Flanders. The emperor, who had a reversionary claim to this fine country, began likewise to think it his interest to interpose in the quarrel of the two maritime powers. In pursuance of this opinion, the baron d'Isola was dispatched to the court of London, under pretence of offering his imperial majesty's mediation; though it is probable the real business was to dissuade Charles from an accommodation, as Lewis would thereby have less leisure to pursue his ambitious projects. Some attribute to this consummate politician the proposal made by Charles of opening the congress at the Hague; and, indeed, he could not have formed a more effectual measure for keeping up the resentments of both nations, and frustrating the pacific intentions of the more moderate and prudent members of either state. The superficial politicians regarded it as the highest compliment ever paid to the states, to have the honour of bringing the ambassadors of the three greatest powers in Europe to treat of peace in the dominions of the republic; while the more discerning viewed the overture in a very different light. Even the first mention of the proposal set the provinces at variance; Holland and Friseland positively refusing to furnish their contingents, if it were rejected<sup>a</sup>. At length Breda was fixed upon, all parties agreeing that the conferences should be opened in this city; and thither the several parties sent their plenipotentiaries.

THE first point debated at the congress was the restitution of the two English ships, Congress at Breda. which had partly given birth to the war; and of the island of Polemon in the East Indies, which had been first violently wrested from England, then restored by a subsequent treaty, and now retaken since the commencement of the present rupture. Upon this Charles insisted as an essential preliminary; but the Dutch deputies appearing determined in their refusal, he relaxed in the last article, and thought there would now occur so little difficulty, that he looked upon the peace as in a manner concluded. Full of these sentiments, and eager to appropriate to his own use the sums granted by parliament for the prosecution of the war, he ordered all his large ships to be laid up and unrigged, keeping only a small squadron of cruizers for the protection of the coasts. Of this precipitation de Wit resolved to make his advantage, retrieve his own reputation with the republic, and oblige Charles to make peace upon such conditions as should be thought requisite for the honour and security of the republic. While he cruized the preceding year upon the English coast, he had taken care to have the mouth of the Thames exactly sounded, with a view probably of pushing his way into that wealthy river, whenever an opportunity should offer. Now he determined to execute his project, and to attend the expedition in person. France disapproved his quitting the helm of state to direct warlike operations; and the arguments urged by d'Estrades prevailed on the pensioner to substitute his brother, Cornelius de Wit, in his room, to assist de Ruyter to regulate and determine his motions. The fleet set sail from the Texel in the beginning of June, and was hardly out of sight of the coast when it was driven back by a furious tempest, in which four transports filled with soldiers perished. The Dutch enter the river Medway. When the storm abated, Ruyter again set sail with a fleet of fifty large ships, besides frigates and transports, steering directly for the river Thames, at the mouth of which he arrived on the tenth of June. He began his operations with reducing Sheerness fort, which he effected with little difficulty. Next he broke down a strong boom, laid across the mouth of the river Medway, and destroyed three guard-ships, moored within side for its protection. M. de Ghent, advancing in boats as far as Rocheester, burnt and carried off a great number of small vessels, which rode in the river without apprehension of danger. De Ruyter cleared a passage through some vessels which had been sunk, by order of the duke of Albemarle, in the Channel: then sailed up as far as Upnor-castle, which he took and demolished. His last exploit was the burning three ships of the line, in executing which he met with an obstinate resistance; and then he fell down the Medway, with intention of attempting the river Thames<sup>b</sup>.

THE sailors, who had escaped the conflagration at Chatham, spread the alarm through a London, and filled that capital, not yet recovered from the dreadful devastation made by fire the preceding year, with consternation. Troops immediately filed off towards Gravefend, ships were sunk at Woolwich and Blackwall; platforms were raised in different places, and mounted with artillery; the train-bands were drawn out, and the city put into the best posture of defence that circumstances would admit. Yet it must be confessed, that, after all the preparations made, nothing could have prevented de Ruyter from pillaging and destroying the most flourishing city in Europe, besides the want of a sufficient number of boats, and of land-forces. Without these he found it impossible to succeed, and therefore set sail for Portsmouth, which he attempted in vain to reduce: then he directed his course to Torbay, where he made prize of a great number of vessels, with which he proceeded to bombard Plymouth. This enterprize failing, he sailed up the Channel, insulted Harwich, gave chase to a squadron commanded by Sir Edward Spragge, once more entered the Thames, and overwhelmed the whole kingdom in terror and confusion: after which glorious exploits he returned to Holland, where he was presented by the states with a rich gold cup, upon which was engraved the actions at Sheerness, Chatham, and Upnor-castle. He made a kind of triumphal entry at Dort, amidst the acclamations of the people, the roar of cannon, and the blaze of bonfires, attended by all the magistrates, and supported by the two oldest burgomasters. De Wit met with the same honours, and had besides the particular thanks of the states general. Nor was M. Van Ghent, the lieutenant-admiral, forgot. He had the thanks of the states, and a cup of gold, with his own exploits engraved round his arms. b c

THE kings of England and France equally exclaimed against this expedition, while the English nation was fired with indignation at seeing itself exposed to the insult of an enemy to whom it had always given law. Charles complained, that the Dutch, taking advantage of his security, ravaged his coasts with the utmost barbarity, while he was treating of peace with them in a friendly manner. He alledged, they had violated the faith of treaties, though, in fact, no armistice had been agreed upon. On the other hand, Lewis disapproved of an enterprize which tended to retard the pacification; and at the same time reproached, by implication, his bias towards the interest of England, and little regard to the alliance contracted with the republic. It was obvious, however, that this expedition, instead of retarding, served actually to accelerate the pacification. The power of de Ruyter's squadron, the bad terms upon which the king of England stood with his subjects, and the defenceless state in which he left the nation by laying up all the large men of war, obliged him to set aside all airs of superiority, and treat with the Dutch deputies upon a footing of equality. By this means every difficulty vanished, and the peace was signed upon the following conditions: that Acadia should be yielded to the French king, who had agreed to restore to the English the island of St. Christopher's, and some other considerable conquests he had made in the West Indies: that England and Holland should reciprocally retain their acquisitions, by which means the colony of New York in North America remained with the former, and the island of Poleoron, one of the Moluccas, with the latter. d e

The rights of the flag were the most difficult to adjust: though merely titular, it was thought of more importance than even the real advantage of additional territories. France was so sensible of the consequences of these honours, that she now insisted upon being equalled with the two great maritime powers. Lewis refused to suffer his men of war to lower their topsails to those of England. Charles pleaded his right to this mark of regard. Both were obstinate; and, to avoid its breaking off the negotiation, this article was omitted in the treaty, whence violent contentions some years afterwards ensued.

WHILE France, England, and Holland, were negotiating at Breda the tranquillity of Europe, Lewis was meditating the execution of a project, which, by aiming at universal empire, again threatened to involve Christendom in the flames of war, and particularly the empire, Spain, and the United Provinces. His ambition grasped at every thing, and his power enabled him to gratify every aspiring wish. On the death of his father-in-law Philip IV. he prepared to invade the Netherlands, though, before the solemnization of his marriage, he had formally renounced all pretensions to the Spanish succession. His claim was examined by the clergy, and pronounced legitimate; and their decision was supported by the secular arm, and M. Turenne at the head of forty thousand men. Already Aeth, Lisle, Tournay, Courtray, Charleroi, and Oudenarde, confessed his power, by receiving his garrisons; and Lewis waited only for the death of the sickly Charles II. of Spain, to lay claim to the whole monarchy. Every state in Europe took the alarm. The Dutch, from the nature of their situation, were immediately exposed to his designs: they wished for nothing more than an opportunity of uniting with England in a confederacy, that should be able to oppose a sufficient barrier to the soaring ambition of the French monarch. Now, when

Peace concluded at Breda.

- a when too late, the artifice of Lewis's friendship was discovered : still, however, the states A. D. 1668. imagined they could prevail on him to adhere to the moderate terms he had often promised ; and that by ceding Courtray, St. Omer, Aire, and Franche Comté to France, the rest of the Netherlands might be put under the protection of the empire, England, and the republic. It was the Dutch that suggested the idea of the triple alliance, which took place soon after. The king of England, finding his credit on the wain with his subjects, willingly embraced any measure that was likely to retrieve his popularity ; and no scheme promised so fair as his becoming the head of a league, formed in support of the liberties of Europe. The court of Spain too was indefatigable in her endeavours to raise a powerful confederacy against Lewis : though she entertained the highest opinion of her own strength, and the courage and ability of her forces ; yet it was impossible to avoid seeing the superiority of the French, as far as could be judged from the most rapid successes. The Spanish ambassadors represented to Holland the proximity of the danger, while they flattered England with the glory of holding the balance of power. True policy, indeed, required that a barrier should be formed to stop the progress of Turenne ; and with this view it was that the triple alliance was formed, by the address of Sir William Temple, who subdued all the scruples of M. de Wit, the pensioner, with a facility that will ever bear ample testimony to the abilities of that elegant and refined statesman. At first, England and Holland were only the contracting powers ; but Sweden soon acceded to the treaty as a principal. Then the confederates assumed to themselves the office of arbiters in the differences between France and Spain, with respect to the Low Countries. They even pretended to take cognizance of the dispute between Spain and Portugal. The object was to restrain the power of Lewis, support the tottering Spanish monarchy, and prevent the direful consequences of a war, in which all Europe would probably be involved <sup>a</sup>.

- The next step was to repair the fortifications of the frontier towns, and to set the army upon a respectable footing. For some years all military employments were held by the children of burgomasters, because they were generally in the interest of the pensioner ; while the old experienced officers were laid aside, on account of their attachment to the prince of Orange, under whose ancestors they had acquired all their knowledge. The bishop of Munster's late invasion convinced the people, that troops ill commanded were perfectly useless : they therefore began to clamour about the distribution of commissions ; and to insist that all the old officers should be restored to their employments, and promoted, as if they had remained constantly in the service. It was with reluctance the pensioner had yielded to the necessity of the late treaty concluded against France : the blow now meditated struck deeper at his power, and tended obviously to change the scale in favour of the opposite faction. It was impossible, however, to stem the tide of popularity : he therefore determined to divide its force, and, by making it flow in different channels, weaken its influence. With this view he united all the republicans in the opinion, that the chief command of the army should be conferred on a foreigner, notwithstanding this preference was offering the greatest injury to prince Maurice of Nassau, to whose valour, conduct, and fidelity, there could be no reasonable objection. After violent contentions, the command was divided among a number of officers, by which both parties were in some measure gratified.

- As the triple alliance was formed merely to oblige Lewis to execute the proposals he had made to the court of Spain, of relinquishing the rights of his queen, provided the Spaniards would either consent to his keeping the conquests he had already made in the Low Countries, or in lieu of those cede to him the Franche-Comté, with the towns already specified ; the queen-regent of Spain kept aloof, in expectation of engaging the Dutch and the king of England in a war with Lewis, under pretence that he refused standing by the alternative which they guaranteed. But finding herself disappointed in this hope, she consented to his retaining his conquests, on the supposition, that, should he ever attempt to extend them, he would necessarily engage the enmity of the two maritime powers. This cession paved the way to a congress, which was immediately appointed at Aix-la-Chapelle. We have already specified the particulars of this treaty <sup>b</sup>. It will therefore be sufficient to observe, that the Dutch ordered a pompous medal to be struck, in which they arrogated to themselves the whole honour of having given peace to Europe <sup>c</sup> (A). (A) This medal is preserved by M. Le Clerc. Here Holland is represented by a young beautiful female figure, surrounded by trophies, holding in her hand a pike or javelin, the one end of which is adorned with a hat, as an emblem of Liberty, and the other with the republican arms of the United Provinces. On the reverse thing could be more absurd than such an instance of unnecessary vanity, at a period too when de Wit was proposing a new alliance to d'Estrades between France and the republic, jointly to oppose the pretensions of his Britannic majesty to the sovereignty of the ocean, and to oblige his ships to pay the due honours to the French flag. To facilitate this measure, which must have inevitably kindled a new war with England, he reminded the French minister of the conduct of the English admiral, Sir Thomas Allen, towards de la Rooke at St. Helen's; an indignity, he said, which, if winked at, would encourage that proud nation to commit further insults. D'Estrades supported this opinion, and represented to his court, that nothing but embracing the proposal could prevent the pensioner's being forced into the interest of England, however contrary to his resolutions, and disagreeable to his sentiments and inclinations. How far M. de Wit was serious in this proposal, can only be conjectured: perhaps he had already reason to suspect that Charles was falling into his old bias of cultivating the closest union with France. This might therefore be either an expedient to sound the dispositions of Lewis, or frustrate the overtures made by the king of England. Be this as it may, it is certain that Lewis allowed little weight to the request of the pensioner, though supported by all the arguments his own ambassador d'Estrades could urge. On the contrary, he sent M. Colbert de Croissy, brother to the celebrated minister of that name, his ambassador to the court of London, and recalled d'Estrades from the Hague: yet the harmony between England and Holland still subsisted. Sir William Temple was dispatched to the states, vested with a higher character than he had formerly borne, not only to give the strongest assurances of the continuance of the king of England's good intentions towards the republic, but to negotiate a treaty of commerce, and concert a treaty of guarantee, on the plan of the late triple alliance <sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 1669.

FRANCE was quick-sighted in discerning her own interest, and alert in pursuing it. The acquisitions which Lewis had made in Flanders, served only to inflame his ambition to possess the remainder of that valuable country, and particularly the Franche-Comté, the very name of which district seemed to give him a kind of claim. His views were to dissolve the triple alliance, as a necessary prelude to his other designs; and Spain, by refusing to pay the Swedish subsidy, furnished the means of accomplishing this important affair. Such progress indeed had Colbert made at the court of London, that M. Puffendorf, the Swedish ambassador at the Hague, acquainted the pensioner, as early as the month of January, 1669, that England was already changed, with respect to all those councils she had formed in conjunction with Sweden and Holland, notwithstanding the secret was yet in few hands; and lord Arlington confessed, about the same time, that a rumour was prevalent about court, that the Swedes were gained over to the French interest. This intimation was followed by a variety of circumstances, which more plainly indicated the designs of his Britannic majesty. Besides the refusal of a proposal made by the states of a defensive and offensive alliance, Sir William Temple was suddenly recalled; and, as if the king had sought an opportunity of coming to a rupture, orders were given to the captain of the yacht, sent for lady Temple, to sail through the Dutch fleet, then in the Channel, insist on the admiral's lowering his topsails, and continue firing upon him until all due honours should be paid to the British flag. It is evident, that Lewis had now fully digested his project to invade the Netherlands; that he had gained the king of England, whose necessities made him the pensioner of France; and that these instructions to the captain of the yacht were intended as a plausible excuse to the nation for entering upon a war, equally unjust, unnecessary, and imprudent. Lewis practised the most insinuating arts to seduce Charles from his real interest, to engage him as a tool in aggrandizing the French monarchy, and blind him to the consequences of his ambitious projects. Besides the private subsidies remitted to support the king of England in his extravagant pleasures, the duchess of Orleans was sent to England, upon a visit to her brother, where she spent a fortnight in a continual round of diversions. She was accompanied by mademoiselle Queroüaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty, bewitching address, elegant accomplishments, and a fund of wit and vivacity sufficient to engage a heart more insensible reverse is the following inscription: 'After having confirmed the laws, reformed the abuses in religion, assisted, defended, and conciliated kings, secured the liberty of the ocean, established by valour and dint of arms a glorious peace, restored tranquillity to Europe, the states general of the United Provinces have ordered this medal to be struck, in the year 1668.' This pompous inscription gave equal offence to the kings of France and England; but what chiefly incensed

Lewis, was the insolence of Joshua Van Buiningen, the Dutch plenipotentiary at the congress. This minister had the weak vanity to have a medal struck, in which he compared himself to Joshua stopping the course of the sun, which was the device of the French monarch. This fact we have upon the authority of the best French and English writers, though Le Clerc omits the medal in his curious historical collection.

a than that of Charles. This lady was carried with him to London, created duchess of Portsmouth, and retained in the highest favour during the whole course of his life, suffering her to govern his conduct with a sway that rather proved him the tender lover than the prudent monarch. It was by means of this artful visit, and the address of mademoiselle Querouaille, that Lewis first gained the intire ascendant over his Britannic majesty, and made him the instrument of those bonds he was forging for the liberties of Europe <sup>a</sup>.

Thus stood affairs when Sir George Downing, less beloved by the pensioner, less in the friendship of the states, and the interest of the republic, was sent to Holland to succeed Sir William Temple, and probably to complete the rupture begun by the captain of the yacht, b who was committed to the Tower for not having sufficiently asserted the dignity of the British crown, and resting satisfied with a salute from the guns of the Dutch admiral. The prince of Orange's visit to England made no alteration in the councils of that nation; for after that event Mr. Coventry was sent to Stockholm, to exert his utmost abilities in drawing off the king from the triple alliance, so inconsistent with his Britannic majesty's engagements to Lewis. These changes in the English ambassadors were deemed ominous by the more discerning. De Wit had the greatest friendship for Sir William Temple; but he regarded his successor as a mean tool of the court, a turbulent firebrand, and an implacable enemy of the republic, and was particularly jealous of his high reputation with the states. Downing, indeed, on his first arrival solemnly protested, that the king his master was determined strictly c to adhere to every article of the triple alliance. He gave the strongest assurances, that Charles had no other design in the powerful armaments he was equipping, than to render himself respectable among his neighbours, and guard against the designs of the most Christian king, whom he had good reasons to distrust; and, indeed, this was all that Charles had acknowledged to the parliament when he demanded supplies, and intimated his intention of taking fifty ships of the line into commission, besides the cruisers and the squadron already in the Mediterranean. Nor was Downing satisfied with these insidious declarations; he complained of the backwardness of the states, in fulfilling an article of the late treaty, which respected the colony in Surinam, and specified some causes of difference between the English merchants and the Dutch East-India company. The pensioner had too much d penetration to be deceived by appearances; he had the best intelligence of the transactions in the British cabinet, and was well informed of every circumstance of the negotiation between the courts of France and England: he, therefore, considered every change of measures as a step towards an approaching rupture. But he most dreaded the ambitious projects of France, as they threatened the United Provinces not only with all the horrors of an invasion, but those of domestic faction and confusion. The smallest alarms on the side of Flanders would stir up the populace to demand the restitution of their former honours to the Orange family; than which nothing appeared more dreadful to the pensioner, in regard to its consequences on public liberty, and the freedom of the republic. On the other hand, should Lewis pursue his designs, how could the provinces provide for their e own security without a military force? and how could that force be raised, regulated, paid, and disciplined, while the republic was divided, and the more popular party excluded from all public employments? Under these embarrassments he sought the friendship of Spain, tho' his advances were but coldly received, until the joint views of Lewis and Charles became so very apparent, that the Spanish ministry were at length reduced to the necessity of ordering Don Emanuel de Lira, the king's ambassador at the Hague, to enter into a defensive treaty with the republic. This affair was conducted by de Lira, and count Monteroy with so great secrecy, that it remained for some time unknown to all the powers in Europe besides the contracting parties <sup>b</sup>. Both de Lira and Monteroy were the declared enemies of France: the former detested the perfidy of her politics, the ambitious schemes of her ministry, and the insidious methods she practised to destroy the liberties of Christendom, and establish universal empire: the latter was the son of Don Lewis d'Haro, and consequently no friend to measures erected upon the foundation laid by cardinal Mazarin, the implacable rival of his family.

Treaty between Spain and the republic.

f WHEN the treaty between Spain and the republic was divulged, ambassadors were sent from France and England, to use the utmost efforts to render it void. France spoke in a high strain of authority, while the British ambassador endeavoured to sap the foundation of the alliance; but neither the artifice of the one, nor the insolence of the other, could prevail. The court of Spain ordered Lira and Monteroy to proceed in the treaty with the republic, and use every method to draw the knot of union harder, and so blend the interests of g the two nations as to render them inseparable. The firmness of Spain proved extremely encouraging to the states; but it was no equivalent to the powerful league formed against them between the crowns of France and England, the elector of Cologne and the turbulent, ambitious, enterprising, and warlike Van Galen, bishop of Munster, who embraced every opportunity of displaying his implacable animosity to the republic. Besides, the Orange faction openly espoused the claims of England, insisting that the required satisfaction should be given to his majesty, in hopes not only of warding off the impending storm from that quarter, but of cementing the two nations in a strict union of interests. Had Charles studied his own dignity, the good of his kingdoms, and the interests of Europe in general, the fairest opportunity now offered of nipping in the bud all the aspiring projects of Lewis, which afterwards filled Christendom with blood and carnage. On the other hand, the states, under the influence of de Wit, sought to pacify the indignation of the most Christian king, who highly resented the insolence of the republic, that broke out in various instances, subsequent to the peace of Aix la-Chapelle. They made the most abject submissions; they disavowed the medals which had given so much offence; and they promised immediately to redress all his majesty's complaints, to remove from the councils every person who had incurred his displeasure, and to square their conduct intirely to his royal will. But Lewis had another object in view besides the mere gratification of revenge; and this opposite conduct of the two factions was meant not as compliments to Lewis and Charles, but as measures to destroy each other. Could France be appeased, the Orange family must remain in obscurity; and could the king of England be gained over, there would probably be an end to the influence of the pensioner and his party. Neither side appeared to have any thoughts of preserving the republic by a coalition, or even a suspension of their animosity, perhaps from a conviction that it was impracticable; and while the states hesitated about making these submissions to Charles which Lewis refused, the alliance was formed by which their territories were to be invaded by the troops of France, Cologne, and Munster, their commerce ruined, and their fleets destroyed by the combined squadrons of France and England. Nothing retarded the immediate commencement of hostilities but the indigence of Charles, who was always receiving supplies from his parliament, and always needy and distressed.

Attempt on the Smyrna fleet. A. D. 1672.

Among the schemes projected to fill the royal coffers, one may be regarded as a barefaced act of piracy against the Dutch, with whom he had hitherto come to no open rupture. The attempt was equally perfidious and unsuccessful: before any declaration of war, and previous to the departure of Sir George Downing from the Hague, it was proposed to intercept the Dutch fleet of merchant ships from Smyrna, estimated worth two millions of money. Sir Robert Holmes was sent in this service, with a small squadron. In his voyage he fell in with Spragge, returning with his squadron from the Mediterranean; but resolving to monopolize the whole honour and profit of this action to himself, he concealed his purpose from the other British admiral, suffered him to pursue his voyage, and thereby failed in the enterprize, because his strength was too inconsiderable. Van Nes, who convoyed the merchant fleet with five men of war, no sooner descried the English flag, than he put his little squadron into an admirable posture of defence. Holmes attacked him with great fury, and the engagement was maintained the whole day with equal valour, skill, and obstinacy. The fight was renewed in the morning, and maintained with the same fury, until night separated the combatants. On the third day the action was again renewed; but Van Nes had taken such measures, that he now got off with the loss of one man of war and four merchantmen, which, however, were sunk and useless to the enemy, disappointed in all their sanguine hopes, and left only the dishonour of having, unsuccessfully, violated the most solemn laws of nature and nations. The Dutch exclaimed against the baseness of an action which would have disgraced one of the piratical states of Africa; and the court endeavoured to reconcile it to the public as a casual rencounter, occasioned by the obstinate refusal of the Hollanders to pay the due honours to the British flag. Holmes, however, though he was the instrument of a perfidious attempt, had too much honour to certify the court relation of the engagement: he even acknowledged that the Dutch admiral had actually lowered his topsails, and paid him the usual compliment.

England declares war.

By this action the states were convinced they had nothing to expect from Charles, and that their diligence must be redoubled, in preparing for a rupture between the two nations. The seizure or confiscation of four of their East-India ships corroborated these sentiments, which were soon confirmed by the king's declaration of war against the republic. In this frivolous and impertinent piece the world is desired to believe that nothing but absolute necessity, a regard to the liberties of his subjects and the dignity of his crown, could have driven his majesty to carry matters to extremities: but the evasions of the states with regard to the claims of the British East-India company, their refusal to send home the English families settled at Surinam, agreeable to the treaty of Breda, their denying to pay the due honour

- a honour to his flag, their ridiculing the king and people of England in arrogant medals and inscriptions, had obliged him to use the power delegated to him by the Almighty, to check their insolence and secure the rights and honour of his crown and kingdom. Two very remarkable circumstances were mentioned in this declaration; viz. that the states had made a proposal of acknowledging the king's superiority by sea, provided he would join them against France, and never use their concessions upon this occasion as a precedent to their disadvantage; and that they had sent to England an ambassador extraordinary, who in positive terms refused giving the satisfaction required, and indeed promised in former treaties. Notwithstanding these pretences, it is certain that Sir George Downing, when sent to the Hague, was bound by his instructions not to accept any satisfaction after a certain
- b number of days prescribed; a method of proceeding in ambassies always irregular and unusual, especially in Holland, where the very nature of the constitution renders all deliberations tedious. In a word, there was so much chicane and artifice in the conduct of the ministers, that the whole people of England clamoured against the war, their ancient animosity to the Dutch being absorbed in their resentments against the measures of the administration. As to the Dutch, they answered the king's declaration with great propriety and strength of argument, refusing irrefragably almost every article it contained. They denied that the English families in Surinam were detained, and demonstrated that they had refused to quit the colony: they affirmed, that no treaty had obliged their admirals to strike sail on their own coast to an English pleasure boat; this alluded to the affair of the
- c yatch: they asserted their never having countenanced any medals, pictures, or inscriptions, reflecting upon the king or people of England: they declared it had always been their study to cultivate the friendship of Great Britain, to maintain their engagements, and to procure the repose of both nations, upon which their commerce and the very existence of their republic depended. Next they painted, in the strongest colours, the insolence of Downing, the English minister at the Hague; the intention of the English ministry in recalling Sir William Temple, who had engaged the affection of the states, by the justice, honour, and openness of his proceedings, as well as the amiableness of his character, the iniquitous attempt upon their Smyrna fleet, and the insidious capture and unjust detention of their East India shipping<sup>a</sup>.

- d THE court of Spain could not be persuaded that England would ever come to extremities with the Dutch, and enter upon an iniquitous war upon groundless and at best but frivolous pretences. Even France could hardly depend upon the promises and engagements of a monarch incapable of constancy and perseverance. Nor did the states imagine their calamities were so near: all Europe, indeed, stood astonished at this thunder-clap, which was the more dreadful as it was sudden and unexpected.

- LEWIS* now entered upon the scene of action, with such an air of superiority, that Charles seemed little more than the harbinger to usher in the giant. His declaration of war against the states-general was published in the month of April, under the superb title of An Ordonnance by the King. His money and influence had not only drawn over the king of England to his interest, but he retained Sweden by his subsidies, and armed the other princes on the frontiers of the United Provinces against the republic. He did not condescend to specify particulars in his ordonnance: it was sufficient that the insolence of the states had incurred his displeasure, and merited chastisement. It was in this lofty stile his minister de Gremonville talked to the emperor when he desired the court of Vienna might not interpose in his quarrel with the Hollanders. At other Roman Catholic courts he pretended to call it a religious affair, reproaching the Dutch with the name of heretics, though he was linked in the closest alliance with a heretic monarch, and the head of the Protestant church; though four hundred thousand crowns were given annually for the friendship of a nation which had by severe laws prohibited the residence of Catholics in the kingdom (A). Scarce any thing can convey a higher idea of the power, weight, and importance of the republic, than a consideration of the variety of precautions taken by the two kings before they ventured to declare their hostile intentions. Lewis's power was unrivaled by land, and Charles might justly regard himself as the most potent maritime prince in Europe. Holland was divided by faction at home, and had scarce time to form any solid measures for the security of the state: yet were the efforts of this republic sufficient to a baffle all the attempts of the most formidable combination Europe had beheld since the famous league of Cambray, against another republic, contemptible in respect of power, grandeur, and territory, to her enemies. The bishop of Munster declared war against the Dutch, under pretence of their having attempted to corrupt the governors of his towns; and the elector of Cologne received a body of French troops into his dominions, under the pretext of providing for his own security.

(A) This was the subsidy paid to Sweden by the allies, for holding herself in readiness to act against the emperor or the empire, should they offer to interpose. If the Swedes took the field, the subsidy was to be augmented to six hundred thousand crowns (1).

Preparations
in Holland.

THE commonwealth of the United Provinces seemed now to be devoted to destruction.
Nothing appeared capable of suspending its fall. Lewis was ready with three armies to burst like a torrent into the heart of the republic's dominions, while on her side there was b no army, no general, no fortifications, no unanimity to oppose the inundation; the whole valour and power of the state consisting in her navy, upon which the pensioner had bestowed all his attention. France had no sooner veered round than de Wit lost his credit, and with some degree of reason, as enmity to the prince of Orange had certainly carried him too far in his opposition to England, and complaisance to the court of France had occasioned his extinguishing every spark of military spirit in the republic, disbanding the greater part of the army, and filling up all commissions in the remainder with the sons and kinsmen of his own friends, raw unexperienced youths, who had never beheld the face of an enemy. His confidence in France prevented his acting with his usual vigilance and caution. Fear of giving offence, by suspicion, hindered his making preparations against the impending invasion. The populace demanded that the prince of Orange, a youth just c attained to the age of manhood, might be placed at the head of the army, if a body of twelve thousand men, little better disciplined than militia, merited that name. There was no resisting the voice of a whole nation; de Wit yielded, and resolved to make one powerful effort by sea, while the prince was endeavouring to augment the army, raise the spirits of the people, revive discipline, repair the fortifications, and provide every necessary for a vigorous resistance. The great difficulty was to form a judgment where the storm would fall, and where to direct the strength of the republic, which was too inconsiderable to admit of being divided. Every thing was kept so close in France, that not a syllable about d the army transpired; no letter was suffered to pass into Holland that contained the most distant hint of the intended invasion. It was the general opinion that the king would lay siege to Maastricht: we have shewn the reasons why he declined this measure<sup>a</sup>, and rather chose to penetrate in three divisions into the provinces, take advantage of the present forlorn and dispirited condition of the enemy, and by one great effort destroy all presence of mind and hope of resistance. We have seen with what rapidity he over-ran the Netherlands, and reduced the Dutch to the necessity of laying their country under water. All Europe stood amazed at the king's irresistible progress, while the republic was given up for lost, and without the smallest prospect of deliverance. The preparations of the states could not keep pace with their calamities. The auxiliaries received from Flanders were just sufficient to draw complaints against the court of Spain, from the two allied kings, but too inconsiderable to do the republic real service. Tho' the states were negotiating a treaty offen- e sive and defensive at Vienna and Madrid, it was probable their fate would be determined before it could take place. They were besides harrassed in every step by the enemy, and their applications to the elector of Brandenburg and the princes of Lunenburg, it was feared would be frustrated by the machinations of Lewis, and the terror of the French arms<sup>c</sup>.

IN this situation it was hoped a bold push with the fleet might produce some favourable change. The ships of the republic were as numerous, her stores as full, her mariners as abundant, and her commanders as brave and experienced as ever: it was therefore resolved to employ them in the most vigorous manner for the preservation of the last remains of the commonwealth. Ruyter was accordingly sent to sea with ninety ships of war, and forty frigates and storeships, Cornelius de Wit acting on board as deputy from the states. f
The first intention was to prevent the junction of the French and English squadrons; but this was already effected: the united fleet lay at anchor in Solebay, under the command of the duke of York, the earl of Sandwich, and the count D'Estrees, to the amount of one hundred and thirty ships of the line. The chief authority was vested in the duke of York, who imprudently affronted the earl of Sandwich, for representing that the ships lay in great disorder, and exposed to the utmost danger, if attacked in that situation. He refused standing out to sea, as the earl advised; and, indeed, regarded nothing besides his pleasures, which some political English historians relate he carried, on this occasion, to unusual excess. It is certain,

- a the Dutch began to attack early in the morning, before the combined fleet could be properly ranged: several ships were forced to cut their cables with the utmost precipitation, in order to form the line; and the whole was in such confusion, that the vessels ran foul of each other. Van Ghent opposed himself to the earl of Sandwich, who led the van of the enemy, and a most dreadful action ensued, in which the Dutch admiral was killed, after performing prodigies of valour. Sandwich sustained for a while the whole weight of the Dutch fleet, that the duke might have time to reduce the rest of the ships into order. He destroyed a large man of war which had attempted to board him; he sunk three fire-ships, before they approached near enough to grapple with his rigging, though his whole crew was almost killed or wounded: he continued to ply his artillery with unremitting ardour,
- b until another fire-ship ran him aboard on the quarter. Even now he might have escaped into another vessel; but he disdained to live after the injury done to his honour by the duke of York: his ship was blown up, and the earl and every person on board were destroyed. The benefit of the disposition he had made was felt after his death: Sir Joseph Jordan, his vice-admiral, still pursued the same plan of gaining the windward, and at last succeeded; by which he was enabled to come to the assistance of the duke of York, who was hotly engaged with de Ruyter. Now the engagement was so close for above two hours, that the Dutch admiral afterwards declared it was the most obstinate of two and thirty actions in which he had been concerned. Both sides fought like men accustomed to dispute the empire of the ocean. The duke and Ruyter each shifted their flags twice;
- c but the duke did not return afterwards to the engagement. Night came on, the battle was drawn, victory was claimed by the English and Dutch; but it belonged to the latter, if we may judge by consequences; for Ruyter, without interruption, convoyed a prodigious fleet of merchantmen safe into the Texel, and overflowed his country with wealth on the one side, while it sunk under the pressure of misfortunes on the other (A).

- A DISPUTED victory, however, could not serve the purpose of de Wit, as affairs were then circumstanced. He had no prospect of standing his ground, and frustrating the views of the young prince of Orange, except by some signal success and decisive blow on the ocean. To have failed in this, was to him equivalent to a total defeat, as he knew it would be impossible to put the fleet again to sea with sufficient expedition to remedy the
- d mischief that arose from the present disappointment. He saw the French king extending his conquests on all sides, three provinces wholly subdued, and Lewis exercising not only the power of the conqueror, but the authority of a sovereign; changing constitutions, enacting laws, publishing edicts, creating magistrates, receiving homage, and, in a word, transferring to himself the allegiance due only to the majesty of the states general. Believing longer resistance fruitless, and perhaps dreading more to become vassals to the prince of Orange than tributaries to France, the Lovestein faction determined, as the last resource, to appease by supplications the power they were unable to withstand. Accordingly deputies were dispatched to Lewis and Charles, with hopes at least of breaking their union, if they should fail in subduing their resentments. On the arrival of De Groot at the
- e French court, his proposals were demanded; but he answered, he was come to know the king's pleasure, his masters deeming it more respectful to receive than to offer conditions. He was told, however, that Lewis expected proposals, in which the states should consider all that his majesty had already conquered as his own, and make allowances for the farther progress of his arms during the remainder of the campaign. With this answer the deputy returned to the Hague, and was immediately sent back with full power to treat, and conclude a peace on the best terms that could be obtained.

- AFTER repeated conferences, Louvois gave the deputy a plan of pacification, or rather the pretensions of the king his master, upon granting which he was ready to return to his former amity with the republic. Though the apprehensions of the states were so extravagant as to offer that every thing should be surrendered to the conqueror, provided their liberty, religion, and sovereign power could be preserved; though they offered to cede the whole frontier, and defray the expences of the war, yet this was insufficient. Lewis demanded that the commodities of France should be imported, free of duty, into all the provinces; that the states should permit the free exercise of the Catholic religion, share the churches between them and the Protestants, and appoint regular salaries for the Romish
- f

(A) Some French writers alledge, that D'Estrees was hotly engaged with his whole squadron of thirty ships, with the division of Flushing, whose fire he sustained with the utmost resolution and valour. The truth is, only a few French ships were engaged, and in all probability the count had orders to keep aloof, that the two maritime powers might destroy each other. Voltaire confesses as much (1).

priests; that they should cede not only all the frontier towns, but Skunk, Nimeguen, Knot- a zemburg, part of Guelderland, the islands of Bommel and Voorn, and the forts of St. Andrew, Lovestein, and Crevecoeur; in a word, that they should make him as completely master of all the provinces, as if they had already been conquered by the sword: and, besides, pay an immense sum of money to indemnify his expences; send a yearly embassy to Paris with a golden medal, confessing the subjection of the republic, and that to the king she owed the preservation of that liberty which his ancestors had enabled her to acquire. Finally, that in the space of ten days the states should signify their assent to these insolent proposals, in which case he would withdraw his forces<sup>a</sup>. Here it is remarkable, that not the least mention was made of England: we shall see how that court seemed to be wholly directed by the will and pleasure of Lewis.

Proposals made by the kings.

THE deputies sent to England were met at Gravesend, forbid entering London, and con- b veyed directly to Hampton-court, where they met with a very harsh reception, though they excited the compassion of a generous people, seduced into an unjust war against a republic with which they had no real quarrel. At Hampton they were kept in a kind of honourable confinement, until the pleasure of Lewis should be known, and whether they were to be favoured with an audience, or upon what terms it might be proper to treat of an accommodation. Bishop Burnet intimates, that the deputies gave lord Arlington to understand, c that the states were disposed to advance the prince of Orange to the dignity of stadtholder, and all the other offices possessed by his ancestors, as was plain from their giving him the intire command of the army. They requested, that his majesty would appoint plenipotentiaries to treat jointly of a peace with the French monarch; and their petition was granted, merely because Charles was at a loss in what manner to act singly, and before he had his instructions from Lewis. The duke of Buckingham and lord Arlington were accordingly nominated to attend the French king, at that time with his whole court at Utrecht. It would seem, however, that though Charles did not chuse to treat separately of a peace, that he felt uneasiness at the rapid progress of his ally, and at the high strain of authority in which he talked; that he foresaw the intire conquest of the provinces would be a formidable accession of power to Lewis, who might forget his engagements, and think it his interest to have the king of England dependent on his subjects. Besides, Charles shewed an d inclination to share in the spoils of the republic. Poverty had made him avaricious, and now was the opportunity of gratifying the new-born passion, and of administering to the gratification of all his pleasures. Holland was in such a situation, that he doubted not of procuring whatever conditions he should think fit to prescribe. His demands were exorbitant. In concert with the court of France, the plenipotentiaries delivered the following preliminaries to the Dutch deputies: That the states should do honour to the British flag, without limitation; that whole fleets should strike their colours, and lower their topmasts, to any single king's ship in the British seas, or on the coasts of Holland; that his majesty's subjects at Surinam should have liberty to quit the colony, on the terms prescribed by the treaty of Breda; that all the king's enemies and calumniators should for ever be banished e the republic; that the prince of Orange and his descendants should enjoy, by hereditary right, the dignities of captain and admiral general, and of stadtholder of the United Provinces, in as ample a manner as they had ever been held by his ancestors; that a million sterling should be paid to the king, to indemnify the charges of the war, as well as ten thousand pounds annually, merely for liberty to fish in the British seas; that a treaty of commerce should immediately be set on foot, wherein all his majesty's claims, respecting the affairs of India, should be acknowledged, without contradiction; and that the isles of Valcheren, Cadfant, Goree, and Voorn, with the town and castle of Sluys, and their dependencies, should be put into the king of England's hands, by way of security for the performance of the several articles of this treaty<sup>b</sup>.

GRIEVOUS as these terms were, to the prince of Orange alone it was owing they were not f accepted. He had infused such a spirit into the people, that on him depended the alternative of embracing or rejecting the proposals. Nor were the allied kings ignorant of this. They addressed themselves chiefly to him: they knew his ambition, and they plied him on that side with all the batteries in their power, fully convinced, that, in the end, he must yield to the temptation. The sovereignty of the provinces was presented to his view, to dazzle his eyes with the lustre of the object; but William's ambition aspired higher.
 Eager to become the saviour of his country, he spurned the thoughts of trampling on her liberties, at a time when she most wanted his assistance: he despised owing his elevation to tyrants, and sacrificing his honour and integrity to the petty reward of a tributary sovereignty. He called to mind the unhappy fate of the duke of Lorrain: the example was g

- a recent, striking, and sufficient to deter any inferior prince from relying upon the friendship, the equity, or the gratitude of a powerful monarch, whose ambition grasped at subjecting all the neighbouring powers. Full of these heroic sentiments, he declared he would defend the liberties of his country, or perish in the last dyke. The spirit of the prince infused life and vigour into his party; and he took this opportunity of inflaming the passions of the populace against the pensioner and his brother, who had now become the objects of hatred and execration, on account of their adherence to France. To this, and the subjection in which the house of Orange was kept, were all the misfortunes of the commonwealth attributed. In their most prosperous condition the vulgar panted for a stadtholder, with the glitter of whose authority they were dazzled: in adversity, they knew no b other relief than from an application to the descendants of those heroes who had by perseverance, valour, and magnanimity, rescued the state from the insolent dominion of the house of Austria, and established religion and liberty on a solid basis.

- THE pensioner de Wit was deemed the source of the strong tide of public calamity, that now flowed with a violence sufficient to overwhelm the constitution. He inherited no titles, no royal blood, from his ancestors: his nobility arose solely from merit, inflexible virtue, and vast abilities; but he was subject to the frailties of humanity. His staunch republican principles, and opposition to the aspiring views of the house of Orange, obliged him to fall into an extreme equally dangerous to his country. His enmity to the king of England, and the prince his nephew, threw him into the arms of Lewis, by whom he was now deserted and betrayed. In the full lustre of prosperity, the pensioner was envied and c admired; in his decline, he was loaded with the execrations of a people, who placed to his account that their commerce was a prey to the English, that their towns were swallowed up by the French, the dignity of the republic lost, and public liberty and religion tottering. He was presumed to be, as a Dutch writer expresses it, the Jonas of the state, whom by throwing overboard the storm would be appeased. Actuated by these prejudices, the provinces fell into the most violent ferment: the dregs of the people, buoyed up to the surface, floated like scories upon the superficies, and dictated to their masters. The states were disregarded, the whole hope of the public centered in the house of Orange, and the universal cry was a stadtholder. Every voice demanded the repeal of the perpetual edict, d by which they had engaged, upon oath, never to acknowledge the prince of Orange as governor-general, or to vest him with the dignities possessed by his ancestors. The two brothers, John and Cornelius, still continued to oppose the repeal from motives of true patriotism: they saw the madness of the people, and apprehended that, in the transports of their zeal for the prince, they might dispose of their liberty, and, by one act of indiscretion, afford matter of perpetual inquietude. At length the populace broke through all restraint. At Dort, where Cornelius de Wit was ancient burgomaster, the citizens ran to arms, invited the prince of Orange to come thither, and forced the magistrates to invest him with all the dignities belonging to his family. Five days after (June 30) the same scene was acted at Rotterdam, Amsterdam, the Hague, Middlburg, and in general through e all the provinces. Nor did the popular fury stop here: they purged the public offices of all disagreeable persons, called upon the prince to fill the vacancies, introduced into the magistracy all the adherents of his family, and insisted that their own deputies should have seats in the administration, contrary to the fundamental laws of the constitution. At Amsterdam the populace were in continual tumults. In one riot the magistrate, equivalent to high sheriff, was wounded; and a burgomaster carried off in triumph, insulted, and confined prisoner in the town-house. At Dort the pictures and statues, erected in honour of Cornelius de Wit, were pulled down and broken. Their rage against both the brothers was inexpressible; but it seems to have risen to the greatest height against Cornelius, who had first refused to sign the instrument whereby the prince was elevated to the stadtholdership.
f John de Wit had, between resentment and despair, resigned the office of pensioner, after having been assaulted by four ruffians, and left for dead in the street. The gallant de Ruyter was attacked in the same manner at Amsterdam; and Cornelius de Wit was beset in his own house, and, being confined to his sick-bed, was with the utmost difficulty protected by his servants. It was a short time after that this honest patriot was accused, by an infamous barber, of having offered him thirty-two thousand guilders for attempting the life of the prince of Orange. The charge was improbable and absurd; but the times favoured the accuser, and prevented the magistrates from doing justice to the accused. So strong was the current of faction, that the judges, intimidated by menaces, were forced, against their conviction, to condemn him to the torture, to confiscate his estate, divest him of his dig-g nities and employments, and sentence him to perpetual banishment. His constancy never shrunk under the most excruciating pains, which he bore with unshaken fortitude, protesting his innocence; and, at every respite from the pangs of torture, repeating that beautiful ode of Horace, beginning with Iustum & tenacem propositi virum. His brother the pensioner, with truly fraternal affection, not only countenanced him through the whole proceeding, wiped away his tears, and consoled him in his adversity, but determined to share his misfortunes, by accompanying him in his exile<sup>c</sup>. While he was visiting him in prison, the deluded multitude assembled in a tumultuous manner, broke open the prison-doors, dragged out the unfortunate brothers, embued their savage hands in the blood of those sons of liberty, who had merited so well of their country, and treated their dead bodies with the most inhuman indignity (A).

THE elevation of the prince of Orange was almost an immediate consequence of the tragical end of his two greatest enemies. He was promoted, with all possible demonstrations of joy on the side of the people, to the whole administration of Holland and Zealand. Utrecht, Guelderland, and Overyssel, were in the hands of the enemy; and the young prince John-Casimir of Nassau, now under the guardianship of his mother, had already been in possession of the government of Friesland and Groninguen. But the insolence of the populace did not subside with this favourable change of measures. Their prosperity rather increased their arrogance. At Amsterdam the following demands were posted up on the exchange: That the colonels, captains, and other officers of the burgomasters, be immediately cashiered, and their commissions be given to such persons as the prince-stadtholder shall judge worthy: that henceforward none of the burgomasters shall be appointed directors of the East India company, and that those who at present enjoy that office be cashiered: that an account of all money received and expended be laid before the burghers: that all the privileges of the burghers, respecting the liberty of fishing round the towns, be confirmed: that those who refuse to accede to these conditions, shall be treated in the same manner as the de Wits were at the Hague: and that whoever shall presume to pull down this writing, may expect immediate capital punishment. In a word, the power of the nobility was every where the object of jealousy; and the great design seems to have been to share the government between the stadtholder and the populace. Whatever demands were made by the people, the prince immediately granted. All authority was vested in his highness, the

(A) Most writers have related, that with this sacrifice the popular rage was appeased, and tranquillity once more restored; but the opinion is erroneous. Like the waves of the sea, their passions rolled high, after the tempest had ceased. When the criminal magistrate at the Hague had desired and obtained leave of the prince of Orange, to make inquiry after the principal actors in this tragedy, and for that purpose asked their names of the captain of the burghers, the people replied, "We are all guilty; if you are dissatisfied with our conduct you shall share the same fate." They even proceeded so far as to depose him immediately from his office, in resentment of the compassion he had shewn for the deceased virtuous patriots. For the reader's farther satisfaction, we shall beg leave to subjoin the following natural and affecting account of a transaction, which will always be regarded as a material incident in the annals of human nature, and perused with that eager curiosity which accompanies tragical events and scenes of horror and bloodshed. 'I tremble when I take pen in hand to acquaint you with the sad spectacle here exhibited in the persons of Cornelius and John de Wit, the former having the same day received sentence, whereby he was declared incapable of holding any employments in the state, and banished for ever. The barber who accused him, being set at liberty, went up and down the streets, telling the people that Cornelius's punishment was by no means adequate to the heinous nature of his crime. About the same time the pensioner de Wit going in his coach to the prison, to carry away his brother, they were both, as they were coming away, stopped by the watch, who would have discharged their muskets upon them, had they not immediately retired to the prison. In the mean time, the people being highly dissatisfied with the lenity of the above sentence, and it being reported that the boors were coming, with no good intention, to the Hague, the drums were beat for assembling the burghers under arms. Six companies posted themselves before the prison-doors, where they continued almost the whole day, when they began to break down the prison doors, notwithstanding three troops of horse were drawn out to prevent disorder. These the burghers kept off with their pikes, afterwards obliged them to retire, then broke into the prison, dragged out the brothers, wounded them in divers places, trampled them under foot, and ignominiously dragged the dead bodies round the streets. First, their two fingers, which they had held up at swearing to the perpetual edict, were cut off; and their ears, which were taken up by some boys, and presented as a gift to the first person they met of distinction. After this they hung the dead bodies by the heels on a gibbet, their cloaths being all torn off, and their flesh mangled in a barbarous manner, every one striving to come in for a piece, which they afterwards sold up and down the town. One joint of a finger sold for twelve stivers, a whole finger for fifteen, a piece of an ear for twenty-five stivers, and so in proportion. In this manner the bodies remained hanging till midnight, exposed to the brutal insolence and more than savage cruelty of the mob, when several persons in disguise came and removed them. A sadder spectacle hath never been seen in this or any other country. It is said, that a woman coming from Sebeveling, being informed of what had happened, fell upon her knees and thanked God for it; so strongly were the people enraged against two patriots, whose names will be transmitted with those of the most renowned heroes to the latest posterity.' Nothing, indeed, can more strongly characterize the cool, deliberate, phlegmatic barbarity of the people than this simple narration, which bears all the marks of authenticity. We have, in a former volume, given our sentiments upon the share the prince of Orange probably had in this horrible transaction. It would be disagreeable and unnecessary to repeat truths which bear hard upon the memory of that great soldier and statesman.

a states were scarce ever named, the legislative and executive power were wholly at his mercy, and the constitution seemed intirely unhinged.

THE first good effect which this change of measures produced, was the putting an immediate stop to the treaty with France. At an extraordinary assembly of the states, assembled merely for the sake of form, the young stadtholder represented, in a speech that held three hours, the pernicious consequences of accepting the terms proposed by Lewis: he encouraged them to hope, that valour and perseverance would be able to triumph over all difficulties, and yet rescue their liberties: he demonstrated the possibility of raising the necessary supplies for the enormous expence of the war; and concluded with observing, that too great a price could not be paid for the security of religion and liberty. His knowledge was so extensive, his judgment so solid, his arguments so irrefragable, his calculations so clear, and his nervous manner so animating, that the states appeared at the same time astonished and convinced. New spirits seemed to flow through every department of the government; all were inspired with courage and hope, from the intrepidity and cool valour of the young stadtholder: that grief and despondency which had long clouded every face, were now dispelled before the radiance of his rising sun: they recovered the faculty of recollection, which seemed to be buried under their misfortunes, and all began to exert themselves with vigour in defence of their country. Wise deliberations paved the way to vigorous resolutions: the proposals of the two kings were rejected, the deputies recalled, and every necessary disposition made for defending themselves to the last extremity. It was even resolved, rather than submit, to transport themselves, their families, and effects to the East Indies, where the diligence and providence of this republic would appear to have secured a retreat against the greatest calamities.

By this time several of the neighbouring powers, alarmed at the rapidity of the French conquests, began to arm for the protection of the republic; and the prince of Orange had made surprising efforts to assemble an army capable of taking the field. His first attempt was on Naerden; but the vigilance of marechal Luxemburg rendered it unsuccessful. Still, however, the chief hopes of Holland centered in the English parliament, which it was believed would thwart the king's inclinations, oblige him to break off from Lewis, and pursue the real interest of the nation. This expectation, though well founded, proved vain, as was soon perceived by the new levies made in England, and the vast armament sent to sea under the conduct of prince Rupert, the earl of Offory, and Sir Edward Spragge, who immediately joined the French squadron commanded by d'Etrees. It was now that the project was formed of invading Zealand. A considerable body of land-forces was put on board the fleet, and such dispositions made as threatened the republic with unavoidable destruction. Never did any plan bid fairer for success. The Dutch fleet was not yet put to sea; the prince of Orange could possibly make no detachment from his little army, already greatly inferior to the enemy; the coast was covered with the ships of the invaders, and nothing appeared to give them any interruption: but it pleased the Divine Providence to interpose in defence of this injured and oppressed republic. A tempest came on, which drove the enemy from the shore, and forced them, in a shattered condition, to shelter themselves in their own ports. Nor was this all: the same storm which had removed danger, brought the most seasonable relief to the provinces. In the absence of the combined squadrons, a large fleet of India merchant-ships, richly laden, entered the Texel, and added nerves to all the operations of war, and measures of defence. Twice in the same war the states were saved from certain ruin by the immediate interposition of the hand of the Almighty. Luxemburg was on his march over the ice to attack Amsterdam and the Hague, when a sudden thaw had almost ruined himself and his army. To proceed was impossible; to return was attended with a thousand difficulties, had the Dutch officer of a fort stood firm, and discharged his duty: but his cowardice opened the way to the safety of Luxemburg, who was equally astonished at the conduct of his dastardly enemy, and his own good fortune. These are events which the republic has cause to remember with gratitude and admiration<sup>d</sup>.

At this time scarce a single power in Europe, of any consideration, pursued its real interest. The policy of all was false and delusive. France grasped at so much, that there was danger of exciting a combination of enemies, who would despoil her of all her conquests, and leave her feeble, exhausted, and emaciated, with the loss of blood and treasure spent in the fruitless pursuit of ideal projects. England acted in direct opposition to common sense in joining France, and endeavouring to exalt the house of Bourbon above that of Austria. The emperor, the empire, and Spain, lost many opportunities of rescuing Europe from the impending bondage. Their tedious deliberations suffered Lewis to acquire strength, Holland to be reduced to the last gasp, and the foundation of a bloody a general war to be laid, when one seasonable vigorous effort would have checked the pride of France, and secured the tranquillity of Europe. Holland herself committed the grossest blunders. At first her whole attention was given to her marine, and the means of opposing England, though it was impossible to avoid seeing a storm gathering in another quarter.

She connected herself with France, relied upon the faith of treaties, and shut her eyes to all consequences. Now, however, she determined to repair her errors by a series of the most spirited conduct. Ruyter was sent to sea with a powerful fleet in quest of the English, whom he found on the coast of Holland, under the command of prince Rupert. Before the action the French squadron had joined the prince; but Ruyter was not deterred from his b purpose. He made the signal to attack, bore down with the most undaunted resolution, and maintained an obstinate bloody engagement with his usual intrepidity and conduct.
The fleets parted before victory declared in favour of either side, though both claimed an advantage. They put into their ports to refit, and soon appeared again, with intention to finish the dispute more decisively. On the fourteenth of June they met a second time off Flushing, and began to cannonade with great fury; but were prevented from coming to a general engagement by tempestuous weather. Prince Rupert was, indeed, supposed to be averse to the war, and for that reason less eager to exert himself than usual, agreeable to his impetuous courage and well-known ardour. Ruyter would have come to an engagement; but the prince, being destitute of many necessaries, had retired into port. He c was no sooner supplied than he again appeared on the coast of Holland, and was attacked by de Ruyter and Van Tromp, now perfectly reconciled by the mediation of the stadtholder, who laboured to unite all parties in the service of their country. The action was scarce begun when each of the Dutch admirals singled out the commanders of the combined fleet.
De Ruyter opposed himself to the prince, Van Tromp engaged Sir Edward Spragge, and rear-admiral Bronkert attacked d'Etrées, the French admiral. Never did greater emulation appear between the officers of the different nations: all fought with that regulated ardor, and determined courage, which distinguishes true military genius. Bronkert shot a-head of the French division, separated prince Rupert from the division of Sir John Chicheley, and closed him between two fires; Ruyter plying him with fury on the one side, while the rear-admiral attacked him on the other. Though quite surrounded, Rupert fought with un- d daunted valour and presence of mind, which seemed to rise with the danger. After several desperate efforts, he at length extricated himself; and joining Chicheley, bore down to the assistance of Spragge, almost overpowered by Van Tromp. He had shifted his flag from the Royal Prince, in which he had fought until the ship was beat to pieces with the enemy's shot. He then engaged in the St. George, and fought her while she could swim; but going in the pinnace to shift his flag on board a fresh ship, he was sunk by a cannon-ball, after having gained the esteem and admiration of all men by his gallant behaviour. Van Tromp had been in much the same situation: he had twice shifted his flag, after his ships had been disabled; and at last bore so hard upon the earl of Offory, who succeeded Spragge, that he forced him to retire. English writers however alledge, that had the French obeyed e prince Rupert's signal to engage, when he put the Dutch fleet in confusion by his fireships, the victory would have been undisputed. This, however, is conjecture; and all that we know for certain is, that, finding himself extremely roughly handled, he collected his straggled ships, and hauled off to the English coast. Ruyter was greatly carested for his conduct: the stadtholder wrote him a letter of thanks with his own hand, though he had been the inveterate enemy of his family, and the fast friend of the pensioner de Wit (A).
Happily, indeed, the spirit of party seemed now extinguished, and all men united in the common defence of their country.

EVERY thing began to take a turn favourable to Holland. Spain renewed her alliance f with the states, was raising an army, and upon the point of coming to a rupture with France. The emperor had sent the famous Montecuculi into the field, to oppose his great rival Turenne. The elector of Brandenburg was at the head of a body of troops, making a diversion in favour of the republic; and the prince of Orange took Naerden, and by a series of masterly motions, and judicious encampments, left all the French generals behind him, joined the Imperialists, and invested and reduced Bonne in the space of a few days.
The bishop of Munster had been driven out of Groningen, and several places in the electo-

- a rate of Cologne, and forced to receive Dutch garrisons; in consequence of which Lewis was forced to abandon all his conquests, and withdraw his army from the provinces, the communication being cut off with France. Immediately upon this event the king of Sweden, seeing the parties grow more equal, and Europe likely to be involved in a tedious ruinous war, offered his mediation, and pleaded so heartily for peace, that a congress was opened at Cologne. The Dutch were no longer under the necessity of abjectly imploring compassion. They refused listening to terms, unless the two kings would recede from the insolent conditions they had before prescribed: they sunk in their own offers; and their ambassadors now again began to assume a more firm and elevated tone, and greater dignity of carriage. The French endeavoured to protract the negotiation; but at last, finding themselves greatly embarrassed, they retired from Cologne with their allies, on pretence of the violence offered to the count of Furstenberg, plenipotentiary for the elector of Cologne, and now apprehended by an order of the court of Vienna, as a subject of the empire, who had betrayed his country.

- THOUGH the elector of Brandenburg and the duke of Hanover had suffered themselves to be seduced from the interests of Europe, the one signing a neutrality with the court of France, the other suffering his troops to enter into the pay of the two kings; yet still Holland was sufficiently supported not to be discouraged. The treaties with Spain and the empire were full, explicit, and favourable as could be desired: there every measure of defence was stipulated, and a variety of offensive schemes concerted. In the treaty with Spain, the first seven articles provided for a reciprocal guarantee and mutual assistance, in case either party was attacked. The proportion, time, manner, and other circumstances of such mutual aid, were likewise specified. In the three next articles it was provided, that no peace should be concluded by either contracting party, without the consent of the other; and also, that no engagements should be formed that were not perfectly consistent with the present treaty. In the eleventh and twelfth articles, the emperor and certain other powers were invited to accede to the alliance; and provision was made for the due observance of the treaty of Munster, the guarantee of the treaty of Aix, and the triple league, when the war with his Britannic majesty should be terminated. In the thirteenth article, the king of Spain promises not only to co-operate with the states general, in their endeavours to procure an equitable peace; but engages, should their proposals be rejected, to declare open war against France; and that his governor-general shall, in the mean time, contrive to assist the prince of Orange with all the strength of the Spanish Netherlands. In the fifteenth article it was stipulated, that no peace should be negotiated without full restitution made of all towns, cities, and countries, which had or might be taken from the states; the republic, on the other hand, entering upon the same engagements, until all that had been taken from Spain, since the peace of the Pyrenees, should be restored. By the eighteenth article, the states engaged to surrender the town of Maëstricht, the territory of Ufenhove, and all they possessed beyond the Meuse, to his majesty, together with their pretensions to the villages of redemption. By the nineteenth article, the treaty was to subsist for the space of twenty years, and the ratifications to be exchanged in two months. What respects Great Britain is very particular, and therefore deserves to be inserted at full length, especially as we find it but imperfectly related in the bulk of English historians.

the treaty with Spain.

- NOTWITHSTANDING, by the present treaty between the most Catholic king and the republic of the United Provinces, his majesty only engages to declare war against France, should the propositions of peace be rejected; yet the king will find himself under the necessity of coming to a rupture with his Britannic majesty likewise, since every thing plainly indicates that he co-operates with France in obstructing the pacification, and since it would be impossible effectually to assist the states general, and keep upon friendly terms with Great Britain. It is therefore agreed, that if the means of pacification, proposed by his Catholic majesty, should prove fruitless, his majesty shall then declare war against the king of Great Britain, in the same manner as against his most Christian majesty. Nevertheless, to shew his good inclinations towards his Britannic majesty, the states general are required to make one last effort to bring the king to a peace, offering him such conditions as must appear reasonable. This almost was followed by the subsequent proposals; first, that the affair of the flag be adjusted to the satisfaction of the king of England: secondly, that restitution be made of all places that have or may be taken by the states general from Great Britain, since the commencement of the present war; by this article are understood places out of Europe, of which the restitution shall be reciprocal: thirdly, that a sum of four, five, six, or more, thousand doubloons be made payable at the following instalments, viz. a fourth upon exchange of the ratifications; another fourth at the close of the first year after the peace; and the remainder in the two subsequent years<sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 1674.

Peace with England.

SUCH was the treaty by which Spain and Holland became again united in the same cause, after they had been at variance and open war for near the space of a century. In consequence of this treaty, to which the emperor immediately acceded, the two courts of Vienna and Madrid denounced war against France, and became the avowed protectors of the republic, which they had, during the preceding campaign, assisted with their forces. It was likewise to the peremptoriness of this treaty, and the determined resolution of the Catholic king, that the states owed the peace soon after concluded with Great Britain. The parliament, and the nation in general, exclaimed against the ruinous measures supported by the English ministers. They were incensed at the conduct of the French admiral, who never engaged heartily in any of the naval engagements. They attributed the unprosperous issue of the last action to the artifice of d'Estrees, who paid no regard to prince Rupert's signal. They clearly penetrated into the designs of the French monarch, and determined, by refusing the supplies, to force the court to an accommodation with the United Provinces: but first it was resolved to wait the event of an enterprize formed by the earl of Offory upon Helvoetsluys. As this scheme came to nothing, the Dutch commissioners and the Spanish ambassador renewed their application to detach England from France, and they succeeded. As this was a matter of the highest importance, the states did not scruple writing a submissive letter to Charles, and empowering the marquis de Fresno to conclude peace upon terms nearly similar to those recited in the treaty between Spain and the republic. Charles, finding it would be impossible to support the war without the consent of his parliament, yielded to the inclinations of his people, and the solicitations of the Spanish minister. He made a virtue of necessity, communicated the proposals sent him by the states to the two houses of parliament, and demanded their advice. Their sentiments were well known: they exhorted his majesty to put an end to the war. Accordingly the marquis de Fresno was referred to Sir William Temple, and at three meetings the whole affair was finished. The treaty of Breda, and the commercial treaty in 1668, formed the basis of the present pacification. Little more was added, than that the states should compliment the king's flag, whether in fleets or in single vessels; and that they should pay a sum of money to defray the king's expences. How little they regarded the article respecting the flag, appears from a man of war's refusing to strike to a king's yacht, with an English ambassador on board; an incident that happened before the ratifications were exchanged. The truth is, the states were perfectly informed of the temper of the British nation and parliament, the breach between them and the court; and they resolved to profit by this circumstance, and to improve their terms in proportion to the king's necessities. This appeared more obviously from the supercilious air with which the English ambassadors were treated at the Hague. On their return from Cologne they waited on the prince of Orange, to know his sentiments of the king's mediation with France: they were forced to solicit this audience by the interposition of Sir Gabriel Sylvius, and to wait several days before it was granted. It was indeed the deepest reflection on the weakness of the English administration, to see the ambassadors of the British crown supplicating an audience of a prince of Orange.

THOUGH Charles had negotiated the peace with Holland in a dirty, clandestine manner, the French king's pride was by this time so mortified, that he did not resent the ill usage received from his ally. On the contrary, he readily accepted the mediation offered by Charles, from whom he had reason to expect some partiality and indulgence, as he obliged the English monarch with an annual pension of one hundred thousand pounds. Charles made the offer, to qualify his desertion, and Lewis accepted it, as the most rational means of warding against the danger that threatened his crown from a cloud of enemies combined to retrench his power. But the same reasons that induced him to relish the proposed mediation, rendered the overtures from the British king distasteful to the emperor, Spain, and Holland, who scrupled not avowing that the court of England retained the same attachments it formerly had to the French king's interest, though the king's immediate necessities obliged him to accommodate matters with the states general. This it was, which had probably occasioned the prince of Orange's cool behaviour to Sir Joseph Williamson, the English ambassador.

WHILE the mediation was in suspense, the prince of Orange took the field with a numerous army, and tried every stratagem of war to bring the prince of Condé to a battle: we have seen the progress of this campaign, and the manner in which William of Orange exposed a wing of his army at Seneffe, of which the vigilant Condé did not fail taking advantage. The conduct of both generals was such as engaged their mutual esteem; both claimed the victory, and neither had a right to any more than the glory of deserving

- a it. The encounter however was decisive in one respect; it frustrated the scheme of the confederates to carry the war into the heart of France, and disappointed that project upon which the prince of Orange had set his heart, of drinking wine in Champagne, before the end of the season. It likewise facilitated the operations of the enemy in another quarter, and enabled the French to penetrate into Franche-Comté, which they soon reduced. Turenne was superior to the allies in Alsace; he defeated the duke of Lorraine and Caprara at Zintzheim, attacked and routed a body of Germans at Mulhausen, drove the elector of Brandenburgh from Colmar, obtained a victory over him at Turkheim, and at length forced the enemy to repass the Rhine, and abandon their design of invading the king's frontiers, with damage and disgrace.
- b THESE successes did not prevent the king of England from persisting in the offers of his mediation, or animate Lewis to prosecute the war, could reasonable terms be obtained. The states general themselves were disposed to accommodate matters; but the courts of Vicna and Madrid formed ambitious projects, of clipping the soaring wings of Bourbon, and of humbling the pride of Lewis. The stadtholder too was inflamed with the desire of military glory, and he pushed his resentment to France so far, that the pensioner Fagel acknowledged, it would not be possible to convince him of the propriety of concluding a peace, before he had settled the balance of Europe, on such a footing, as must for years check the elevation of the French monarch. Animosity, ambition, and policy, united to confirm William in those sentiments, and we find he already stretched the general plan
- c of that grand alliance, which afterwards took effect, when he was king of Great Britain. Actuated by these principles, he carefully avoided all conference with the English ministers during the campaign, and at last told them, until France received further mortifications, nothing salutary to the peace of Europe could flow from a negotiation. In the second conference, he explained that maxim which had afterwards cost England and Holland such an A. D. 1675. immensity of blood and treasure, that it was the interest of both to set bounds to the power of France; whence he took occasion to urge, that the king should actually embark in the alliance, in order to convince Lewis that he had the same views with the other confederates; namely, the security of the repose of Europe, and not a mere temporary pacification. The prince was the more encouraged to pursue his design, that the elector of
- d Brandenburgh had again broke with the French king, and joined his troops, amounting to eighteen thousand men, to the confederate army. Yet was this reinforcement scarce sufficient to balance the inconveniences arising from dissensions among the generals, and troops of different princes, since the battle of Zintzheim. The Lunenburghers had openly condemned the conduct of the Imperialists in this action; for several hours they singly sustained the whole weight of the enemy, they had suffered extremely, and were with reason loud in their complaints. The Brandenburghers embraced their cause against the Imperialists; a diversity of interests produced a diversity of opinions; councils only created confusion, and every transaction was as perfectly known to Turenne as if he had been present. However, upon the whole, the campaign proved fortunate to the allies. Montecuculi
- e again resumed the command, opposed himself to Turenne, reduced all things to order, displayed the most extensive capacity, held the scale equal for a time, and, upon the unfortunate death of his great rival, suddenly turned it in favour of the confederates, and then resigned the command, because the enemy had no general worthy of opposing the man who had shewn himself equal to the great Turenne. At this time the illustrious Condé was employed in Flanders, where, with an inferior army, he had kept at bay the prince of Orange for the whole campaign. He was sent to succeed Turenne, but the same reasons which had prevailed with Montecuculi to withdraw, now influenced Condé. He retrieved the king's affairs, and then resigned, with the dignity of a hero<sup>c</sup>.
- f It was during the recess from military operations, that the sovereignty of Guelderland had been offered the prince of Orange, under the antient title of duke, which it was pretended had been formerly in his family. This affair occasioned various conjectures. Those who had no opinion of William's patriotism, and attributed whatever appeared great in his character to ambition, alledged that he was himself the main spring in the intrigue, and had by divers means influenced the states of Guelderland to make the proposal. His friends and admirers were of contrary sentiments. They insisted that the motion proceeded from gratitude, and that the reward was no more than was due to a hero, who had so bravely driven a powerful enemy out of the country, and rescued almost beyond probability the liberties of the United Provinces. William wisely deliberated on the offer, and submitted it to the states of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht. The last temporised, and
- g were for his accepting it; the second were as positive, in dissuading him from being dazzled with a title which would afford his enemies a handle to asperse his character, and tain real patriotism with the infamous blot of hypocrisy. Before Holland came to any resolution, the prince thought fit to decline an honour, which would have cost more than it was worth, by diminishing his popularity, while it increased his power, and added to his dignities. What ingratiated him particularly with the states of Utrecht, was his conduct in that province, upon his first resolution after he had been elevated to the stadtholdership. In order to reform abuses, and settle the government upon the antient principles of the constitution, he convened an assembly of the provincial states. Here it was determined, that new members should be elected to compose the body of the nobility and the magistracy. The prince delivered a plan he had drawn up, for the better government of the provinces: it was examined, approved, and put in execution. In consequence the old constitution was revived, agreeable to which the provincial government was vested in three distinct societies, the counsellors elect, the body of the nobility, and the deputies of the towns and cities. The judicious behaviour of the prince of Orange upon this occasion rendered him the darling of the people, and gave rise to the motion of rendering the stadtholdership hereditary in the heirs-male of his body. The Louvestein faction was now wholly suppressed, and there scarce was heard a murmur against a proposal in which the gratitude of the people, and the interest of the republic, appeared interested. The instrument for this provision was made out, and the example was followed by some of the other provinces.

Congress appointed at Nimeguen.
A. D. 1676.

THE calamities of war, which had almost depopulated the empire and the Netherlands, excited the compassion of divers princes, who laboured to establish a negotiation. In this none was so hearty as the king of England, for the reasons we have mentioned, rather than from any regard to the interests of Europe. His mediation at last operated so powerfully, that the contending parties all agreed to send plenipotentiaries to Nimeguen, where a congress was appointed about the beginning of the year. It was obvious, however, that the courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Berlin, would willingly have protracted the time, in expectation of obtaining such advantages as would induce the French monarch to acquiesce in more moderate conditions than they could expect in his present situation. The states general, likewise influenced by the stadtholder, did not express that forwardness for a negotiation which became their former professions. Hence it was that the armies of every side took the field, and military operations were pushed with vigour, while the ministers were treating about peace in the cabinet. Lewis appeared early at the head of numerous forces, and reduced Condé, Aire, and Bouchain. The prince of Orange retaliated, by laying siege to Maastricht, which he pushed with the utmost impetuosity, until the judicious motions of the enemy, and the scarcity of forage, obliged him to abandon the enterprize. With this event ended the campaign in the Netherlands, when immediately the eyes of all Europe were again turned upon the congress at Nimeguen<sup>a</sup>.

THE Spaniards were averse to peace, from a full conviction that the court of England could not long remain blind to the interests of Europe. They persuaded themselves, that rather than see Lewis in possession of the Spanish Netherlands, Charles would join the confederates. On the other hand, the French monarch was bent upon dividing the allies, and concluding a separate peace with Holland. Charles assisted in this design; the states general lent an ear to the proposal; but the stadtholder of himself refused to enter upon a measure which might have incurred the imputation of treachery, and given the confederates a fair handle to complain that they were betrayed by the republic, in whose defence they engaged in the quarrel. It was a bad recompence of their generous services, and seasonable interposition, to be now deserted, and left to extricate themselves out of a dangerous war, by the best means in their power. Perhaps ambition and revenge, as some writers assert, might have some influence with the prince; yet it must be confessed, that his sentiments are founded upon justice and generosity. Besides, he perceived that the English nation in general detested their sovereign's attachment to France; and that the people were now highly inflamed by the indiscriminate depredations of the French privateers, who made no distinction between Dutch and English merchant-ships, and regarded as lawful prizes whatever fell in their way. In fact, the prince was extremely popular in England. His valour, steadiness, zeal for the good of Europe, implacable resentment to France, and unvariable attachment to liberty, raised him extremely high in the opinion of a people enamoured above all others of patriotism, and oftener the dupes of hypocrisy than any other nation. The ill-humour of the English was increased by an indignity put on the flag by a French squadron, which refused the compliment to captain Herbert of the Cambridge. The tame conduct of Charles, who contented himself with demanding satisfaction by a letter, further incensed the people, and at last the house of commons exhorted the king to contract such alliances as would be sufficient to check the ambition of the French monarch.

a ANOTHER circumstance, likewise contributed to prevent the separate peace between France and Holland: so successfully had the French ministry laboured in establishing the navy, that France might now be regarded as one of the principal maritime powers in Europe. One of the first remarkable instances of the strength and spirit of her navy, appeared off the coast of Sicily. Messina had lately revolted from the Spaniards, and the duke de Vivonne was sent with a squadron to support the citizens in their rebellion. This occasioned the junction of the Spanish and Dutch fleets, who set sail to oppose Vivonne. On the seventh of January they fell in with the enemy, consisting of twenty-two men of war, six fire-ships, and several bomb-ketches. The engagement began next morning, before which time the wind freshened, and the sea rolled so high, that the Spanish galleys were forced to put into Lipari. Ruyter, however, did not decline the combat: he bore down upon the enemy, begun the action early, and sustained it with admirable constancy until five in the evening, when the French found means to withdraw, and accomplish their design of succouring Messina. Ruyter upon this separated himself from the Spaniards, and repaired to Leghorn; where, upon his arrival, he found an order to continue co-operating with the Catholic king's squadron, which produced a second junction of the fleets, and a resolution to lay siege to Augusta by sea and land. This was undertaken under the direction of the Spanish viceroy. Three days after the place was invested, the French squadron quitted the port of Messina, for the relief of the besieged. The fleets were nearly equal in strength, and the action was maintained with all the fire which might be expected from combatants, the one determined to gain, and the other resolved not to lose the empire of the ocean. The Spaniards fired at too great a distance, and did little execution; de Ruyter with his division supported the brunt of the engagement; broke the French line, gave chase for an hour, and obtained the honour of a victory, when he was wounded in the heel by a shot from the stern-chace of a French ship. A fever ensued, by which this gallant officer was carried off, in the space of a week, to the irreparable loss of his country. He yielded his last breath in Syracuse, lamented as the ornament of Holland, esteemed by all Europe, and recorded by the ablest pens as an example for posterity, of valour, conduct, integrity, and rigid republican patriotism. This contributed to render the prince of Orange strenuous against concluding a peace until France should be humbled. He saw Lewis aspiring after maritime power, which of consequence must ruin the commerce of the republic, upon which depended her grandeur and riches, and he hoped to combine England with Holland in destroying his marine; while the confederate land-forces were retrenching his frontiers, and limiting his ambition on the side of Germany and the Netherlands.

THE event which soon followed justified the prince's zealous enmity to the house of Bourbon, and his dread of the rising naval power of France. After the late action, the combined fleets of Spain and Holland proceeded from Syracuse to Palermo, where they were pursued by the duke de Vivonne. The allies appeared without the mole drawn up in a line, composed of twenty-seven men of war, nineteen galleys, and four fireships. The mole was on their left, the bastions of the town on the right, and the fortress of Castle Mare composed the centre. This disposition was good, and the appearance formidable; yet Vivonne, or rather du Quesne, the greatest genius of his age, ventured to attack them in this situation, with a squadron scarce equal in strength or numbers. The action began with great vigour, and was bravely sustained on both sides, when the French, taking advantage of a favourable wind, sent their fireships among the allies, obliged them to cut their cables, and run a-ground, which however rather accelerated their misfortunes. In a word, twelve capital men of war were burnt or blown up into the air. Five thousand men perished on this occasion; and, to the astonishment of all Europe, Lewis became master of the Mediterranean, and justly claimed the empire of the ocean. We have thrown these facts together, though they happened at different periods, to give the reader a more distinct view of the policy by which the prince of Orange was influenced in his opposition to the negotiations of a separate peace.

WILLIAM had great reason to expect that the king of England would at length find A. D. 1678. himself under the necessity of declaring against Lewis. The nation in general expressed the utmost aversion to the measures of the administration, and the house of commons addressed his majesty to break off his connections with the court of France. Some of the leading persons of the kingdom were in the prince's interest, and negotiating a marriage between him and the princess Mary, eldest daughter of the duke of York. The earl of Denby, by the suggestions of Sir William Temple, first proposed the match to the king and the prince. At first the king was averse to it, then neutral, and at last well disposed to the alliance, in hopes it might engage William to favour his designs, and listen to the separate peace proposed by the French monarch, while the prince always relished the prospect, because he imagined it would engage the English the more strongly to espouse his interest, and enter into his views, with respect to the war. It was from this consideration he accepted the invitation his majesty had given him of visiting England, as soon as the campaign should be finished. He accordingly arrived in the month of October, and repaired to the court at Newmarket; and after various difficulties celebrated his nuptials with the prince: after which he entered upon conferences for a plan of pacification with the duke of York, the earl of Denby, and Sir William Temple. Now it was agreed that Lewis should restore all he had wrested from the emperor and duke of Lorraine; that there should be a reciprocal restitution between France and Holland, and that Spain should have certain terms specified. This point the prince gained, that Charles solemnly engaged to renounce all connection with Lewis, and openly to espouse the confederate cause, should he refuse to accept of the conditions concerted in this general plan of pacification. All these projects, however, had almost been disconcerted by the king's unsteadiness, who was cajoled by the French court to forget all he had promised to his people, and the prince of Orange. It was the earnest wish of Charles to be set above the necessity of applying to his parliament for money, and Lewis artfully turned those inclinations to his own advantage, by granting him a yearly subsidy to a considerable amount. To dazzle the eyes of Europe, he struck up a defensive alliance with Holland; but this neither satisfied the prince of Orange nor the commons. Both insisted that he would denounce war against France, unless Lewis accepted the plan drawn up by the prince of Orange and the English ministry.

Peace of Nimeguen.

WHILE the king was thus involved with his parliament, and the republic in suspense whether she was to rely on the good offices of England, in listening to the proposals made by France, the armies took the field with the same views as in the preceding campaign, of obtaining some advantage which might give the negotiators a turn in their favour. The military operations of this year have already been related: we shall only observe, in this place, that towards the close of the season, the states general came to a resolution of accepting peace for themselves and the Spaniards, provided certain towns were ceded to the latter, and ample restitution made to the former. Just as the treaty was on the point of being signed, Lewis's tergiversation had almost broke up the congress. He refused making the required cession to Spain, unless certain advantages, not mentioned before, were previously granted to Sweden. This difficulty was at length got over by the firmness of the states; the treaty was concluded, the frontier of the United Provinces was secured, the tranquillity of the republic established, and in a few months all Europe enjoyed the benefit of a pacification. Such was the issue of a war, which had brought the United Provinces to the verge of desperation, and almost established the French monarch in that universal empire, after which he eagerly aspired<sup>f</sup> (A).

S E C T. XII.

Comprehending the affairs of the republic from the peace of Nimeguen, to the general treaty of pacification at Ryfwick.

- <sup>a</sup> AN embassy, sent to France by the republic immediately after the peace had been signed at Nimeguen, gave birth to certain disputes about the honours due to the representatives of their high mightinesses, who seemed already to have forgot, that arrogance, pride, and insolent inscriptions and devices, had occasioned all their late calamities. Because the king's guards were not drawn up in the court of the Louvre, with drums beating and colours flying, as the ambassadors passed, they refused proceeding to the audience, though Lewis was expecting them, until they should be received with the same honours as the last embassy sent by the republic. They were told, that the compliment which they now demanded was never paid, except to the ministers of emperors and kings; and though it happened to the former ambassadors, it was merely the effect of chance, the guards possibly being relieving as they passed. This was denied by the ambassadors, who proved; by the registers of former ministers, that the compliment had been paid, and not only to the republic of the United Provinces, but to Venice and the duke of Savoy, and cantons of Switzerland. At last this affair was adjusted to their entire satisfaction, and the ambassadors were introduced with all the honours of shew and respect they required.
- <sup>b</sup> LEWIS had his designs in this condescension. He was labouring a defensive treaty with the states, and had given instructions to that effect to his ambassador at the Hague, the count d'Avaux. To this Mr. Sidney, the English envoy, opposed himself, declaring, in positive terms, that his majesty should regard this treaty as a league against Great-Britain, and a resolution again to disturb the peace Europe. A whole year had passed in negotiating the point, and France had made no progress; the states contenting themselves with general expressions of esteem and regard for his majesty. Enraged at the disappointment, Lewis ordered d'Avaux to have recourse to menaces, where solicitation and intreaty had failed. An attempt was made to awake the antient terrors of the republic; by a thundering memorial delivered to the states by the ambassador. Here he represented the king's astonishment and displeasure at the ambiguous artful conduct of the states; his resolution to wait only a few days for their answer, and afterwards, not only to drop mentioning the subject, but to refuse all proposals relative to the defensive alliance, so beneficial to both nations. He added, that if they neglected embracing this opportunity
- <sup>c</sup> of securing his majesty's friendship, they must expect he would alter his conduct, and turn circumstances to the best advantage he could to his own subjects, and the advancement of the commercial interests of his kingdom. Mr. Sidney perceived the drift of d'Avaux's memorial, and resolved to frustrate its effects by a memorial in behalf of his Britannic majesty, which was presented next day to the states of Holland. This piece was drawn up by a masterly pen, and produced the consequence proposed. The states rejected the French proposals, and ordered their deputies to declare their sentiments to the states general, from whom the count d'Avaux was to receive his answer. Before their high mightinesses could be prevailed upon to communicate the resolution of the states of Holland, a great number of libels were dispersed by the friends of France and England; and it again appeared that the Louvestein faction, always attached to the French monarch, was not yet wholly subdued. The hydra faction again recovered its head, and the opposition to England arose solely from a desire of harrassing the views of the prince of Orange. The defensive treaty proposed became the subject of all conversation, upon which every
- <sup>d</sup> man expressed himself agreeable to his connections, interests, or prejudices. Those who approved the defensive alliance with Lewis, insisted that the United Provinces could not remain neutral, because they had already entered into a defensive treaty with England in the year 1678, by which the contracting parties were bound to assist each other if attacked, and in the space of two months to come to an open rupture with the enemies of either nation. What reason, they asked, could be urged for increasing the resentment of Lewis, by refusing him the same terms which had been given to Charles? Besides, England was so torn with civil dissensions, that the republic could have little dependance from that quarter, should she be attacked. It was otherwise with France; it was not only in the power of Lewis, but it was his interest to defend the republic against all the neighbouring powers. The faction did not recollect that Lewis himself was the only dan-dangerous neighbour, and that his pretended friendship had led the provinces into the most critical situation they had ever experienced. On the contrary, the house of Orange, and the adherents of England, affirmed, that Great Britain was the most natural ally of the republic, and by means of her fleets the most powerful protectress. The provincial states were divided: those of Friseland and Groningen were for accepting the French proposals; Holland remained fixed in the refusal; some of the other provinces proposed a neutrality; and this at length proved the opinion of the states-general, who communicated their resolution in the most delicate terms to the French ambassador, assuring him of their sincere desire to cultivate and deserve the friendship of the most christian king, and their full determination religiously to adhere to the peace of Nimeguen.

NOTWITHSTANDING these protestations, they extremely resented the demands of the French king, of the arrears due upon the contributions raised in the last war in the territory of Boisleduc, the barony of Breda, and other parts of the dominions of the republic. Yet with this they were forced to comply, as the king threatened military execution. Indeed it was observable, that scarce were the bonfires which had been lighted for the late pacification extinguished, before a disposition to a fresh war began to shew itself. The courts of Versailles and Madrid entered into disputes about the title of the duke of Burgundy; these paved the way to altercations upon a variety of other subjects, in consequence of which the envoy extraordinary of Spain at the Hague, presented a memorial to the states general, containing a long list of the infractions of which his catholic majesty demanded redress. The states sent an order to their ambassadors at the court of France, to use their utmost endeavours in composing matters, and preventing points of mere punctilios from laying the foundation of another war, which might disturb the peace of all Europe. Spain at length yielded to the firm resolution of Lewis, and produced a temporary harmony between the two courts, by ceding the title of Burgundy. The court of Madrid, nevertheless, endeavoured to fortify herself by the alliance of the republic, which was eagerly solicited on the one part, and as cautiously avoided on the other, from an apprehension of giving umbrage to the French monarch.

WHILE the states were using their good offices to terminate all differences among their neighbours, they did not neglect their own affairs. For some years they had been in a state of hostility with the little pyratel states of Barbary, though no transaction worth regarding had occurred. That the states were at war could only be known by petty depredations, and the seizure of some Dutch merchantmen. However, it was thought convenient to negotiate a peace with the Algerines, which was signed the preceding year. This did not prevent the dey of Algiers from annoying the Dutch commerce, when he could do it to his own advantage; he had taken several ships since the publication of the treaty, and was full as dangerous under the mask of friendship as when he professed open enmity. The Dutch commissaries complained of these infractions, and the dey alledged that the treaty had not been ratified, because he had not received the present of cannon which the states promised. At last the expected present arrived at Algiers, was received with great demonstrations of joy, and the ratification of the treaty was published by sound of trumpet and the firing of cannon, the dey solemnly declaring that he would strictly observe the peace with their high mightinesses.

A. D. 1681.

THE court of Spain had for some time been soliciting England to conclude a defensive treaty. His catholic majesty perceived that Lewis had little regard to the treaty of Nimeguen, and the subsequent agreement about the title of Burgundy; he was therefore desirous of fortifying himself by alliances. Charles, during the civil broils in his kingdom, listened patiently to his proposals; but he no sooner found himself at liberty to consult his own inclinations, than he dropped all correspondence with Spain, and renewed his connections with the French monarch. Lewis, notwithstanding his late disappointment, and the rough checks he sustained in the prosecution of his plan of universal monarchy, had not yet wholly abandoned that design. After the peace of Nimeguen, when other powers had disbanded their armies, he kept a numerous body of forces in pay, dictated to the neighbouring states, and insolently erected chambers at Mentz and Brisaac, for enquiring into titles, and resuming such territories as had ever belonged to his new conquests. The authority he assumed was extravagant. He summoned sovereign princes to appear before his chambers, and occasionally issued decrees, expelling them from their dominions, in case they disobeyed his imperial mandate. He seized upon Cassal, and the free town of Strasbourg; demanded Alost of the Spaniards, and in consequence of their refusal to cede that place, he reduced Luxemburg. This incensed the catholic king to such a degree, that he declared war against France, without reflecting on his inability to support it, and had a the mortification to see all the Spanish Netherlands over-run without opposition. Lewis's A defensive treaty between the states and Sweden. conduct alarmed all Europe, and in particular the states general, whose vicinity to the Spanish Netherlands made them peculiarly interested. It was this consideration which suggested the idea of a treaty with Sweden for the guaranty of the peace of Nimeguen. As Great Britain was likewise deeply concerned in the object of this treaty, M. Van Buiningen was sent to invite the king to accede to the new alliance. He made the strongest remonstrances, to which the king listened attentively, but to little purpose; for though conferences were appointed to negotiate the affair, he still adhered to the interest of Lewis, and in the end declined the proposed treaty.

b THE treaty of guaranty concluded between Sweden and the republic was not at all relished by Lewis, who ordered his minister at the Hague to present divers memorials upon the subject, to the states general. In these he declared, that he regarded this alliance as an association injurious to himself, and the means of kindling a new war, perhaps more fatal in its consequences than the former. The states vindicated their conduct, by alledging, that as his majesty had repeatedly acknowledged the republic, he must necessarily allow them the privilege of contracting what alliances she might think proper, which was the essential and distinguishing prerogative of liberty. The object of the treaty, they affirmed, was to secure the freedom of Europe, and preserve the repose of the republic, as well as of all the neighbouring powers. In a word, they offered to present the count d'Avaux with a copy of the convention; and defended themselves with so much candor and force of argument, that Lewis appeared satisfied. An unfortunate accident however happened, which had almost been attended with the most serious consequences, and an open rupture. A lieutenant and nine dragoons, of the garrison of Ypres, had orders from the king to seize a Frenchman, who had taken refuge in Amsterdam, and been admitted a burgess by the title of the count de Sardam. His reasons for withdrawing from the French dominions were not known; but it was the business of the states to prevent an infraction of their liberties. The king's officer and his party were therefore arrested at Rotterdam, and sent prisoners to the Hague. Several memorials were presented by d'Avaux to procure the release of the prisoners, or at least a suspension of the proceedings against them, which were actually begun. He alledged they were the king's subjects, waiting at Rotterdam for a conveyance into the French dominions: but this excuse not answering his purpose, he threw off the mask, and declared they had acted by the king his master's directions. The states pretended great astonishment at this confession; and perceiving the consequence of dissembling in a point that so nearly affected the liberty of the state, they acquainted the ambassador, that as the trespass was committed in the provinces of Holland and Friseland, he must apply to the states of those provinces for redress. He did so, and obtained no satisfaction. He was told, that surrendering the criminals would be founding a precedent for every prince in Europe to violate the privileges of the provinces; and that if they complied with the king's request, the same would be expected by other potentates, who might claim an equal right to their regard. In a word, they gave him to understand, that the proceedings must go on, and the prisoners be either condemned, or acquitted legally. In consequence, the process was carried on, the officer solemnly condemned to be beheaded, and the dragoons to labour in the dykes for the space of ten years. Accordingly the lieutenant was conducted to the place of execution, scaffolds were erected, a hearse, covered with black cloth, attended the criminal; he was brought to the block, and there pardoned and sent back, with his party, to the garrison. By this steadiness of conduct the states asserted their liberties, without giving just cause of complaint to the most christian king. D'Avaux at first talked loud, and denounced the king's vengeance; but he was in the end forced to acknowledge that the equity and firm resolution of the Hollanders were equally commendable.

The states of Holland condemn a French officer to death.

f MEANTIME the emperor perceiving that Lewis's design was gradually to despoil him of all his dominions in Alsace, desired to be admitted into the guaranty treaty lately executed between the court of Stockholm and the states general. He, at the same time, formed an alliance with the circles of Franconia and the Upper Rhine, in order that he might have an army on that river, if necessity required. Already he had brought a body of troops from his hereditary dominions, the command of which was given to prince Waldec, now created a prince of the empire. The states were not displeased with these motions, which intimated a resolution to oppose the ambitious designs of the French monarch. They were particularly pleasing to the prince of Orange, who, besides his general enmity to the French, had now personal causes of complaint against Lewis. That monarch could not avoid resenting the zeal with which the prince of Orange espoused the liberties of Europe, and combated his ambition. He saw that his vigilance thwarted all his measures, and penetrated into his most secret projects, before they were well formed. Tho' inconsiderable in point of territory and power, he regarded the prince as the most formidable of his enemies, because he directed the councils of the republic, and had great influence all over the empire, as well as in Spain and Great Britain. It was this which inspired him with the pitiful revenge of attacking the principality of Orange, hemmed in by his dominions, and environed by Provence. It was not possible to make the haughty soul of William stoop to concessions, or to warp his integrity by touching him on the side of his ambition, though that was his predominant passion: but it was in Lewis's power to punish his obstinacy, and hurl down vengeance on the heads of an innocent people, for the crimes of their sovereign.

The king of France oppresses the inhabitants of the principality of Orange.

A. D. 1682.

WHILE the negotiation for a defensive treaty was in agitation, the wrongs, damages, and oppressions which his highness had sustained, either by the connivance or direction of the French monarch, were often recommended by his friends to the consideration of the states general, to be discussed previously to the expected treaty. D'Avaux however had the address to have the motion set aside, under pretence that his claims would require more time in adjusting than was allowed for the conclusion of the treaty. When the duchy of Luxemburg was invaded by the French troops, the commanding officer had exposed to sale, by sound of trumpet, all the lands, furniture, and effects of the prince of Orange, as having been adjudged to him by a formal decree of the states of the country. It was of the losses he sustained that the prince desired to be indemnified; but as the defensive treaty came to nothing, he was forced to refer his pretensions to a more seasonable opportunity. Lewis, not satisfied with denying the prince justice, had recourse to farther violences. He obliged the magistrates of the town of Orange to expel all the French scholars from their college, and the French artizans out of their city. He sent two regiments of dragoons to live at free quarters upon the inhabitants, until they had levelled a wall built as a defence against the incursions of their troublesome neighbours. As these arbitrary proceedings were exclaimed against at every court in Europe, he was at no loss to colour them over with specious pretexts. He spirited up the prince of Condé to lay claim to the whole principality, in quality of administrator to the duke de Longueville. To preserve all the appearances of justice, he cited the prince, by the title of messire William count de Nassau, living at the Hague in Holland, to appear before his privy council. The provinces of Zealand, Holland, and Utrecht, were unanimous in the prince's defence. They represented the affair to the states, who mentioned it to the count d'Avaux; but this minister having no instructions upon that head, M. Heinsius was sent to solicit the prince's affairs at Paris, where he resided above a year to no effect.

The revival of the Louvestein faction.

To account for the indifference with which the states of Holland and the states general beheld the oppression of a prince so nearly connected with the republic, and to whom and his ancestors the United Provinces owed the greatest obligations, it will be necessary to enter more particularly into the situation of parties at this period. It was the chief business of d'Avaux at the Hague, to rear up an opposition to the power of the stadtholder, and cherish the remains of the Louvestein faction. In pursuing this scheme, he proved successful beyond probability, considering the depressed state of the opposite party a few years before, and the vast popularity and power of the prince of Orange. The first trial of the strength of the faction was made on the refusal of the Spaniards to cede Alost, and the invasion of the Ten Provinces that ensued. The prince, alarmed at the danger which threatened the frontiers of the republic, caused an extraordinary meeting of the states, and, in concert with the pensionary Fagel, the Spanish resident, and the council of state, left no expedient untried to procure a levy of 16,000 men, to augment the forces of the republic. The states declined the request, under pretence of the necessity of consulting the provinces, which was only an artifice of the French faction, to gain time for starting such objections, or raising such an opposition as should utterly disconcert the prince's design. At the next meeting of the states this became apparent. Several of the deputies were instructed to give their negative to the motion. The city of Amsterdam was at the head of the opposition; and after violent debates, which lasted for eight hours, the prince had the mortification to find that his interest and credit were on the decline; for the states separated without coming to any decision. Even after the marshal de Humieres had over-run the Netherlands, the opposition to the levies continued without shrinking; and it was evident, that the faction apprehended more dreadful consequences from the power of the stadtholder, than from the ambition of the French monarch. In hopes of flattering and cajoling the proud city of Amsterdam into his sentiments, the prince, at the head of a solemn deputation, waited upon the magistrates; but though he was received with respect, his errand proved fruitless. Amsterdam not only positively declared against the levies, but was supported in this resolution by Leyden, Delft, Scheidam, the Brille, and other towns.

DISAPPOINTED in all his projects, the prince ventured upon a resolution, destructive of the liberty of the towns, and the very basis of the union of Utrecht. Finding he could not carry his point in the constitutional method, by the consent of every individual city, he

a he determined that a plurality of voices should be sufficient authority. So rash a measure, dictated by passion, was of the utmost service to his enemies. It gave them a fair opportunity of exclaiming against his ambition; it rendered their cause popular, and furnished them with the patriot side of the dispute. Grafting opposition upon public spirit, they now proved, that upon no emergency the liberties of the constitution ought to be infringed; that whoever attempts it must be an enemy to his country; and that he must have deeper designs than those which appear to the eye of the public. They maintained, that by rushing into the war, kindled between the courts of Versailles and Madrid, they should plunge themselves into greater calamities than those they pretended to remove. In proof of this; A. D. 1685. they alledged, that the French minister had already offered a plan of pacification, which b Spain ought to accept, and was in no condition to refuse, even though supported by the republic. There was little hope, they affirmed, of the concurrence of any other power, without which no better conditions could be obtained at the close of a ruinous war, than were now offered before its commencement. There was no dependence, they asserted, on the promises of the German princes; and as to the electors of Saxony and Bavaria, Spain had no title to expect their interposition, as they had not guarantied the treaty of Nimeguen. The emperor was fully employed in opposing the Turks, Sweden had hitherto declined interfering; and as to the king of England, if he had any rule of conduct at all, it was to espouse the French monarch. In a word, they urged, that it was better to accept the proposals now offered, than to rouse the indignation of France, by making useless levies, which c would produce no other effect than lodging power in the hands of the ambitious, laying heavy duties on trade, and raising enemies to the republic.

NOTWITHSTANDING the plausible plea urged by the city of Amsterdam, and the heads of the French faction, the prince still insisted, and indeed seemed to carry his point, that the plurality of voices in this instance, where the safety of the state was endangered by the infatuated opposition of party prejudice, should be held of equal authority with the unanimity required by the constitution. This was certainly so daring a trespass on the constitution of the provinces, as could not fail of exciting violent commotions. All blazed out suddenly into a flame; yet the prince of Orange pursued his design with that cool determined resolution, which he probably would have maintained had his country been laid in d ashes. He obtained both a majority of the cities, and likewise of the provinces. Zeeland, Friseland, and Holland, firmly opposed him; but the former was at length gained over to the stadtholder's measures: yet would neither Friseland nor Groningen so much as admit of a deputation to convince them, that they ought to yield to the sense of a majority. As to the city of Amsterdam, it carried matters so high, as not only to enter a protest against the levy in question, but to declare that she could never regard this resolution as an act of the states of Holland, because it was not authorised agreeable to the fundamental principles of the government, by unanimous consent: she therefore declared her intention not to contribute to the expences of the levy.

In the midst of these dissensions, the Spanish envoy presented a memorial, urging the e states to declare against France: in consequence of which the states sent a deputation to the count d'Avaux, proposing a suspension of arms for four months. This taking no effect, the prince of Orange thought the opportunity now offered for accelerating the motions of the states, and humbling the city of Amsterdam. In concert with the Spanish ambassador, he had intercepted some dispatches from the French ambassador to his court, in which he acquaints his majesty with the methods he had practised to influence the magistrates of the city, and the sums expended in corrupting the deputies. These letters were produced in a full assembly of the states, the prince moving, that two of the deputies chiefly concerned should withdraw before they were read. He then declared, that they contained a clandestine correspondence between M. d'Avaux and the city of Amsterdam, inconsistent with f the honour, the liberty, and the safety of the republic. Upon this they were read aloud, and produced such an effect, that the states ordered copies to be transmitted to all the cities in the provinces, and the papers of the whole deputation to be sealed up, until the sense of the states general should be consulted. The stream of popularity now took a different channel. The people clamoured against the magistrates of the city; the French ambassador presented a memorial to the states general, renewing his master's former proposals of peace; but little regard was paid to overtures which were used as an artifice to ward off an enquiry. The prince, the pensionary, and the council, urged the necessity of new levies with more vehemence than ever; and they left no means untried of procuring the same submission to an act of the majority, which the principles of the constitution required to g the act of the whole body.

A. D. 1684.

WITH respect to the letters read in the assembly, they were vindicated by the magistrates of Amsterdam, who alledged, that the cypher was misinterpreted, and that the deputies had acted intirely by their direction. They then demanded the papers belonging to the deputation, which had been seized, and security for their deputies to attend the public service. Not satisfied with this, they sent circular letters to all the cities of the union, complaining of the affront put upon their deputies; and to excite the ferment, M. d'Avaux insisted upon the restitution of his letters, the intercepting of which was an infraction of the laws of nations, and the rights of ambassadors. All this was adding combustibles to the flame. William adhered to the charge with his usual stability. Instead of restoring the papers, he insisted upon an inquiry; which however he could not accomplish, as the privileges of all the deputies were interested in the event. At the same time he pursued the main object of the levies, and procured a farther supply of horse and foot for the service of his Catholic majesty: his own guards were specified in the number of auxiliaries, and he had given out that he should take the field in person, when the states of Groningen and Friseland objected to the vote of augmentation, because their deputies were absent. They therefore insisted upon recalling the troops, and recommended, that all possible means should be used to dispose the court of Spain to accept of the proposals made by the French, by which a dangerous war would be prevented, and the frontiers of the republic preserved. William, however, carried all before him. The reinforcement sent to the marquis de Grana amounted to fourteen thousand horse and foot: the states signified, in their answer to the remonstrances of Friseland and Groningen, that they could not recal this reinforcement: the last division of the prince's guards were on their march to Flanders, his own field-equipage was in readiness, and the day was appointed for his setting out to co-operate with the Spanish general in the conduct of the campaign, when a menacing memorial from d'Avaux, expressed in a stile of authority, shook the resolution of the states, diffused a panic through every department of the republic, and, in despite of the stadtholder's utmost efforts, put a stop to all vigorous proceedings. D'Avaux's memorial was opposed by a counter-memorial from the Spanish envoy, in which he put on a great shew of magnanimity, that operated but little on the minds of the states, as it was unsupported with the requisite power. A resolution was therefore taken to treat with the French minister on the proposals made in his former memorials. But d'Avaux now refused to stand by those conditions. He alledged, that circumstances were changed, that the dilatory proceedings of the Dutch government had obliged the king to enter upon new measures, and that his majesty was determined not to deviate in the smallest degree from the proposals he now delivered. The states shewed their inclination to accept any terms. They were intimidated by menaces, struck with the power of Lewis, and incapable of being wound up by the spirited remonstrances of the prince of Orange to the necessary pitch of resolution. Friseland and Groningen besides continued in their opposition to the levies, and the city of Amsterdam positively refused contributing to the support of the forces. Conferences were at length opened with d'Avaux, and his terms accepted; upon which orders were sent to the troops in Flanders to desist from all hostilities.

THE French faction, having gained this great point, determined to subject the prince of Orange to still greater mortifications. As soon as the treaty with France had passed the usual forms, the states came to a resolution to disband all the forces raised to assist Spain, consisting of one thousand four hundred and forty-six horse, and nine thousand and forty-two foot. The magistrates of Amsterdam pushed their animosity so far, as to invite prince Casimir of Nassau and his court to their city, with intention to confer upon him the stadtholdership, in the room of his cousin the prince of Orange. This project, however, was baffled by the harmony subsisting between the two princes; and the magistrates determined to compensate their disappointment by some other method of revenge, no less signal and mortifying. Their deputies were instructed to propose in the assembly of the states, that enquiry might be made into the state of the navy; that the fleet should be augmented; that the army should be farther reduced; that the pay of the officers and soldiers should be diminished; and the money issued for repairing fortifications, and other public services, should be frugally managed, and the accounts accurately examined. These proposals were directly pointed against the power and authority of the stadtholder; but they had such an appearance of patriotism, that they could not be openly opposed. Yet as they affected the interest of such a number of individuals, it was no difficult matter for the prince, without appearing in the dispute, to parry the thrust made at his prerogative, and procure a negative in the assembly. Thus Lewis again revived the dissensions of Holland, roused a faction which had for some time lain dormant, and once more gained such influence in the repub-

a lic, as enabled him to keep up the ball of contention, prevent all vigorous resolutions, maintain the provinces in a kind of subjection, and limit the authority of the stadtholder.

THE events of this year afforded a prospect to the stadtholder of a closer connection with England. His father-in-law, the duke of York, succeeded to the crown; and it was expected he would have exerted his influence with the French monarch to procure justice to the prince, with respect to his principality, and other territories, oppressed, impoverished, and seized by Lewis. He was fully apprised of all the grievances of which William had casually and fruitlessly sought redress. The marechal de Lorges came ambassador from Versailles, to compliment him on his accession: he had the fairest occasion of doing his son eminent service; but he refrained, and displayed a coldness which was soon after improved into invincible hatred. All the Dutch writers, contrary to the testimony of English historians, assert, that both the prince and the republic took every method of cultivating the friendship of James; and that his highness proceeded so far, upon the king's accession, as to intimate to the duke of Monmouth, then residing at the Hague, that he might look out for another asylum. Yet did these tenders of friendship produce no return: on the contrary, James was reserved, indifferent, and civil, to the prince and the states general. To the former he shewed some remains of the dislike he expressed to the marriage of the princess his daughter; and to the latter, his bigotted aversion to the liberty, the religion, and the national character of the Hollanders. Yet he affected complying with the temper of the nation, by declaring, that he would maintain the ballance of Europe with the steady hand of justice, and treat upon a level with the proud Lewis le Grande. His embassy however to the court of Rome afforded a bad prognostic, and became the subject of uneasiness, not only to the states general, the prince of Orange, and all the Protestant princes and powers, but even to Catholics, who wished well to Great Britain, and foresaw that the king's bigotry would subject him to the counsels of the pontiff, and connect him more closely with the house of Bourbon. Ronquello, the Spanish ambassador, is said to have intimated his apprehensions upon this head, by which he gave great offence to the monarch.

A. D. 1685.
State of the republic with respect to Great Britain.

THOUGH the duke of Monmouth had retired to Brussels, in consequence of the hint given him by the prince of Orange, great numbers of malcontents still resided in Holland, particularly the earl of Argyle, who was making the utmost preparations to return in an hostile manner to his native country, and continually spurring Monmouth to those ambitious projects which he was on the point of relinquishing. Skelton, the English minister, had notice of what was transacting. Accordingly he presented a memorial to the states, desiring the persons of the refugees might be seized, and the vessels freighted for conveying arms and ammunition to Great Britain stopped in the harbours, which he specified. He gave in a list of names obnoxious to the government; and the states seemed willing to shew the utmost respect to the court of London, but without violating the laws of hospitality. They ordered the search required to be made, after having hinted to the malcontents the necessity of withdrawing themselves and their effects. This has been urged by English writers as a proof that the Dutch government connived at the intended invasion; though, if we consider the artifices by which the disaffected subjects of Great Britain procured their arms, ammunition, and money, the protection afforded to all strangers by the fundamental laws of the constitution, the late dispute with the French king upon a subject of a similar nature, and a variety of other circumstances, it will appear evident, that the states were far from giving them any encouragement; and that they did all in their power to oblige the king of England, consistently with their honour, the principles of their government, and the humanity due to the unfortunate. The Continuation of Nuville<sup>a</sup>, indeed, affirms, that notwithstanding they had no reason to be satisfied with a prince who was the author of two wars, and had constantly fomented divisions between the king his brother and the republic, yet they presently complied with the envoy's demands, by sending copies of his memorials, and of his list, to all the towns and cities of the Seven Provinces, commanding the magistrates to make diligent search after the persons pointed at, and to oblige them to quit the territories of the republic. That the malcontents were actually embarked for Scotland before these orders were issued, was certainly one of the first public causes of discontent between the two nations. James alledged, that the states had assisted in stirring up rebellion among his subjects; and, to shew his resentment, he encouraged the Algerines to declare war afresh against the United Provinces.

HOWEVER solid and sincere the late peace concluded between their high mightinesses, and the piratical states of Algiers, might appear, the great commerce of Holland in the Mediterranean, and the valuable prizes every day before their eyes, together with the suggestions of the court of London, were too powerful temptations to be resisted by a barbarous republic.

King James excites the Algerines to a war with the republic.

rous, avaricious, lawless people. They therefore first began their piracies, and to sanctify those robberies with the name of justice. they published a declaration of war, in which were specified a variety of grievances, real or pretended, though they had never previously demanded redress. An incredible number of vessels fell into their hands, the crews of which were confined, the cargoes taken out, and the ships abandoned to the fury of the winds and waves, with perhaps one or two of the more helpless hands on board. It reflected but little honour upon James, that while every Christian port in Europe was shut against those violaters of equity, order, and the laws of society, they were in a manner protected in England. They had leave to sculk in the creeks and harbours on the English coast, to lay in wait for their prey, to retire thither when pursued, to sell their prizes, and to supply themselves with every necessary. This at least is the allegation of foreign writers; nor do we find it refuted, upon credible authority, by the apologizers of the errors of that unfortunate monarch. On the other hand, the states, by way of reprisal, altered their conduct, and now extended their protection to all the declared enemies of the king and government. They fled in crowds to take shelter under the wing of the republic, and the states thought themselves justified, in pursuing the dictates of humanity and hospitality, while they at the same time obtained their revenge. Sir Robert Peyton was among the number of the English refugees: he was highly obnoxious to the court, and screened himself against the king's resentment, by a timely retreat to Amsterdam, that universal asylum for distress, misfortune, and too frequently for villainy. James formed a design of seizing this exile by open violence, knowing the resolution of the states, not to surrender him in consequence of remonstrances. Certain natives of Great Britain, who held commissions in the Dutch army, were employed in this outrage on the laws of the commonwealth; and Skelton the envoy conducted the attempt in person. Peyton was seized; but he was rescued by the populace, who committed to prison the officers who had thus unjustifiably trespassed upon the constitution. The states remonstrated to the court of London, and in such lively terms, that the king thought proper to disavow all knowledge of the violence: however, when a process was formed against the criminals, when the laws were likely to take place, and their lives were in danger, James interposed, and requested that their punishment might be referred to him; and that, as they were subjects of Great Britain, they might be tried by the laws of their country. On this occasion the states shewed their respect for the king; they even paid him more deference than they had shewed for Lewis the Great, in the zenith of his power and glory. The French king's officer was condemned, and brought on the scaffold; the English offenders, though in the service of the states, were sent over to England, in hopes the king would have at least not countenanced them; but they were disappointed. James not only pardoned, but preferred the criminals to a higher rank in the army than they before enjoyed.

A. D. 1686. BESIDES these causes of mutual discontent, James enlarged the breach, by a revival of the antient disputes between the English and Dutch East India companies, with respect to the trade of both nations to Bantam, which the Dutch, by a revolution effected in the government of that country, had artfully monopolized. The English company indeed had presented a petition to the king, praying his interposition, and shewing the injury sustained by their commerce, from the arbitrary proceedings of the Hollanders in that quarter. They specified a number of violences committed by the Dutch, under the sanction of the young king of Bantam's name; they demonstrated their design of excluding all Europeans from that trade; they expected his majesty to procure them justice, reparation of their losses, and security for their future commerce. James mentioned the affair to the Dutch ambassador, and he denied the charge; upon which instructions were sent to the English minister at the Hague, to represent the complaints of the company to the states general. This produced conferences between the commissioners of the two companies, of which the reader has already had an account (A). From the king's so warmly patronizing the India company, and other circumstances, it was inferred at the Hague, that he wanted the opportunity of coming to an open rupture with the republic.

State of affairs between France and Holland.

WHILE the states kept a strict eye on all the occurrences that passed in England, they were not neglectful of the conduct of France. They endeavoured so to conduct themselves, with respect to the court of Versailles, as to maintain the tranquillity of the republic, and the repose of Europe. They suppressed all emotion, at the inhumanity shewn the French Protestants, and the cruelties committed in the principality of Orange. Party and

(A) It must be confessed that great artifice and chicanery appear in the answer of the Dutch deputies, to the charge exhibited by the English company. There remains no doubt that they were guilty of numberless violences, and that their design was to become the only commercial European power in Asia; but whether this was the proper season for James to enter upon fresh disputes, must be left to the judgment of those who are sufficiently acquainted with the situation of his affairs at this period. It is sufficient proof, that the Dutch did not act wholly upon the square, that the Danes and other nations made directly the same complaints as the English.

- a policy both contributed to prevent their interposing for the prince of Orange, and procuring him the justice he petitioned. They winked at many other acts of Lewis's despotism, out of dread of his power; yet with all their caution, a slight accident had almost embroiled them with that monarch. Two Dutch men of war, going to Villa Nova to wood and water, fell in with a French squadron of eight men of war, commanded by the duke de Mortemar. The French admiral required certain honours to be paid to the king's flag, to grant which the Dutch captains were not authorized. On their refusal, the duke fired a broadside, and an action ensued, which lasted for five hours. One of the Dutch captains, perceiving the superiority of the enemy, sheered off, the other bravely maintained the engagement, was killed, and his ship taken, after he had made
- b the French admiral pay dear for his victory. Immediately the count d'Avaux presented a memorial to the states general, demanding satisfaction for the insult offered to the king's flag. He alledged, contrary to all probability, that the Dutch were the aggressors, and confirmed his allegations with such menaces, as determined the states to send an embassy to Versailles, to put an end to the affair in the best manner possible. Notwithstanding justice and equity were on their side, it was found necessary to make concessions, and procure restitution of their ship, by mean submission. This commonwealth has indeed been always distinguished for temporising, and converting every incident, every despicable compliance to her own advantage. Pride in one or two instances blinded her to her interests: in general that and every other passion were made subservient to her avarice. While she
- c was making acknowledgments to Lewis, and imploring his pardon for injuries she had suffered, for presuming to stand in her own defence, this republic was harbouring the ingenious, diligent artificers, driven out of his dominions, and persecuted on account of their religion; she was establishing new manufactures upon the ruins of the French industry, and rendering the liberty of her constitution useful to the extension of her commerce. Hitherto the Dutch traded wholly with the commodities of other countries, now they tried to raise a foundation for trade among themselves, and they succeeded by dint of perseverance. They imported a breed of cattle from Jutland, and the northern kingdoms, which they fattened and exported to the neighbouring countries. They erected a variety of hardware manufactories, chiefly with a view to their East and West India colonies, and in a short
- d time they became the most distinguished of any people in Europe, for a happy knack in making toys and baubles, for which they found a rapid sale, not only among the barbarians of Asia, Africa, and America, but all the civilized nations of Europe.

- THE jealousy between the states and Great Britain in the mean time daily increased; and it was considerably augmented by the share the prince of Orange had in the famous league of Augsburg, which was supposed to operate so powerfully on the subsequent revolution in England; though we must confess we cannot discover by what means it acquired any influence in this event. The states took the alarm at the king's assembling his forces, issuing out commissions for repairing and augmenting his navy, assigning a stated annual sum of four hundred thousand pounds, to be issued quarterly out of the treasury for defraying the expences of the marine, and holding a powerful squadron in continual readiness. They suspected, from these formidable preparations, that some great blow was meditated; and their writers alledge, that the priests who swarmed about the king's person, and were presumed to be entirely acquainted with the secrets of his cabinet, insinuated, that the stroke was levelled against the republic, and that the French monarch would join his weight, to render it decisive. If we may credit the testimony of bishop Burnet<sup>c</sup>, this suspicion was not wholly without foundation. However this may be, James certainly had not laid aside the appearance of friendship for the republic. His envoy Skelton was recalled from the Hague, and succeeded by the marquis d'Abbeville, vested with the powers of envoy extraordinary. At his first public audience, this minister gave the states the strongest assurances of the king his master's regard for the republic, and firm resolution inviolably to observe all treaties concluded with the states since his accession. He endeavoured to dissipate all the apprehensions they had too rashly entertained, from the malicious suggestions of persons disaffected to his majesty's person and government; and he concluded with solemn protestations, that the preparations which gave birth to their fears, had no other object than the preservation of the repose of Europe, and the defence of the British dominions. In his private negotiation with the prince of Orange, he assured his highness, that the king had no design of injuring himself and the princess in their right of succession to his crown, in case of failure of direct male issue. Other matters were likewise treated of, in a variety of conferences the British minister had with the prince; but as they have
- e no relation to the general affairs of the republic, we shall omit them. Sufficient it is, that a resolution was taken of sending M. Dykvelde, in quality of envoy, to the court of

London, with instructions to expostulate boldly with the king, upon the measures he was pursuing at home and abroad, and to effect a better understanding between him and the stadtholder. Before the departure of this minister, Abbeville had presented two memorials, one upon the subject of the India commerce; and another, requiring, that doctor Burnet, an English clergyman, afterwards raised to the see of Salisbury, might be banished the territory of the state.

A. D. 1688.

THE negotiations in England and Holland turned upon the abolition of the penal laws, and the repeal of the test-act, to which the king wanted the prince of Orange's consent, who was now considered as presumptive heir to the crown, in right of his princess; but William did not seem inclinable to yield any of the liberties of the Protestant religion. He even declared positively, that he could not carry his respect to the king so far, as to sacrifice his religion to his inclination to oblige his father-in-law. This firmness determined the king to have recourse to violent measures. He made fresh levies, augmented his fleet, recalled by proclamation all the English seamen in foreign service, and by a letter to the states general, demanded the six British regiments in their service; a demand with which he was sensible the states would not, and could not comply. A civil answer however was returned; in which his majesty was given to understand, that no treaties, conventions, or articles, between the two nations, authorised their sending back the British troops, especially at so critical a conjuncture, unless the kingdom should be attacked by some foreign enemy. The arguments which the states urged in apology for their refusal were indeed forcible and irrefragable; but we can by no means agree with their writers, that the prince of Orange had no hand in procuring this resolution. If we may credit them, he had at this time no eye to the crown of England, because the queen was now declared pregnant; though we have the express testimony of all the English historians, that Dykvelde had private instructions from the prince, to treat clandestinely with the English malcontents, and that he executed his commission with equal secrecy and success. Bishop Burnet, who then resided at the prince's court, acknowledges that, previous to Dykvelde's departure, he held frequent conferences with the prince and princess upon the affairs of England, the discontents of the English nation, the danger which threatened the Protestant religion, and the other preliminaries to a revolution. Indeed the great concourse of the nobility and gentlemen of distinction at the prince's court, the correspondence he kept up in England, and the invitations which he laboured to procure from that country, are stronger proofs of his ambition and policy, than of his filial duty, his sincerity, or even his attachment to religion, which is often used as a cloak, by princes, to cover designs not authorized either by religion or morality &

AT this time the vacancy of the episcopal see of Cologne, for which prince Clement of Bavaria, and the cardinal of Furstenberg, were candidates, furnished the states general with a pretence for assembling an army in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen. The pretensions formed by the most Christian king justified this measure; and the augmentation of the English navy afforded them a specious handle for putting their marine in a posture of defence. Both were admirable masks for the prince of Orange, at this time making preparations to invade England. He had an interview in Westphalia with the electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the princes of Lunenburgh, and the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. To them he communicated his scheme, which was of so much consequence to the interests of religion and liberty, that they engaged for the protection of Holland during his expedition to England. A fleet of fifty large ships of war was equipped, and such a number of transports freighted, as would serve for the accommodation of twelve thousand land-forces. France and England were alarmed at these preparations, but neither could penetrate into the object in view. The count d'Avaux, however, received instructions to present a memorial to the states, expressing the king's astonishment at the mighty preparation they were making by sea and land, especially at a season of the year when the augmentation of the marine intimated some extraordinary enterprize. The marquis d'Abbeville, in the name of his Britannic majesty, supported this memorial by another, in which he insisted on his right of demanding the object of so extraordinary an armament. This remonstrance was followed by a second memorial from the French ambassador, in which he declared, that the intimate friendship subsisting between the king his master and the king of England, would oblige him not only to assist that monarch, should he be attacked, but also to regard the first act of hostility against England as a manifest violation of the peace, and a direct, formal design of coming to a rupture with France. To this memorial, which entirely consisted of menaces, and a declaration of Lewis's purposes, the states returned no answer: and with respect to d'Abbeville's remonstrances, they contented themselves with replying, that the preparations in England rendered it necessary for the republic to be upon their

a guard, especially as every power in Europe was busied in raising forces. Besides, they demanded an explanation of the treaty between France and England, in which the states thought themselves particularly interested<sup>2</sup>.

UPON any other occasion, so rough an answer would probably have produced a declaration of war: it now only drew another memorial from the English minister, and an assurance, that his majesty was ready to co-operate with the states in preserving the repose of Europe, and enforcing the treaty of Nimeguen. It was evident that James at length perceived his danger. He now betrayed symptoms of fear, and proceeded so far as to express his desire of contracting an alliance with the republic, which was disregarded, from a conviction that he was secretly in the interest of France, and actually in treaty with Lewis.

b The truth is, the states were so sensible of the weight it would give the republic in the scale of Europe, to have the prince of Orange on the throne of Great Britain, that they pushed this measure with the utmost vigour. This was the secret spring of all their motions: it was this that silenced the voice of faction, and rendered every man attached to his country, though possibly at enmity with the house of Orange, ready to promote with all his might the great design.

THE first direct confession of the destination of the armament proceeded from the pensioner Fagel, who frankly owned to the marquis d'Abbeville, that the prince of Orange, in consequence of an invitation from the English nobility, was determined to assist them in re-establishing the ancient constitution, which the king had entirely altered since his accession. Soon after the states published their reasons for assisting the prince with troops and shipping; and this declaration was followed by a manifesto, drawn up by the prince of Orange, explaining the motives by which he was actuated to undertake the intended expedition to England. Here he enumerated the grievances of the English nation, recapitulated the fruitless attempts which had been made for procuring redress, touched upon the supposed imposture in the birth of the prince of Wales; and professed his own and the princess's regard for the English nation, and for the liberties and religion of the people. Having thus paved the way to a measure which must unavoidably produce a rupture with France, the prince took his leave of the states, and embarking on the nineteenth day of October, sailed out a few leagues, when a storm arose, which scattered the ships in such a manner, that they were forced to put back, and a whole week elapsed before they could re-assemble at the place of rendezvous. A second time the prince set sail, had a favourable passage, arrived safe in England, and was joyfully received as the deliverer of the nation<sup>3</sup>.

Orange arrives in England.
A. D. 1689,

THE success of this expedition extremely embarrassed the court of Versailles. Lewis had already laid an embargo upon all the Dutch shipping in his ports, by which he violated an article of the treaty of Nimeguen, framed expressly for the mutual security of the commerce of France and Holland. What was still a greater violation of the laws of nations, the ships crews were forced by threats to enter into the king's service, by which means he manned a great number of men of war with little trouble. In apology for this conduct, Lewis urged the resolution said to be passed in the states to prohibit the importation of French manufactures, though his majesty had by an edict expressly forbid the importation into his dominions of Dutch herrings, and other commodities. His armies were already committing hostilities in Germany, and the dauphin commanded in person at the siege of Philipsburgh. It was not the interest of Lewis to multiply his enemies; but he saw that the prince of Orange's success in England would necessarily engage the Dutch to enter into the confederacy against him: it was therefore his business to anticipate their designs, and attack them before they could be assisted by the prince of Orange, and probably by the whole strength of the English nation. With this view he declared war against the republic, on pretence that their high mightinesses manifested, by their formidable preparations, their intention of breaking the treaty, and co-operating with the princes engaged in a league to oppose the elevation of the cardinal Furstenberg to the electorate of Cologne. It was no surprise to the states to see this declaration: it was expected, and soon answered by a counter-declaration, in which the assertion of the French monarch was refuted, and all the encroachments, violations, arbitrary proceedings, and oppressions committed by the court of Versailles since the peace of Nimeguen, were clearly enumerated. They demonstrated, that ambition, and the lust of conquest, were the causes of the invasion of the provinces in the year 1672: that necessity alone, and the valour of the prince of Orange, had forced Lewis to make peace with the republic in 1678; only to recover fresh vigour, and as it would now appear, to involve Europe again in the flames of war, from which, however, if he attended to his real interest, he could not expect to be a gainer. They urged, that the king paid no regard to general or particular treaties; that he loaded the Dutch commerce with every kind of imposition, and had actually put an entire stop to some branches a of trade, expressly regulated in a late treaty of commerce. Nothing could display in stronger colours his arrogance and injustice, than his seizing all the Dutch ships in his ports, and obliging the mariners to serve in his navy, without any other shadow of excuse for so flagrant a violence, than the republic's charging French commodities with the same incumbrances to which their own were subjected in the king's dominions. They affirmed, that all his assurances, by solemn ambassies, were only snares to lull the neighbouring states into security; his treaties of peace, necessary steps towards renewing the war; his word, his honour, and his faith, prostituted to the purposes of ambition, and the rage of conquest: in a word, that his whole conduct was a series of shuffling, tergiversation, tyranny, oppression, and perfidy. b

Nothing could be more keen, animated, and sarcastic, than the terms in which this declaration was couched. The states were sensible they could expect no favour from Lewis, and they determined to rouse the spirits of the people by this proof of their own courage, and evident detection of the artifices of the French monarch. Their frontiers were covered by a powerful army, conducted by prince Waldek, and composed of the troops of Brandenburgh, Lunenburgh, Hesse Cassel, and other German states, joined to the forces of the republic. They were opposed by the marechal de Humieres, and both armies were encamped on opposite banks of the Sambre. The prince repeatedly offered battle, which was constantly declined by the marechal, who was strongly entrenched, and watching every opportunity of taking the enemy at a disadvantage. c

A. D. 1690.
The battle of Fleuris.

THE whole preceding year was consumed in preparations, encampments, stratagems, and endeavours to bring on a decisive action. Spain, Germany, and Savoy, now declared against France; but Lewis had sent such numerous armies into the field as were sufficient to make head against all his enemies. His strength seemed to increase in proportion as they multiplied, and he was never so formidable as when he combated singly more than half the powers of Europe. Luxemburgh succeeded de Humieres in the command, and Waldek soon experienced, in the plains of Fleuris, the valour and capacity of the new general, who was the pupil, the friend, and the admirer of the illustrious Condé. The confederates were defeated after a violent conflict, about six thousand prisoners were made, all the cannon taken, and prince Waldek reduced to the necessity of acting defensively for the remainder of the campaign. d

NOTWITHSTANDING the Dutch were defeated at Fleuris, the troops behaved with uncommon intrepidity, and prince Waldek performed all that could be expected from consummate abilities. Luxemburgh did justice to both, and confessed that never was victory more obstinately contested, or a retreat more formidable than that of the Dutch infantry, who were exalted above the Spanish infantry at Rocroi. It was now the endeavour of the states to reinforce their army with all possible expedition, and to restore the spirit of the troops by rewarding their valour. A sum of money was distributed among the infantry, and the highest praises were bestowed upon their conduct. The regiments which had suffered most were relieved by fresh troops drawn out of garrison, the elector of Brandenburgh with a body of forces joined the army, and such vigorous measures were taken as prevented Luxemburgh's drawing any advantage from his victory. e

ENGLAND and Holland were now united in the strictest bonds of alliance, though the disturbances in Ireland prevented king William from embarking deeply in the affairs of the continent. To execute the great scheme proposed of humbling Lewis, it was necessary first to establish himself firmly upon his new throne, and cut off all hope from the unfortunate James of ever recovering his dominions. The Dutch and English fleets were lying at St. Helen's, when advice arrived that the French squadron had entered the Channel. On the twenty-third of July the admirals weighed, having express orders to fight the enemy, notwithstanding their inferiority. In all, the French fleet amounted to one hundred and nineteen sail, eighty of which were of the line, while the combined squadrons did not exceed fifty-six ships of the line, besides frigates. The van was led by the Dutch squadron, formed into three divisions, under the admirals Evertzen, Callenberg, and Vander Putten. Lord Torrington, the English admiral, commanded in the center. Off Beachy they came up with the enemy, and the Dutch began the engagement with the French van, led by the famous Chateau Renaud, who sustained the attack with great intrepidity, but was at last put in disorder, after a sharp action, which continued for three hours. He was however supported by another division of the French squadron, and the battle again renewed with the utmost vigour. As the English division lay at a considerable distance, the Hollanders were surrounded. Torrington endeavoured to extricate them, but with so much caution, that, perceiving their safety depended upon their own courage, the Dutch made one violent effort, f

- a effort, and happily broke through the enemy. It appears from the loss sustained, that the Dutch bore the whole burden of this engagement. Three of their ships were sunk, and an equal number stranded on the coast of Sussex, to which they set fire, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. Besides, they had several gallant officers killed, particularly the rear admirals Dick and Brockel, and captain Nordet, with a multitude of inferior officers and seamen. Next day the French came up with captain Varden Yees, in a sixty gun ship, disabled by the loss of her masts in the preceding action, and took him after a desperate resistance. In a word, it was universally acknowledged, that the Hollanders fought with the utmost skill and intrepidity, and that, had they been properly seconded, the enemy must have yielded the victory. So sensible were the states of the gallant behaviour of the admirals, that they received them with the highest respect, continued them in the command, and issued orders for repairing and augmenting the fleet with all possible dispatch; yet was it some mortification to see two states who had lately disputed the empire of the ocean, now foiled by an upstart maritime power, reared in the space of a few years by the care, vigilance, and genius of Colbert <sup>a</sup>.
- b

It was now expected the war on the continent would assume a favourable aspect. King William, by the battle of Boyne, had defeated the designs of the French monarch and the unfortunate king James in Ireland. He crossed the seas to preside at the congress at the Hague, the most splendid and numerous that had ever appeared. His public entrance into the Hague was magnificent; his arrival diffused vigour through the provinces; he was

- c considered as the head of the league forming against Lewis for the defence of public liberty; and the personal qualities of the prince of Orange received additional lustre from the British diadem. Nothing could exceed the joy and reverence with which he was received by the states, to whom he paid his first compliments. In a studied speech, his majesty acquainted them with the success of his endeavours to secure the liberty and religion of the people of Great Britain, with the state of affairs in Ireland, and with his resolution now to oppose in person all the enemies of the republic, to prosecute the war with vigour, and to employ the whole strength of his new dominions in curbing the insolence of France, and procuring an equitable, honourable, and solid peace for Europe.

- d HAVING dispatched matters with the states general, the states of Holland, and the council of state, William, in the next place, turned his attention to the business of the congress, which was composed of a great number of sovereign princes, and the plenipotentiaries of all the powers engaged in the grand alliance. He opened the conferences with a laboured, spirited harangue, recommending vigour and unanimity. He demonstrated, that the interests of every individual concerned in the league were comprized in the success of the confederacy: he enlarged on the power of the enemy, the daring ambition of Lewis, the number of his forces, and the ability of his generals, trained up under Turenne and Conde, the great masters of the military art. In the present circumstances action was more requisite than deliberation. All the principal fortresses, which formed the barrier of liberty, were possessed by the enemy, who would soon like a torrent over-run Germany and the Netherlands, if they were not checked by the most spirited efforts. Divisions, dilatory proceedings, or a failure of engagements, would prove equally fatal: it was in vain to oppose fruitless complaints, or unprofitable remonstrances, against injustice; the sword alone was the adequate protector of innocence, and avenger of wrongs. Neither the resolutions of a barren diet, nor the airy hope of sanguine persons, built on a chimerical foundation, but soldiers, action, courage, conduct, and unanimity, could withstand the proud elated Lewis. He concluded, that, for his own part, he would exert his utmost credit, employ his forces, expend his whole revenue, and hazard his person, in rescuing the liberties of Europe out of the hands of an insolent oppressor; and he doubted not but the Almighty would prosper his endeavours, if seconded by the same resolutions in all the other allies.
- e
- f Upon this the congress proceeded to adjust the proportions of money and troops which each of the parties engaged to furnish. The whole exceeded two hundred thousand men, of whom the republic sent thirty-five thousand. Next the operations of the campaign were concerted, every article of the alliance was fully explained, the conditions upon which peace would be accepted clearly determined, and the whole confederacy formed agreeable to that plan which William had delineated in his own mind, when he was no more than prince of Orange and stadtholder of Holland.

WHILE William was thus exerting himself to cement a powerful alliance against France, A. D. 1691. while he was performing every function of a great monarch, an able politician, and staunch assertor of liberty, the French monarch, perceiving that he should be deprived of the advantages he expected from the preceding campaign, was taking vigorous measures for continuing the course of his victories, which would infallibly at length tire out the confederates, and produce those solid benefits which he proposed, by making his chief push on the side of the Netherlands. He hoped to disconcert all the projects of his enemies by striking some signal blow, which should decide the fate of the war, before the allies could be ready to take the field. He relied much upon the dilatory proceedings, the tedious deliberations, and the dissensions which would probably arise in so heterogeneous a league, composed of such a variety of members, connected only, as he imagined, by one tie, that of their general animosity to France. His design was to attack Mons, and thereby open the gates of Brussels, Antwerp, and Liège. In a word, he perceived, that as yet the allies had neither troops nor magazines formed, equal to their mighty schemes; and it was upon these circumstances he founded his sanguine expectations. Besides, Lewis had prodigious magazines upon the frontiers; and his army was cantoned in such manner as to be assembled at the shortest notice. Hence he doubted not of being able to shake the credit of king William, and detaching from the confederacy some of the allies, by shewing them that the person they regarded as a hero, and their deliverer, was unable to protect them. It was with this view that the French troops were put in motion in the month of February, and that Mons was invested, before the allies had thought of taking the field. All William's endeavours could not relieve the besieged: they surrendered, and Lewis thus shewed his contempt of the grand confederacy. A medal was struck at Paris, representing a town besieged, with an army looking on, and the following explanatory inscription, Amat victoria testis; alluding to king William, who lay with his whole army, at Hall, a spectator of Luxemburg's triumph. Scarce any thing further was attempted during the campaign. Lewis returned to Paris, and William set out for England.

Disputes between Denmark and Holland.

NOTWITHSTANDING it was the mutual interest of Denmark and the republic to live on terms of amity, a variety of causes arose to disturb their friendship, and produce a rupture. Denmark, sensible that she commanded the trade of the Baltic, by means of the Sound, frequently made use of that circumstance to augment her revenue. She arbitrarily, and contrary to the faith of treaties, imposed new duties upon all merchandize passing through the Sound. The customs paid by Dutch vessels was rated by treaty; but this did not satisfy the Danish monarch. Without giving the states any previous intimation, he demanded an additional duty; and being refused, he seized upon twenty-four merchant-men in the port of Copenhagen. So gross a violation of all the treaties subsisting alarmed the Dutch: they sent an ambassador to Denmark, and his spirited remonstrances brought the northern monarch to reason. Conferences were held, the Dutch ships restored, the quarrel was compromised, and the trade of the provinces established upon the usual footing<sup>a</sup>.

A. D. 1692.

THIS year William, as chief of the confederates, sustained fresh mortifications. In the preceding campaign he was an eye witness to the glorious triumph of Lewis, in the reduction of Mons. It was now his fortune to erect new trophies to Luxemburg, by the fruitless attempts he made, at the head of a powerful army, to raise the siege of Namur. The loss of this city; and the bloody battle that ensued at Steinkirk, though they detracted nothing from the reputation of the king of Great Britain, proved extremely irksome to the states general, who beheld the Netherlands gradually falling into the enemy's hands, in despite of their utmost efforts. The feeble condition indeed of the Spanish provinces, obliged William to decline the offer of them made by Spain, and recommend the elector of Bavaria to the government, which however proved but a faint security. To preserve the residue of the Netherlands under the dominion of Spain, and prevent the exorbitant growth of France, by the addition of the ten provinces, was evidently the object of the grand alliance. Hitherto all attempts to regain what had been lost proved fruitless. France was every day adding to her conquests: it was necessary therefore to redouble the efforts to oppose her: All the powers engaged in the confederacy were sensible of the necessity of the most vigorous measures; but they shifted the burthen from their own shoulders. The emperor's favourite point was the making conquests on the side of Hungary: the German princes, nearest danger, could act only under the protection of the whole empire; and those more remote did not care to engage in the war, without a valuable consideration. The Swiss cantons studied only to convert their neutrality to the best advantage. Spain seemed declined in the use of all her faculties: her usual strength and vigour were vanished, and she relied entirely upon the maritime powers for her defence and security; England and Holland, indeed, of all the confederates, kept up to their engagements. They made up all deficiencies; and William blended indiscriminately the duties of a British monarch and a Dutch stadtholder. As the king over a great commercial people, he could not wholly abstract

a himself from the affairs of the continent: as the stadtholder of Holland, he was immediately interested in checking the progress of Lewis's conquests. But, unfortunately for his new subjects, he made no difference between the relative concern of the one nation, and the fundamental necessary interest of the other, in the safety of the Netherlands. Great Britain contributed perhaps more towards the war than the republic; yet could not that island expect an additional foot of territory by the most fortunate issue, though the people were accumulating debts, and laying the foundation of that enormous structure of public credit afterwards reared up, to the astonishment of all Europe.

THE French king did not confine himself to the efforts made by his generals in Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy. He projected a scheme which would have proved decisive, had it succeeded. This was a descent upon England, the measures for which had been so admirably concerted, that king James looked upon himself as already restored to his throne. As Lewis made no secret of the intended expedition, nothing was omitted by the queen of England, regent in the king's absence, to frustrate its effects; and the states-general heartily co-operated with her majesty, ordering a powerful squadron immediately to join the English admiral, though they yet smarted under the severe blow received in the last sea-engagement. On this junction the combined fleet amounted to eighty-eight sail, near double the number of Tourville's squadron, who was then waiting at La Hogue for the Toulon squadron, commanded by M. d'Etree. To the positive orders received from the French court to fight the English, before they should be joined by the Dutch fleet, may be attributed the miscarriage of this grand armament, which would otherwise have at least answered Lewis's purpose of making a powerful diversion. In hope that the junction of the fleets of England and Holland had not yet taken place, Tourville set sail, and encountered the enemy off Cape Barfleur on the twenty-ninth of May. The allies were descried in three divisions; admiral Allemonde, with the Dutch ships, leading the van; admiral Ruffel, with the English red squadron, composed the center; and Sir John Ashley, with the blue English squadron, being stationed in the rear. The engagement began between d'Amfreville, who led the French van, and Allemonde. The former bore down upon the Dutch, and made a very brisk attack, which was sustained with unshaken firmness. Tourville engaged the red squadron, and here the action was equally hot and furious. The rear divisions of both sides came up to support the centers, by which the battle became general, as far as the situation of the combined fleet would admit; for a calm, that ensued, prevented Ruffel's closing the line. Both sides fought with the utmost vigour and impetuosity for some hours, until so thick a fog arose as obliged the combatants to separate. This recess was, however, but of short duration: the fog was dispelled, and Tourville was seen profiting by the opportunity to withdraw from an engagement to which he found himself unequal. Rear-admiral Shovel had the address to gain the windward, and separate Tourville's division from the squadron destined to support him under Paunatier; by which the engagement was again renewed, and the French admiral inclosed between two fires. Never did French valour appear more conspicuous: after incredible efforts, Tourville broke through the enemy, and escaped a pursuit by the seasonable interposition of night. The fleets, however, were so scattered, that they could not get clear of the allies by the next morning. They kept the windward, which prevented his making the next day for La Hogue; but declined renewing the engagement. On the third day some of the divisions on both sides came to an action, in which the French were worsted. Several other rencounters happened, which always proved favourable to the confederates. At length, Tourville's squadron was entirely defeated and dispersed; and by the destruction of sixteen capital ships, including those burnt in La Hogue by Rooke and Allemonde, a fatal blow was given to the marine of France, and the descent on England wholly frustrated. Censure is the inseparable attendant on disappointment. Tourville was blamed by the French for engaging rashly. The English nation, who expected, from their great superiority, to see the French fleet brought in triumph into the river Thames, did not refrain from aspersing the character of Allemonde and the Dutch officers. They in their turn recriminated; and had even the boldness to assert, that admiral Carter<sup>b</sup>, a gallant English officer who lost his life in the engagement, was corrupted. They even threw reflections upon Ruffel's conduct, and highly blamed his disposition and tardiness in closing with Tourville, after the Dutch were engaged with the enemy's van. These, however, are the suggestions of prejudice and passion. Facts evince that both admirals behaved with the utmost gallantry. The states did justice to the valour and conduct of Allemonde; Ruffel became the darling of the English nation; and posterity must confess, that Tourville performed every duty of a brave and able seaman, who had received express orders to fight, against his own judgment.

A. D. 1693.

THOUGH the marine of France languished, in consequence of the fatal defeat at La Hogue, Lewis made the most spirited efforts to restore its strength and vigour. Animated by disappointment, that monarch, fruitful in resources, ordered all the ships in his ports to be equipped. All hands were set to work in building new vessels. So much business was carried on in the docks, that a spectator would have imagined the whole attention of the administration was employed in repairing the navy, and putting the fleet in a respectable posture. Before the month of June, a fleet as numerous as the former, but manned with persons who had scarce ever beheld a ship, put to sea under Tourville, who was kept in the command, notwithstanding the French nation was exasperated at his conduct in the last action. The intention of this armament was to intercept a large fleet of English and Dutch merchantmen, outward bound for Spain and Portugal. Sir George Rooke and rear-admiral Vandergoes were appointed to escort this fleet, with a squadron composed of thirteen English and eight Dutch men of war. On the twenty-third, turning Cape Vincent, they descried the French squadron; and the two men of war in the van exchanged a few broadsides with the enemy, after which they slackened sail, and waited for the remainder of the convoy. A calm prevented Tourville's coming up, and the van of his fleet did not chuse to run the hazard of entering deeply into an engagement, before they had a prospect of being supported. For four days the two fleets were in sight, without coming to an action: at last an opportunity offered to begin the attack, which Tourville embraced with great alacrity. His great superiority rendered the event almost certain; and Sir George Rooke was so sensible of the impossibility of saving the fleet under his convoy, by the utmost diversion he could make, that he endeavoured to decline battle, and make the first harbours he could on the coasts of Spain and Portugal. The enemy, however, came up with the sternmost ships, where they were gallantly received by three Dutch men of war, who fought with astonishing resolution, and for some time employed the whole strength of the French admiral. After they were surrounded, they obstinately refused to strike, until the greater part of the fleet under their convoy had got into the ports of Cadiz and Gibraltar. At last the Dutch ships were taken, and with them about thirty merchantmen; most of which Tourville either burnt or sunk, after taking out their cargoes. Tourville is justly censured for not dividing his strength, by which he could have prevented the possibility of an escape; and Sir George Rooke is perhaps no less blameable for not engaging, and thereby giving the merchant-fleet an opportunity of escaping. Both the French and confederates were displeased; the one that the whole convoy was not taken; the other, that any part should have fallen into the hands of the enemy. Tourville, to repair his error, attempted to burn the combined fleet in the bay of Cadiz; but such prudent measures had been taken, as disconcerted his project. He had no better success in another attempt he made to cut the merchant-ships out of the bay of Gibraltar. Two frigates, and several armed boats were employed in this enterprize; but the gallantry of the Dutch and English sailors obliged them to retire. He however renewed the attack, and sent fire-ships among the enemy, by which means seven Danish, four English, two Genoese, and six Dutch merchantmen were destroyed. Thus ended an expedition, unfortunate indeed to the allies, as well as to some neutral nations, and neither glorious nor beneficial to France.

Altercation between the Swiss cantons
and the allies.

MEAN time the campaign in Flanders went on with great vigour. The battle of Landen was lost by the allies, and the king of England's reputation was somewhat diminished for not avoiding an action, in circumstances when even a victory could have produced no solid advantage, and he could scarcely hope not to be defeated. France magnified her triumph, and the allies concealed their disgrace. Charleroi surrendered to Luxemburg, and this was almost the only fruit of a victory dearly purchased, and highly celebrated. The French general's address in improving every advantage, and the king of England's alertness in repairing an error, acquired both immortal honour. It was now that the confederates, and in particular the states-general, began to complain of the conduct of the Swiss cantons, who had engaged to observe an exact neutrality. The reduction of Namur, and the victories at Steinkirk and Neerwinde or Landen, were attributed to the valour of their troops in the service of France. The states alledged, that hiring out their forces to Lewis was contrary to the neutrality they professed, and an actual hostility against the allies. Besides, by the treaty of Milan, the cantons engaged that their troops in the French pay should only be employed in the defence of towns, of which Lewis was possessed in the year 1663. In consideration of this, Spain and the empire had paid them a subsidy, which was doubled at the approach of the present war, when they renewed their engagements not to act offensively. In all the late actions it appeared there had been near thirty battalions of Swiss infantry, who had fought with the same desperate fury and animosity, as if the cantons had been at actual war with the confederates. The courts of Vienna and Madrid now joined the states-general, in remonstrances upon this proceeding so contrary to the intention of treaties, and the faith of solemn engagements. The most spirited memorials were presented and disre-

- a garded. The emperor and Catholic king expressed their resentment, not only by stopping the subsidies, but by cutting off all communication between Switzerland and their Italian dominions. In particular, they forbade their subjects to sell corn to the Swiss, which, upon account of the scarcity then reigning in France, put the cantons to great necessity; but even this could not prevail on them to withdraw their forces, and renounce their engagements with Lewis, who buoyed them up with lofty promises, and encouraged them by some real advantages. They even declared to the envoys of Spain and the empire, and to the deputies of Holland, that they would lay themselves under no restraint, though at the same time they had no intention of giving offence to the allies. At last the affair was discussed at a diet at Baden. Expedients were proposed; but they proved insufficient and unsatisfactory to all parties. Yet the interposition of the Protestant cantons, and the resolution formed by several of the Catholic divisions of this republic, influenced the emperor and king of Spain to remove the prohibition respecting grain, and again to open the communication between Switzerland and their dominions <sup>a</sup>.

- While the confederates were endeavouring to weaken the common enemy, by gaining over some of the best troops in the French army, an occasional congress sat at Cologne, composed of ambassadors from England, Holland, the emperor, the electors of Treves, Cologne, Brandenburg, Bavaria, Saxony, and Palatine, the landgrave of Hesse, and bishop of Münster. The design of this congress was to reconcile all the jarring interests of the confederates, to determine the different proportions of expence, and to accelerate all the previous steps to opening the campaign. Unhappily, contentions arose about the chief command of the army on the Rhine, which could not fail of prejudicing the interest of the confederacy, and proving as serviceable to France as if an actual ally had been gained. Nor was France more fortunate in this particular than successful in the intrigues carried on at the Porte, to retard the pacification in treaty between the Emperor and the Grand Signior. Such influence and credit had the French ambassador acquired in the divan, that Heemskirk, the Dutch envoy, could neither obtain an audience, nor an answer to the proposals which he had delivered in writing to the vizier. It is true, he was treated with great respect, and the denial of his request palliated by apologies and pretences of the necessity of waiting until the arrival of lord Paget, expected upon an embassy from England; but it was evident, on that nobleman's appearance at court, that the allies had nothing to expect. The vizier expressed the same backwardness to a negotiation: at last he threw off the masque, and began openly to make preparations for opening the campaign.

The Dutch envoy is refused an audience at Constantinople.

- LEWIS* was thus sweeping all before him in the cabinet and the field, when the two maritime powers were preparing to wipe off the disgrace their fleet had lately sustained, and to repair the loss by some stroke, which should at least weaken the enemy, if it should contribute nothing to their own emolument. The diligence employed in equipping a fleet in England and Holland attracted the eyes of all Europe. It was obvious, that resentment spurred them on to level a mortal blow, and it soon appeared where the stroke was aimed, by the arrival of the combined fleet before St. Malo's. This, however, formed only a part of the scheme concerted by the allies. No more than twelve ships of the line, four bomb-ketches, and ten brigantines, were sent to bombard this place. The squadron anchored (November 13) before Quince fort: three of the bomb-vessels, with a number of brigantines and well-boats, bore down and anchored within half a mile of the town. They continued firing for five hours, and were then obliged to tow off, from an apprehension of being grounded. For several subsequent days they continued to throw in bombs, with frequent intermissions; and at length, under favour of a brisk gale, a dark night, and a strong tide, they sent in a prodigious fireship of three hundred tons burthen, which would probably have reduced the town to ashes, had she not, happily for the inhabitants, struck upon a rock, on which the engineer set fire to the train. The explosion was dreadful: it shook the whole town like an earthquake, broke all glass and earthen ware for three leagues round, and unroofed three hundred houses. The curtain towards the sea was broke down, and, had there been a sufficient number of land-forces on board the squadron, the town might easily have been taken by storm <sup>b</sup>. Such was the issue of the expedition to St. Malo's, which struck a panic into the inhabitants of the whole coast of France, and evinced the French king of the power and spirit of the two maritime allies, though it produced no other consequence.

St. Malo's bombarded.

- The winter produced overtures for a peace. Lewis had reduced cities, gained battles, A. D. 1694; and dispersed fleets; yet, in the midst of victory and triumph, he wished for an accommodation upon terms not injurious to his honour. Already he had dispersed, at the courts of the German princes, a manifesto containing his pacific sentiments, and conditions of peace to the emperor. These proposals, though advantageous to the imperial court, were rejected: however, not discouraged with one repulse, Lewis applied himself to the king of Great Britain and the states general, by means of the Danish envoys at London and the Hague, who presented memorials, with a project for a general peace. To the states were represented the particular advantages they must derive from accepting the proposals. A barrier was offered, that should remove all inquietude and cause of apprehension in the United Provinces. Mons and Namur it was intended should be ceded to Spain, Charleroi should be demolished, the town and citadel of Huy were to be restored to the bishop of Liege, and Dinant and Bouillon were to be indemnified, by uniting to the bishopric such a portion of the dutchy of Luxemburg as should be assigned by arbiters. The Danish envoy added, that the states general ought to be satisfied with the power of obtaining so important restitutions, and of terminating to so much advantage a war in which the allies could not possibly think they had been very fortunate. He likewise took it upon him to declare, that the most Christian king would make no attempts to extend his dominions on the side of the Netherlands; and that, from his present pacific disposition, such farther conditions would be granted as should be found just and equitable. Neither the king nor the states chose to enter upon negotiations, without the concurrence of the other allies; and the emperor had not only rejected the proposals, but sent prince Lewis of Baden to England, to keep the English steady in their engagements. He took the Hague in his way, had an audience of the states, warmly represented to them the necessity of continuing the war, and dispelled all doubts which might arise about the expediency of trying the fortune of another campaign. In truth, king William had not yet satiated his revenge. Every general action had proved unfortunate, and he panted after an opportunity of wiping off the disgrace of so many defeats. The states were intirely led by his opinion, and that party which had strenuously opposed the prince of Orange, resigned itself intirely to the direction of the king of Great Britain: such influence had he acquired since his accession to the throne.

Fresh disputes between Denmark and Holland.

DENMARK, finding her mediation rejected, determined to convert this circumstance to her own advantage. The states general, she was sensible, would be so deeply engaged in war as to be in no condition to attend to the minute affairs of commerce. The opportunity for renewing the old disputes about the duties of the Sound was favourable.
 His Danish majesty; therefore, without paying any regard to the late accommodation, or the neutrality professed, began first to intimate his intentions, by avowedly assisting the French monarch. In this the Swedes concurred with him: both had carried on a prodigious commerce with France during the war; they even became the purveyors of that kingdom for corn, naval stores, and all the commodities of the North. At this the allies connived, while there remained hopes of inducing those powers to accede to the confederacy. So far England and the allies in general were concerned; but Holland had complaints of a private nature, in which the Dutch commerce alone was interested. His Danish majesty had ordered the antient duties of the Sound to be exacted from all Dutch shipping; and on their refusal, they were seized and brought to Copenhagen. These concurring circumstances determined the states to come to extremities; and the king of England joined issue with them about the expediency of making reprisals, and punishing the northern powers for a breach of treaty and professed neutrality. It was resolved to make both the kings of Denmark and Sweden sensible, that, notwithstanding the maritime powers were engaged in an important war, they had strength and courage enough to resent the insults of neutral states. Accordingly the commanders of the English and Dutch men of war and privateers had instructions to stop, examine, and seize all Danish or Swedish shipping bound to French ports, or laden with such commodities as seemed destined for the markets of that kingdom. The orders were punctually observed: several ships were taken, but none condemned, as the experiment was made only to intimidate the northern powers, and not with a view of coming to an open rupture. The Dutch went farther. They stopped, in different ports of Holland, to the amount of twenty-four Danish ships, of which they gave notice to the Danish envoy, declaring they should be detained, until restitution was made of the Dutch ships at Copenhagen, and the owners amply indemnified for all the losses they might have sustained by their detention. A conduct so spirited soon produced the expected effect. Sweden not only avoided making reprisals, but even joined her mediation to the emperor's, in reconciling the king of Denmark and the republic. In consequence the ships were mutually restored, the treaties concerning the duties of the Sound renewed, and all things placed on the former footing <sup>a</sup>.

In general, the operations of this campaign proved more fortunate to the allies than any of the preceding. Several places had been recovered from the enemy, no battle was lost, a and the French king suffered more by the death of marechal Luxembourg than if half his army had perished: besides, the coasts of his kingdom were kept in perpetual alarm by the squadrons of England and Holland. By this means a great number of troops were kept stationed towards the coasts, and a considerable revulsion was made from that strength which Lewis would otherwise have exerted in the Netherlands. Brest was bombarded by the combined fleets; Dieppe afterwards met with the same fate, and more than half the town was laid in ashes; adverse winds probably saved it from total destruction. Having finished this business, the allied fleet proceeded to Havre de Grace, where they began bombarding with such success, that in a few hours the town was on fire, and before they quitted their station the citadel almost demolished: in a word, an universal panic seized the inhabitants b of the coast; the innocent industrious subjects were punished for the ambition of the sovereign, and a method of waging war was now adopted by civilized nations, which would be regarded with horror by the most barbarous.

WHILE the grand armament was thus employed in desolating the enemy's country, a Dutch squadron of eight men of war, under the conduct of Hidde de Vries, fell in with the famous du Bart and his squadron of seven ships of the line and three frigates. The Dutch admiral had a considerable fleet under his convoy, and would if possible have declined an engagement; but du Bart pursued, overtook, and attacked him between the Meuse and the Texel. The dispute proved obstinate. Du Bart fought with his usual intrepidity: he boarded de Vries, and though vigorously sustained, was repulsed with loss. Had the Dutch captains supported their admiral, the Frenchman would have found himself roughly handled; but the terror of du Bart's name kept them aloof, while de Vries, covered with wounds, was singly engaged. The event was unfortunate: he was taken prisoner, and great part of the merchant fleet under his care fell into the hands of the enemy (A). Sea-fight between the French and Dutch fleets.

ON the return of the squadron to Holland, all the captains were cashiered, and the states consoled for their loss by news from the East Indies that Pondicherry had surrendered to the governor-general of Batavia, with all the artillery, stores, and merchandize belonging to the French company. Upon the whole, the confederates had greatly the advantage by sea this season. Besides the incidents we have mentioned, they relieved Barcelona, blocked up Tourville, and bombarded Dunkirk and Calais. Dunkirk had, for time immemorial, been d the great rendezvous of privateers in every war. Even as far back as the reign of Philip II. of Spain, the commerce of the Netherlands was greatly disturbed from this quarter, and frequent attempts had been made to destroy the town and harbour. It had successively been in the hands of the Spaniards, French, and English; and Lewis found means to have it restored to him for a sum of money in the dissolute reign of Charles II. The allies had long meditated an attack on Dunkirk; but it was always laid aside on account of the hazard and difficulty of the enterprize. At last Sir Cloudesley Shovel set sail from the Downs on the fourteenth of September, and arrived before the harbour with a squadron of thirteen English and six Dutch ships of the line, and a great number of frigates and bomb-ketches. The garrison and inhabitants were greatly alarmed: they sent to marechal Villeroy, then at e Ypres, upon the first appearance of the fleet, and he came to their assistance with two regiments of infantry, and one of dragoons. Shovel was ambitious of aspiring after glory, and eager to collect laurels; but all his endeavours were frustrated by the strength of the place, and the vigilance of the garrison. In short, he returned, after having thrown the place into consternation, and alarmed Calais by some bombs which he threw into the town.

TOWARDS the close of this year, the theological controversies that had so long disturbed the provinces were now again revived. King William, before his accession to the throne of England, had silenced some rising disputes, by his authority as stadtholder. He was now again forced to interpose, and it was at his request that the states of Holland and Friseland published an ordonnance on the eighteenth day of September, for the preservation of the peace of the reformed church, and the tranquillity of the provinces. By this regulation, equally prudent and necessary, it was ordained, that all doctors, professors, and lecturers in divinity, together with the clergy of the reformed church of Holland and Friseland, should conform in all their writings, preachings, and lectures, to the formulary contained in the catechism, confession, and canons of the national synod of Dordrecht; and that they should live in the utmost cordiality, charity, and brotherly affection, without Religious disputes in Holland dispute, discussion, or controversy upon points already settled by the church. That with a respect to certain difficult matters left undetermined by the national synod, these they were ordered not to touch upon, or explain any otherwise than was authorized by the scriptures, and the general sense of the synod of Dordrecht. That they should introduce into their writings, sermons, lectures, or public courses of every kind, no uncommon axioms, no disputed principles, no novel opinions or doctrines: in a word, they were ordered to abstain from whatever could raise doubts, create schisms or divisions among the people; and if, through inadvertence, any of them should have given room for disputation, they were required to retract, or explain what they had advanced, agreeable to the established faith. All professors were farther enjoined from encouraging their pupils to apply philosophy to the mysteries of the Christian religion. They were ordered to confine this kind of reason- b ing to matters purely philosophical, and not to examine by the light of reason what was intended by the Author of our being to exceed reason. Upon the whole, the pastors of the church were fervently requested to be vigilant over their flocks, and to cultivate sobriety, decency, good order, and devotion among all ranks and degrees of the people. The ordonnance had a good effect, and suppressed in the birth controversies which might in time have created much trouble to the government b.

A. D. 1695.

THE operations of the succeeding campaign retrieved the reputation of king William; but it ought to be remembered, that marechal Luxemburg was now dead, and the command of the army given to Villeroi, a general neither equal to the marechal in capacity nor experience. Namur, defended by Boufflers at the head of a numerous garrison, and c covered by a formidable army, surrendered to king William; and the French king, in revenge, ordered Brussels to be bombarded c. This was followed by the bombardment of Calais, and some attempts upon other sea-ports on the coast of France. But these successes, though they inspired the allies, weakened Lewis, and drew the war nearer an issue, produced no immediate advantage. The states general had prosecuted the war with great vigour, in hope of obtaining such a peace as would recompense the expence and trouble of supporting vast armies and fleets. It was expected that every campaign would be the last, and this encouraged the people to submit to the heavy taxes with which they were loaded. Their frequent disappointment irritated them, and in all the provinces they began to exclaim loudly against measures calculated only to oppress the industrious subject, and d

A new tax laid upon burials, by the magistrates of Amsterdam, was highly resented by the populace; though the intention was to abolish a pernicious custom, that prevailed in almost all the towns of the United Provinces, of giving public entertainments, of feasting, and rioting, upon occasions where decency required the most solemn conduct and strict temperance. No sooner was the resolution of the magistrates known, than some evil-disposed persons excited a popular tumult, by persuading the vulgar, that all who were unable to pay the tax must be buried with such marks of ignominy as would render infamous the memory of the deceased, and add insult to poverty. Every thing was done to correct this prejudice; but the mob continually increased. The whole rabble of Amsterdam, foreigners and natives, assembled to oppose the regulation; and there were not e wanting several substantial citizens who regarded the new tax as unjust and iniquitous. The mob threatened to set fire to the city; all was in confusion, shops were shut up, and every kind of business at a stand. It was difficult to apply remedies to so desperate a disease: the military force in the city was insufficient to disperse so vast a concourse. The seditious were emboldened by the defenceless condition of the magistracy: they flew to the house of M. Boreel, one of the principal persons in the city, forced open the doors, poured in like a torrent, pillaged, destroyed, and threw into the canal his elegant and rich furniture. By this time capt. Spaarogge had collected a body of soldiers, with which he hastened to the defence of Boreel's house. He fired upon the mob; but was attacked with such fury, that he was forced to retreat to his own house. Thither the mob pursued, destroyed all before them, and committed f every violence of which an incensed brutal populace is capable. Happily for Amsterdam, night came on before they could proceed to farther business: this determined them to postpone the work until next morning; and in the mean time every man retired quietly to his own dwelling, as if nothing had passed. By day-light placards were fixed up in all public places, giving notice, that the tax, which had given so much offence, should not take place. Orders were likewise issued for all the burghers and soldiers to assemble under arms. Endeavours were also made to mount a few companies of horse, which were composed of all the young gentlemen in the city, persons of distinction in public offices, and rich merchants. These precautions, however, did not prevent the rabble from assembling, and attacking in a body the house of Kirby, the English consul, who, they alledged, had g

- a suggested the idea of a tax upon burials. Here they were repulsed with great vigour; upon which they turned their indignation against a Jew, distinguished by the name of the rich Pinto. To this resolution Amsterdam probably owed its safety. In an instant the whole Jewish quarter was in arms for the defence of their prodigious wealth, amassed with indefatigable industry. To them the burghers joined themselves, both marching in good order against the seditious, who, struck with the formidable appearance of glittering arms, began to disperse. Some were seized loaded with rich plunder, and immediately hanged; which produced such an effect, that in the space of a few minutes the streets were intirely cleared, and the city restored to its former tranquillity. However, it was thought advisable to remove all cause of fresh insurrections, and to annul the edict passed for levying the new imposition. The whole affair ended with the publication of a great reward to whoever should discover the authors of this sedition. It was shrewdly suspected that some persons, who were enemies to the magistracy, had excited the people; but proofs never appeared to justify the suspicion<sup>a</sup>.

- NOTHING considerable this year was performed in the Netherland; and as to the naval operations, they were equally unimportant. The only incident that merits notice, is the misfortune of a fleet of Dutch merchantmen homeward-bound from Portugal, which fell in with du Bart's squadron of privateers. The merchant fleet, amounting to two hundred sail, was under the convoy of five frigates, who were attacked by the enemy's largest ships, while the others were dealing destruction among the trading vessels, thirty of which they had taken. The frigates defended themselves vigorously, but were at last overpowered, one only escaping. Scarce was the action finished when the victorious du Bart descried a squadron of Dutch men of war, upon which he set fire to all his captures, after unloading the most valuable effects, and taking all the crews prisoners, and made the best sail he could out of the reach of danger.

- ABOUT the close of the year the duke of Savoy detached himself from the confederates, accepted of the terms proposed by Lewis, and thus paved the way for a general pacification. The duke went farther; he not only made peace with France, but joined his troops to the forces of that kingdom, which enabled Lewis to reinforce his army in the Netherlands with several regiments drawn from Italy. Probably this defection of an ally proved fortunate to the confederates, as it inclined them to listen to the conditions proposed by the French monarch, who declared that he had now sustained a war singly against all Europe, for several successive years, with no other view than to establish the tranquillity of Christendom on a more solid basis. The king of England saw the difficulties that would arise in procuring the supplies for continuing the war; the states general were not deaf to the clamours of the provinces, against the burthen of taxes; both were sensible of the mischiefs to be apprehended from Poland should the French interest prevail at the ensuing election; and the confederates in general were aware of the danger, that other powers might follow the example of Savoy, and strike up a separate peace. It became now a very serious question, Whether the crisis was not arrived that rendered it highly expedient to sheath the sword? France appeared forward for an accommodation, and even went so far as to demand passports for M. Callieres, to go to Holland to lay the basis of a general pacification.

- WITH the king of England's approbation the states had granted the passports required, and M. Dykeveldt was appointed to confer with the ambassador. M. Callieres had been instructed to grant all that was demanded by the imperial court, respecting the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen. This M. Dykeveldt reported to the deputies appointed for foreign affairs, who transmitted it to the states general. After mature deliberation the states declared, that as the French monarch had made the concessions required by the court of Vienna, matters were now in such a situation, that, in concert with their allies, they offered mediation of Sweden might be accepted. A transcript of their resolutions was sent to the different courts in Europe; but it soon appeared, that neither the emperor nor the Catholic king were satisfied that the conditions offered by France were either satisfactory or explicit. Yet were the Spaniards forced to sign a treaty of neutrality for Italy, whereby Lewis was set at liberty to employ all his strength in Germany and the Netherlands.

- THIS was the situation of affairs during the winter, and every thing indicated a peace; yet did all the parties resolve to treat sword in hand. In the spring the usual rivalry arose, who should first commence hostilities; and the Dutch were earlier in their preparations this year than any of the preceding: however, as the whole allied army was not assembled, no considerable enterprize was undertaken. The French would likewise seem to have given their chief attention to naval expeditions, and attempts to ruin the commerce of the maritime powers. This spring their cruizers had been extremely successful. A small squadron set sail from Dunkirk in the month of February, encountered a fleet of Dutch and Eng- a lish merchantmen off Ostend, and made prize of fourteen vessels, most of which belonged to Holland. Three weeks after another fleet of Dutch merchantmen, under the convoy of three men of war commanded by admiral Wassenaar, fell in with a French squadron in the bay of Biscay. The enemy were greatly superior in strength; but Wassenaar fought with great gallantry, and defended himself until he was mortally wounded, and his ship shattered in pieces, when the next in command struck. The fate of the admiral determined the fortune of the whole fleet, the two other men of war made but a short resistance, and with them were taken twelve rich merchantmen, laden with wool, cotton, hides, and other valuable commodities <sup>c</sup>.

Ryswick.

THIS was the last act of hostility that passed between France and Holland. As early as the month of February all the allied powers, Spain excepted, had agreed to accept the mediation of Sweden, which was accordingly notified in form to the Swedish minister at the Hague. By the ninth day of May the congress was opened at Ryswick, when France proposed, by way of preliminaries, that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should form the basis of the present negotiation; that Strasbourg should be restored to the emperor on the same condition as before the war; that Luxembourg should be restored to Spain, together with Mons, Charleroi, and all the places in Catalonia, taken since the peace of Nimeguen; that the city and citadel of Dunkirk should be ceded to the bishop of Liege; that restitution should be made to the other allies, of all conquests since the peace b of Nimeguen; and that Lorraine should be restored, agreeable to the conditions of the said pacification. In a word, after tedious conferences the treaty was at length signed, and peace restored to Europe, upon conditions equally glorious and advantageous to the allies, and so unpopular in France, that the plenipotentiaries dared not for some time to appear in public. The reader will find them specified in former parts of this work. c

The HISTORY of DENMARK.

S E C T. I.

Containing the Geography of Denmark; the Laws, Religion, Manners, and other Particulars, which characterize the present State of that Kingdom.

<sup>a</sup> IT is agreed upon all hands, that the kingdom of Denmark is one of the most antient monarchies in Europe, as a series of kings, either fabulous or true, may be traced in the Danish historians from the year one thousand and thirty-eight before the birth of our Saviour; that is, for the space of two thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine years.

How this part of Scandinavia, formerly called Cimbrica Chersonesus, acquired the name of Denmark, is a point greatly disputed among antiquarians, and still as doubtful as the etymology of most other names. Some believe the Danes to be the progeny of the antient Danai; and many of their kings have boasted of their having sprung in a direct line from Antenor. Others affirm, that they are the descendants of the antient Dabi, a people of Scythia, who, by an easy corruption, came in progress of time to be called Dani, and the country Dani-mark, or the land of the Dani; Marc, or Mark, signifying a country in several of the dialects of the Teutonic. But the most probable opinion is that of Saxo Grammaticus, the most antient and best Danish historian. According to him the Danes are so called from Dan, the son of Humble, the first founder of the Danish monarchy; and Denmark, compounded of Dan and Marc, that is, the country of Dan<sup>a</sup>; which etymology we shall retain, without entering upon an ocean of criticism and conjecture, in which, perchance, we might overwhelm ourselves and our readers (A).

<sup>c</sup> BEFORE we enter upon the history of Denmark, we shall first give a description of the country; the genius and character of the people; the nature of the soil, and produce of the countries under the dominion of the king of Denmark; the forces and revenues of the kingdom; the laws, government, religion, and manners of the country, with every other particular that relates to the present state of the people. If we consider only the extent of dominion, the king of Denmark may justly be reputed one of the greatest princes of Europe, his title being that of king of Denmark and Norway, of the Goths and Vandals, duke of Sleswick, Holstein, Stormar, and Dithmarsh, earl of Oldenburg and Delmenhorst; all which countries he actually possesses, except a moiety of the duchy of Sleswick, belonging to the duke of Holst. in-Gottorp. Denmark, including Holstein, in which the king has an undivided moiety, is bounded by the sea called Categate, towards the North; by the Baltic on the East; by the river Elbe, which separates it from Bremen, on the South; and by the duchy of Saxe-Lawenburg towards the South-East; extending from 54 degrees 40 minutes, to 58 degrees 20 minutes North latitude.

<sup>d</sup> BESIDES which, the kingdom of Norway, separated from Denmark by the Categate, includes a space of about 11 degrees in length; that is, from 59 to near 71 degrees North latitude, being bounded by the ocean towards the North and West; by the kingdom of Sweden and Swedish Lapland on the East; and by the Categate sea to the South. It is a long narrow country, enclosed on the one side by the ocean, and on the other by the high barren mountains called Dofrine, which divide it from Sweden; most geographers reckoning it about eight hundred miles in length, and one hundred in breadth<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> PREVIOUS to the war with Sweden, which ended in the year 1660, the provinces of Schonen, Halland, and Bleking, belonged to the crown of Denmark. They were wrested from it by the famous Charles Gustavus, and could never since, notwithstanding frequent attempts, be recovered, though the richest provinces belonging to his Danish majesty. Thus Denmark, at present, is on every side circumscribed by the sea, except a neck of land about three Danish miles over, by which it joins to Holstein.

The general
division of Denmark into provinces.

THE dominions of the king of Denmark are generally divided into six grand districts or provinces, viz. Denmark properly so called, comprehending under it the islands of Zealand, Funen, Langland, Laaland, Falstria, Mona, Samsøe, Arroe, Bornholm, Ankout, Læssø, and that part of the continent called North Jutland. 2dly, The duchy of Sleswick, or South Jutland. 3dly, The duchy of Holstein. 4thly, The earldoms of Oldenburg and Delmenhorst. 5thly, The kingdom of Norway: and, 6thly, Iceland, with the islands lying in the northern seas. Of this large tract, Jutland, in extent and fertility, is the most considerable division, though the islands have the advantage in point of situation, and especially Zealand, in which stands Copenhagen, the capital of the Danish dominions, and the residence of the princes.

Island of Zea-
land.

THIS island is nearly of a circular form, measuring about sixty leagues in circumference. The channel called the Sound, divides it from Schonen; the strait called the Great Belt, from the island of Funen; and from the islands Mona, Falstria, and Laaland, it is separated by a narrow channel to the southward. Its fertility is not extraordinary, though it produces a sufficient quantity of rye for the consumption of the inhabitants, but no other sort of grain. The face of the country is prettily diversified with little hills, woods, and lakes; but in all Zealand there is not one river, and only a very few brooks sufficient to turn a mill. With hardly any meadows, it produces great abundance of hay; all the grass springing up on the borders of corn fields, and banks of lakes and brooks, short, but sweet and nourishing. The lakes are well stocked with fish; the cattle numerous, small, and generally lean, owing to the necessity of keeping them within door for at least eight months in the year. In general the climate is but indifferent, especially near the capital, where, from the low situation, the air is rendered unwholesome by thick fogs; however, a gentleman who long resided at Copenhagen, in quality of envoy from his Britannic majesty, observes, that he seldom saw any of the natives afflicted with colds of the lungs, owing, as he imagines, to the atmosphere's being purified by the great consumption of beech wood in firing, the only sort of timber found in any quantity in Zealand. Here, as well as in almost all the other parts of Denmark, are only two seasons of the year, winter and summer; for, from the extremity of cold, the air immediately changes to an almost insupportable heat, and suffocating gross warm atmosphere, by which myriads of flies and vermin are generated.

Copenhagen,
the capital.

COPENHAGEN, the capital of Denmark, is situated in the latitude of 56 degrees two minutes North latitude, and 12 degrees 53 minutes longitude, reckoning from the meridian of London. This city is neither very large nor antient, though the precise date of its foundation is disputed (B). In extent it approaches the nearest to Bristol, says Molesworth, of any of our English cities. The walls inclose a great deal more ground than is occupied by houses; however, as they were daily encreasing in his time, and that Denmark has not been since exhausted by any considerable wars, it is probable the city has received great improvements and additions. Its advantageous situation for trade, and the excellency of its harbour, are not to be surpassed, and were Copenhagen a free port, there is no doubt but it would soon become the emporium of the commerce into the Baltic. The harbour is surrounded by the fortifications of the town, and the entrance so narrow, that only one ship can enter at a time; besides which, it is shut up in the night by a strong boom laid across, defended on the one side by the cannon of the citadel, and on the other by a strong blockhouse, well mounted with heavy artillery. The whole haven, containing five hundred sail of large ships, is enclosed by a wooden gallery, close to which every ship has her appointed station; a circumstance that adds greatly to the beauty and conveniency of the scene, than which nothing can more be rich and regular, when a number of shipping happen to lie in port. The city is strong, both by nature and art; the situation being marshy, deep canals cut all round, and the fortifications executed agreeable to the best modern improvements; yet the works are chiefly composed of turf and earth. Experience has shewn its strength, it having sustained two remarkable sieges against a fine Swedish army, flushed with victory, and headed by the most magnanimous princes of their age. It is probable indeed, from these instances, that an enemy may carry on their approaches more easily in the winter than in the summer, the dykes being then covered over with ice, upon which the Swedish army marched. Its security, however, in this particular, consists in the impossibility of an army's keeping the field long, amidst the rigorous winters of all northern

(B) A castle was first built on this spot in the year 1168, by archbishop Wide, as a protection against the pirates, which at that time swarmed in the Baltic. The conveniency of the situation, and the security which the castle afforded, induced a number of the inhabitants of the island to resort thither, by which means it in time became a fine city and the capital.

- a countries. As to the buildings of the town, they are in general mean and despicable; even the king's palace is surpassed by the houses of private gentlemen in other countries. There are, notwithstanding, a few good public buildings, such as the change, arsenal, and observatory, erected by order of that excellent prince Christian IV. to whom almost all the decorations of Copenhagen are owing. To compensate, in some measure, the meanness of the royal palace, the king has at the other end of the town, a handsome pleasure-house, fine stables, and a beautiful garden, to which in the summer he frequently retires. What adds greatly to the conveniency of the city, is the contiguity of the little island of Finack, or rather Amack, joined to it by a bridge: hence, the markets of Copenhagen are plentifully supplied with fowl, beef, mutton, venison, corn, and culinary vegetables, all of which
- b Amack produces in the utmost abundance <sup>a</sup>.

THE other towns and fortresses of Zealand, or as others call it, Sea-land, are Elfinore, or Helsingor, about fifteen miles to the northward of the capital, standing on the narrowest part of the Sound.

CRONENBURG, a very strong castle, situated about a quarter of a mile from the former.

FREDERICSBURG, twelve miles West of Elfinore, a castle and royal palace, much admired by the Danes, it being built in the middle of a fine lake.

- c ROSCHILD, antiently the metropolis of Denmark, situated at the bottom of a gulph, twenty miles to the westward of Copenhagen. Here is a fine, large, and very antient cathedral, filled with the tombs of the Danish monarchs, some of which are very magnificent. As to the town, it has declined in proportion as Copenhagen increased, and is now reduced to an inconsiderable and ruinous monument of its former grandeur.

HOLBECK stands at the bottom of a bay, eighteen miles West of Roschild.

PRESTOE, a port, and town of some trade, on the Zealand coast, opposite to the island Mona.

KALLENBURG, said also to have some trade, situated on the sea-coast, fifty miles westward of Copenhagen.

KOGE, a small town on the Zealand side of the Sound, about twenty miles South of Copenhagen.

- d KERSOR, standing on a promontory opposite to Funen, which forms a good harbour on the north-side of it, which, with the towns of Skelfor and Warienburg, make in all about eleven cities, towns, and fortresses; besides which, Zealand is computed to contain about three hundred villages.

- NEXT in consideration and situation stands Funen, an island bounded by Samsøe on the North, the Baltic on the South, the Great Belt, a straight of about twenty miles over, that separates it from Zealand, on the East, and on the West by a strait, which divides it from Jutland. This island, formerly called Fionia, is about fifty miles in length, forty in breadth, abounds in lakes, woods, corn fields, hogs, and horses; the last being the only commodity the inhabitants export. Its capital is called Odense, and was formerly a flourishing town, but now on the decline: besides which, Funen has three other towns, and no less than two hundred and fifty villages (C).
- e

LAALAND, or Laland, is a small but plentiful island, having Zealand on the North, Falstria on the East, the Baltic on the South, and Langland on the West, measuring about thirty miles in length, and twenty in breadth. Grain and wheat in particular, is the chief production of the soil; and with this the inhabitants supply the markets of Copenhagen, and other towns of Zealand, and the rest of Denmark. The Dutch used likewise to buy up a considerable quantity of corn here; but whether that trade be still continued, is what we cannot affirm. Molesworth calls this likewise a Stifts-ampt, which has several of the neighbouring lesser islands under its jurisdiction.

- f LANGLAND borrows its name from the figure of the island; its length being upwards of thirty miles, and the breadth scarce eight. Here is a pretty market-town called Rudkøping, and about sixteen large villages.

FALSTRIA is separated from Zealand by a narrow strait on the North. It is about twenty miles long, and sixteen broad, and has two considerable towns, Nykøpping and Syd-køpping.

NEXT stands Mona, a small island, not exceeding fifteen miles in length, and five in breadth, separated on the South-West from Falstria by a narrow strait (D).

(C) The island of Funen is a principal government called Stifts-ampt; a term we shall explain when we come to treat of the nature of the government.

(D) Molesworth calls this island Mune, though we constantly find it in all Latin writers specified by the appellation of Mona, which we have therefore retained.

Arroe and Alsen.

ARROE and Alsen are two small islands at no great distance from the former, which produce large crops of aniseeds, a carminative much used in seasoning the food, and mixing with the bread, over all the Danish dominions. a Bornholm.

BORNHOLM is an island of more consideration, both on account of its extent, and the frequent contentions it has occasioned between the crowns of Denmark and Sweden. The length of Bornholm is twenty-one miles, and the breadth above thirteen. It has three considerable towns, Rottum, Sendwick, and Nexia, a great number of villages, several extraordinary privileges, and is fertile and populous. To these islands may be added the small islands of Lessaw, Samsoe, Anbout, with a variety of others of less consideration, with which this part of the northern sea abounds. But we shall leave these petty divisions of the potent kingdom of Denmark, to give a description of North Jutland, one of the most valuable and antient provinces of the Danish monarchy. b

Jutland.

JUTLAND, the country of the antient Jutes, called Cimbri by the Romans; and their country, including Sleswick and Holstein, Cimbrica Chersonesus, is bounded by the German ocean on the West and North, by the Baltic on the East, and by the duchy of Sleswick on the South. This large country is divided into the provinces of Aalburg, Wiburg, Arhusen, and Ripen; the first of which is sometimes called Burglaw. Aalburg is situated in the most northern part of Jutland, and comprehends a space from the North-East to the South-West of about one hundred and fifty miles; some writers say one hundred and thirty, and forty miles in breadth. It contains thirteen bailiwicks, one hundred and sixty parishes, and five very considerable towns, called Aalburg, Nykopping, Tysted, Seeby, and Schagen. c

Province of Aalburg.

Wiburg.

THE province of Wiburg, bounded on the North by Aalburg, is of a circular form, about forty miles in diameter. It is divided into sixteen bailiwicks, and two hundred parishes, containing the towns of Wiburg, Nybye, Harkier, and some others of less note. The country is beautifully watered by three lakes, among which one is called Otbo, from the emperor of that name, who threw his javelin into it when he made an incursion into this country.

Arhusen.

NEXT in order comes the province of Arhusen, bounded on the North by the former, about sixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. Arhusen contains above three hundred villages, two capital cities, called Aarhus and Rander, besides several market-towns of less consideration. d

LASTLY comes Ripen, the fourth province of Jutland. Within this district stand the cities and towns of Ripen, Kolding, Fredericsoedde, Weil, Warde, and Ringkopping. Ripen is situated on the river Nipsick, which, separating into three branches, runs through the city and divides it into as many parts. This is a place of some trade, was formerly a bishop's see, had an university, has still a fine magnificent cathedral, a great number of good private buildings, and a large assembly of the nobility and gentry of the province.

Duchy of Sleswick.

THE duchy of Sleswick, or South Jutland, is the joint property of the king of Denmark and duke of Holstein. It is above sixty miles in length, forty five in breadth, and contains the towns of Sleswick, Gottorp, Ekrenford, or Ekelford, Fredericstadt, Tonningen, Husum, Flensburg, Glucksburg, Hadersleben, Tonderen, Lbom-Closter, Sunderburg, and Nordburg, whence the duke of Holstein-Nordburg takes his title. In most towns and bailiages, both princes have a separate and distinct authority and jurisdiction, particularly in the bailiages of Hadersleben, Ripen, Flensburg, the territory of Christianpris, the islands of Roam and Mandoo, and the west-side of the island of Foer, all which are subject, without participation, to the king of Denmark; whereas the bailiages of Gottorp, Husum, Tonderen, &c. belong exclusively to the duke of Holstein. In Gottorp stands the noble palace of the duke of Holstein, situated in the middle of a lake to the westward of the city of Sleswick. This is esteemed by all good judges, one of the finest buildings of the North, and has the advantage of a large well laid-out garden, adorned with fountains, cascades, and every thing that can render the abode delightful. The duke has likewise here a fine library, and valuable collection of books and curiosities, both natural and artificial, particularly a copper globe, ten feet and an half diameter, with a sphere, shewing the sun's course in the ecliptic, and the motion of all the celestial bodies, by means of wheels turned by a stream that falls from a neighbouring mountain (E). f

(E) The palace of Gottorp suffered greatly in the year 1688, from the barbarity of the Danes, who, without any right, or even plausible pretence, seized upon it, together with the duke's person, and all his other dominions; which, however, our nation and some other powers that interested themselves in the duke's quarrel, obliged them to restore in the year 1689 (1).

(1) Vid. Molesworth's Account of Denmark, ibid.

- a As to the duchy of Holstein, it is divided in the same manner as Sleswick, between the king of Denmark and the duke of Holstein. It is a fief of the empire, and the king of Denmark is, for that reason, classed among the German princes; whereas, Sleswick is absolutely a fief of the crown of Denmark. This duchy extends about an hundred miles in length from East to West, and nearly half as much from North to South, including Dithmarsch within these limits, and even Wagerland and Stormar, though the country, properly called Holstein, consists chiefly of the inland parts, lying between Jutland and Stormar. The chief towns included within this district are, 1st, Kiel Chilonum, a place of considerable trade, a good harbour, and strong citadel, rich, and populous for this country. An university was founded here in 1669; and here also is held the annual assembly of the states of Holstein. 2dly, Rensburg, or Reinolsburg, esteemed the strongest fortress in the whole duchy, being almost wholly enclosed by the river Eyder. 3dly, Wilster, a neat well-built town. 4thly, Itzehoe, situated on the river Stoor; and 5thly, Newmunster, at the mouth of the same river. Some years since there arose a dispute between the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, and the king of Denmark, as likewise a prince of the empire, about the lordship of Steinborst. The former insisted, that it belonged to his dutchy of Larvenburg; and the latter, that it formed a part of the Danish Holstein. Without entering upon the merits of this altercation, it will be sufficient to observe, that the difference was amicably compromised, his Danish majesty relinquishing all right to the said lordship, on receiving from the king of Great Britain the sum of seventy thousand crowns, as an equivalent.

Holstein.

- d There were also some other points, chiefly regarding precedency, adjusted in this treaty.

THE province of Dithmarsch lies between Holstein Proper and the German ocean. It has two considerable towns, viz. Meldorp and Lunden, both carrying on some trade.

Dithmarsch province.

- c As for the province of Stormar, or Stormasch, it is very considerable on account of its trade, and the great care with which the country is cultivated, which greatly resembles Holland, being like it, low in the situation, and protected against the sea by strong dykes and banks. The vicinity of the Elbe, and of Hamburg, gives it great advantages in commerce, inso-much that Altena once became the rival of that opulent hans town; a circumstance which, some think, brought on its ruin, it being burnt to the ground by the Swedes, at the instigation of those jealous merchants. No historian has, however, stated this fact in a clear light; and Voltaire, with all his professed candour, has left it in as great obscurity as he found it. Since then it has been rebuilt, and appears with more splendor than ever, but with less solid wealth and power. Besides Altena, the province of Stormar has three other considerable cities, viz. Krempe, or Crempen, Pennyburg, and Gluckstat: the last is a small city, placed on the Elbe, about thirty miles from Hamburg, and said to be strongly fortified. The king of Denmark had once formed a project of obliging all ships, going or returning from Hamburg, to pay a toll here; but the execution was found impracticable, as so many powers, and particularly the two great maritime powers, were so particularly interested, in opposing a scheme which would lay their commerce under restrictions, and subject it to the caprice of the Danes.

vince.

- e THE last provinces which we shall describe for the present, are Wageren, Oldenburg, and Delmenhorst. The first of these, bounded by Holstein Proper on the West, is about fifty miles in length from North to South, and thirty in breadth. The country had its name from the Wagrii, a people of Sclavonia, by whom it was subdued. The chief towns are Sageburg, Oldesloeb, Ploen, and Oldenburg, formerly a town of great trade, though now on the decline. We shall defer the description of Norway, Iceland, and the other dominions of the king of Denmark, as we propose assigning to each of these a separate section, on account of their extent, and their having once been distinct kingdoms.

- f IN dominions so far extended and divided by seas, as those of Denmark, the nature of the soil must be various. At least a fourth part of the island of Zealand is laid out in royal forests, filled with stags, wild boars, and other game, reserved intirely for the king's use, it being criminal in a peasant to kill one, though he finds them in large flocks devouring his corn.

Produce of Denmark.

THE island of Funen produces corn and wood sufficient for the purposes of the natives; however, the only article for exportation it affords, consists of a few horses. On the contrary, Laaland is a fine grain-country, plentiful especially in wheat, with which it supplies most part of the Danish dominions in small quantities; for this is a kind of bread but little used by the Danes.

- g THE islands of Falstria, Langland, and Mona, all afford corn sufficient for the consumption of the natives. Jutland abounds in cattle, and is not deficient in corn. The horses and hogs of the country are excellent, and so nourishing the pasture, that it is incredible how sheep and black cattle fatten upon the barest spots of ground, though it is indeed a general practice, to transport lean cattle from thence to Holland, a sort of trade in which the Dutch find their account. The duchy of Sleswick is so abundant in corn, cattle, and horses, that the inhabitants dispose of a considerable quantity of horses to their neighbours. Holstein a likewise, is a pleasant fruitful country, which has been compared to England in its variety of woods, hills, rivers, meadows, and corn-fields. Oldenburg abounds in a breed of horses, much esteemed for their beautiful cream colour. In a word, the dominions of his Danish majesty afford the inhabitants most of the conveniencies of life, though they furnish but few articles of luxury or commerce.

Persons and dress of the Danes.

As to the persons of the Danes, they are in general tall, robust, and well made; their features and complexion good, and their hair of a flaxen, yellow, or red colour, in curling and adorning which they take infinite pains. Another writer, however, assures us, that the Danes are for the most part gross, like the Dutch, in their shape, and their mien rather forbidding. This remark is, in particular, applicable to the women, who cannot be sur- b passed by their sex in clumsiness of shape, and awkwardness of address. Both men and women, however, affect to imitate the French dress in the summer, though in winter, like the other northern nations, they wrap themselves up in furs and wool, keeping themselves always neat in their linen, shifting often, and affecting a genteel appearance.

living.

THE vulgar live chiefly on rye bread, lean salt-fish, stock-fish, roots, and bad cheese; but the tables of persons of condition are plentifully covered with a variety of dishes. Gluttony and drunkenness are, indeed, the vices to which a Dane is most addicted. The coldness of the climate first introduced the drinking of strong spirits, and custom has carried it into excess. The men, says Mr. Molesworth, are fond of strong liquors, and the women do not refuse them. A friend, whether male or female, no sooner enters a house than c brandy is presented, and the same cordial goes liberally round at table. The women, indeed, retire soon after dinner; but the men generally sit till they have conferred the compliment of depriving each other of all sense and motion.

Learning and genius of the Danes.

It is a general observation, that Denmark has produced but few great geniuses, either in the arts or sciences; that they neither excel in imitation nor invention; are neither good mechanics, nor deeply skilled in speculative learning: yet there have prodigies in every species of knowledge appeared in Denmark. It has produced one remarkable astronomer, more than one profound critic, and several very valuable historians, however low the taste for polite learning may have sunk at present. Philosophers have endeavoured to explain the reasons, why shining talents are seldom conspicuous in northern cold climates; and to d the physical causes we may probably add some political ones, which would seem to have a great influence over Danish genius. Their excesses in eating and drinking must necessarily blunt the faculties of the mind. Fancy, judgment, and memory, are all weakened or destroyed; and these causes greatly corroborated by the despotism of the present government, and the little encouragement given to literary merit. It is true, the vulgar in general read and write; the clergy usually talk impure Latin, and the gentry cannot be called illiterate; but this mediocrity is the summit of their ambition, a glorious contention and rivalry for excellence being utterly unknown in Denmark <sup>a</sup>.

THE character of the people exactly tallies with their erudition; they are no more emulous of excelling in virtue than in knowledge. Molesworth observes, that the common people are a poor mean spirited dastardly race, totally degenerated from the warlike disposition of their ancestors; equally addicted to fraud themselves, and suspicious of it in others. Puffendorf says of the nobility and gentry, "that they have lost much of their antient glory; " at present they seek rather to enjoy their revenues in ease and luxury, than to toil for military fame <sup>b</sup>;" and it is even the interest of the court, that the nobility should neglect the exercise of arms, which once rendered them so formidable to their kings, and the nation so respected by all her neighbours. If once their military spirit was roused, it would probably be attended with efforts for the recovery of their liberties.

BEFORE the government was made hereditary and absolute in the present royal family, that fatal measure in the year 1660, the nobility or gentry lived in great splendor and affluence. Their country seats were magnificent, and their hospitality unbounded, because the means of supporting it was adequate: they spent most of their time about their estates, and of their revenues among their neighbours and tenants, by whom they were considered as so many princes. When the states were annually convened, they met their sovereign with retinues as numerous and brilliant as his own; they frequently eat at the same table with him; their suffrages were of the greatest weight in all public debates; for the commons were generally directed by them, because upon them was their dependence. Now they are fallen from that height of insolence and power, their condition is low, and they diminish daily in number and credit. Molesworth affirms, "that their estates scarce pay " the taxes imposed on them, which obliges them to grind the faces of their poor tenants, g " to get an overplus for their own subsistence. I have been assured, (says the noble wri-

- a "ter) by some gentlemen of good repute, who formerly were masters of great estates, that they have offered to make an absolute surrender to the king of large possessions in the island of Zealand, rather than pay the taxes; which offer, though pressed with earnestness, would by no means be accepted. Upon my enquiry into the reason of it, I have been informed, that estates belonging to those gentlemen, lying in other places which had the good fortune to be taxed less than the full value of their income, were liable to pay the taxes of any other estate appertaining to the same gentleman, in case that other estate was not able; so that some have been seen, with a great deal of joy, declaring, that the king had been so gracious as to accept of their estates." What a picture this of the most abject and deplorable slavery! and how striking a contrast to their once happy condition, when their estates were rated for the public support, just as inclination and public spirit directed the possessors! <sup>a</sup>

Condition of the nobility.

- THESE, and several other causes equally oppressive, have effected the fall of the antient Danish families, and the ruin of those noble seats, resembling palaces, where they lived with the magnificence of princes. Now they retreat into some obscure corner, as if to conceal the disgrace they have brought upon themselves, by the want of firmness in the defence of their privileges. They are all ambitious of procuring employments, civil or military, at court; this indeed being necessary to secure to their families a competent subsistence, and screen their estates from the exorbitant exactions of the public collectors. Few of them, however, can expect to be provided for in this manner, as civil employments are neither numerous nor valuable, and as strangers are generally chosen into public offices in preference to the natives; the court imagining itself, that they can be more assured of the fidelity of foreigners, on whom they bestow fortunes, than on the posterity of those whose fortunes and liberties they have ruined. To this we may perhaps add another collateral reason for the unnatural conduct of the court, which possibly finds the courage and spirit of the nobility dwindled away with their freedom and poverty. It is farther remarkable, that in the disposal of posts and offices, such as are of ordinary birth and fortunes are always preferred to the more antient and wealthy nobility. Here the most lucrative and honourable posts, are filled by men of the lowest station and education; not that they have ascended to them by dint of merit, but that they are found the best executors of the will of absolute power and despotism. Another advantage which the court finds in the promotion of such persons, is, that if they have grown wealthy by extortion, and clamours are raised loud against them, they can easily be reduced to their primitive condition, and the revenue encreased by it, without creating discontents among the nobility, on account of kindred, alliance or friendship. Thus, in some respects, the policy of the court of Denmark resembles the arbitrary measures of the Porte; they both permit their officers to oppress the people, in order to fatten on the spoils of the nation, without incurring the odium of being the immediate instruments of the public misery <sup>b</sup>.

The policy of the court in the disposal of offices.

- OUR sensible author is of opinion, that the difficulty of promising a comfortable subsistence, and the little security there is of property, when attained by toil and industry, is the occasion of that prodigality observable among all degrees of people in Denmark. Expences in equipages, retinues, and fine cloaths, amount no where to such a pitch of extravagance, in proportion to the income, as in Copenhagen <sup>c</sup>. Nothing can be more true, than that parsimony is not only the cause but the effect of riches; for, in general, the more wealth a man has, the more does he labour to acquire. But in Denmark the courtier never thinks of realizing his money; instead of buying estates, he remits his cash to the banks of Amsterdam and Hamburg. The gentleman spends in his pleasures the fortune which might become dangerous, by gaining him the reputation of riches. The merchant and burgher live upon credit, there being few of either worth one hundred thousand rixdollars (F). As to the peasant, he no sooner finds himself in possession of a rixdollar, than he squanders it upon brandy, to prevent his landlord's seizing upon it. In a word, oppression and arbitrary sway beget distrust and doubts about the security of property: doubt beget profusion, men chusing to squander on their pleasures, what they apprehend may excite the rapaciousness of their superiors; and this profusion is the legitimate parent of that universal indolence, poverty, and despondence, which so strongly characterize the miserable inhabitants

(F) This is the account of lord Molesworth, who seems to have made very accurate observations on the then state of Denmark; but we have reason to believe that the wise and politic conduct of his present Danish majesty, and his royal father, has effected a change greatly to the advantage of the country. The latter in particular, was the great promoter of the Danish commerce to the East-Indies, which, on his accession to the throne, was sunk to a very languid condition. Every branch of trade and industry revived under his auspices, which enabled him to support the government, after he had abolished some of the oppressive taxes.

of Denmark. We speak of what the country was in the beginning of the last reign, in consequence of the nature of their government; for though the excellent disposition and mild administration of Christian VI. and Frederic V. alleviated the miseries of the people, they by no means altered the fundamental principles of the present constitution. Before their time, the trading towns and villages, Copenhagen excepted, were falling into ruin and decay; boroughs, which had lent their king considerable sums of money upon emergencies, were, in lord Molesworth's days, unable to raise an hundred rixdollars (B).

The peasants sold with the lands, and transferable
like stock.

To set this affecting picture, which is the best lesson to a people as yet blessed with their liberties, in the strongest point of view, we shall beg leave to lay before the reader a few more observations from the same author. In Zealand, he informs us, the peasants are as absolute slaves as the negroes of our colonies in the West Indies, with this difference, that they are worse fed. They and their posterity are unalterably fixed to the land in which they were born; the landholders estimating their wealth by their stock of boors. If an estate be sold, the peasants are likewise transferred with it, like wood, houses, and cattle. Yeomanry, the bulwark of happy England, is a state unheard of in Denmark; instead of which the pitiable drudges, after labouring hard to raise the king's taxes, must pay the overplus of the profits of lands, and their own toil, to the greedy and necessitous landlord. Should any of them prove of a more diligent and inventive turn than his companions, so as to live better, repair his farm-house, and put forth the appearance of a degree of happiness and ease, superior to others, it is probable he may be removed from a neat, pleasant and commodious house, to a naked and uncomfortable habitation, that the landlord may increase his rent, by letting the improved farm to another.

The hardships they undergo from having the troops quartered upon them,

from supplying the king and court with horses and waggons in their progresses.

THE quartering and paying the king's troops is another grievance no less oppressive than the former, to which the miserable peasant is subject. The late experience of our own innkeepers, and their complaints to parliament in the year 1758, may give us an idea of the condition of the Danish peasants, oppressed with the load of those insolent inmates, who lord it wherever they are privileged by the constitution. Another grievance to which they are liable, is the obligation they are under of furnishing the king, the royal family, their attendants, baggage, and furniture, with horses and travelling waggons, whenever they undertake a progress to Jutland, or Holstein, or even through Zealand, to any of the royal country houses. On such occasions, all the peasants lying on the road, are summoned to attend with their horses and waggons, at their own expence, no regard being had to the harvest, which is the usual season for the royal family, to travel. The insolences committed by the petulant and worthless lacqueys, and other servants of the court, our author says, have excited his compassion for the unhappy boors, whom he had seen beaten and treated upon a footing with their cattle. However, this usage would be tolerable, were they subjected to it only when the king makes a progress; but born to be slaves, the peasants are forced to attend, in the same manner every creature of the court, who has obtained his majesty's order, a favour seldom denied to any man of the least weight and influence.

The great change in the condition of the peasants.

Diseases consequent to their situation.

FROM all these circumstances it is observable, although Denmark has a tendency to be exceeding populous, as appears from the swarms of northern nations, which, in former ages, over-ran all Europe; yet poverty, oppression, and poor diet, greatly obstruct procreation, and prevent the encrease of the people. Before the fatal revolution in 1660, there was hardly a family in Denmark that was not in possession of a piece of plate, besides silver spoons, gold rings, and other conveniencies and ornaments, of which they are still fond: at present there is nothing of value to be seen in the house of a peasant, all being sold to pay the king's taxes, and gratify the rapacious avarice of the collectors.

ANOTHER consequence which our author deduces from their poverty, is the frequency of apoplexies and epileptic disorders, among the common people. "One, says he, shall hardly pass through a street in Copenhagen, without seeing one or two of those poor creatures groveling on the ground in a fit, and foaming at the mouth with a circle of gazers and assistants about them." Whether these disorders be the genuine result of the causes he ascribes, and the nature of their diet, which is composed of lean salt meats, stock-fish, &c. we cannot pretend to decide, without entering upon a disquisition foreign to our purpose; sufficient it is, that the reader has a view of the deplorable condition of the Danish peasant, who wanted nothing besides this dreadful disease to crown his misery. There is one disease they call slacbt, which may be deemed endemial, on account of its

(B) This nobleman relates, that when he resided in Denmark, the collectors of the poll-tax were forced to accept of old feather-beds, brass and pewter pans, and household furniture, instead of money, from the once wealthy inhabitants of Kieg, though this little town supplied Christian IV. with the sum of two hundred thousand rixdollars, upon a notice so short as twenty-four hours (1).

a universality here among all degrees of people. Moleſworth ſays it is a kind of apoplexy, ariſing from diſcontent and trouble of mind; but how truly the reader is left to judge.

b FORMERLY valour and wealth were the only titles to nobility, the nobles and gentry having no real diſtinction. No degrees of rank, or patents of honour, were dependent on the crown; of late years, however, to compenſate the loſs of ſolid privileges, the court confers a few imaginary honours, ſuch as the dignities of count and baron, to the favourites of the king. Theſe, inſtead of becoming more independent, are, in conſequence of their empty titles, the real ſlaves and tools of the crown, and uſed accordingly as the inſtruments of legal oppreſſion. One excluſive right indeed they enjoy; it is that of diſpoſing of their eſtates contrary to the courſe of law, by will or teſtament, provided that ſuch will be ſigned and approved by the king during the life of the teſtator.

Degrees of nobility in Denmark.

THERE are beſides two orders of knighthood in Denmark, that of the Elephant and Dane-Broge, of which the firſt is the moſt honourable, and conferred only on perſons of the higheſt diſtinction and merit. This order was inſtituted by Chriſtian I. at his ſon's wedding, the badge being an elephant with a caſtle on its back, ſet with diamonds, and hung on a watered ſky-coloured ribband. As to the Dane-Broge, it is the reward of inferior diſtinction; the badge being a white ribband with red edges, having a ſmall croſs of diamonds ſuſpended to it, and an embroidered ſtar on the breaſt of the coat, with this motto, Pietate et Juſtitia.

c THE antient form of government in Denmark was ſimilar to that which the Goths and Vandals, eſtabliſhed in almoſt all countries where their arms were victorious. To theſe barbarians do we owe the model of a conſtitution far excelling all others, in a juſt mixture of liberty and ſubordination. Till the people reſigned their rights in the year 1660, the king of Denmark was elected by his ſubjects of all degrees, divided into different claſſes (G), called States. Theſe being convened, were to chuſe for their prince a man, whoſe perſon was unexceptionable, who was valiant, juſt, merciful, affable, prudent, a maintainer of the laws, a lover of the people, an encourager of merit, in a word, adorned with all the accompliſhments and virtues neceſſary for the execution of ſo important a truſt. Due regard for the royal line was always preſerved, and the people thought themſelves happy, if they found in the late king's family virtues and abilities adequate to the great and weighty duty of a monarch. When they happen to be miſtaken in their choice, and, inſtead of the patriot, the warrior, and the ſtateſman, they had promoted a cruel, vicious, and profligate tyrant, they always aſſumed the right of depoſing, baniſhing, and even putting to death their king; and this either by open trial before the ſtates, or, if he was thought too powerful to be brought to public juſtice, by ſecret conſpiracies. In his room they elected the next of kin, if he had merit, or the hero who had hazarded his life for the public, by undertaking the expulſion or the death of the tyrant.

Form of government.

e FREQUENT conventions of the different ſtates of the kingdom was a fundamental article of the Daniſh conſtitution. Here all matters relative to government were tranſacted, wholeſome laws enacted, peace or war determined, marriages for the royal family projected, taxes impoſed, promotions to the great offices made; in a word, every thing that concerned the legiſlative power. It was a principle of government, that no conſtant tribute ſhould be paid, or any taxes levied on the people, but by the conſent of all the ſtates, and for the ſupport of a neceſſary and juſt war, or payment of marriage portion. The king's ordinary revenue aroſe from the crown-lands and demefnes, his herds and cattle, foreſts and ſervitudes. Thus he lived, like a ſubject, on the produce of his own eſtate, and not as now by the ſweat of the peaſant's brow.

f As the legiſlative power was veſted in the ſtates, ſo the king was poſſeſſed of the executive: he was to ſee a due and impartial adminiſtration of juſtice; nay, often to preſide in perſon; ſedulouſly to watch for the welfare of his people; to command their armies; to cheriſh induſtry, religion, arts, and ſcience; to keep upon terms of friendſhip with the nobility, and to protect the commons from their insolence and power.

IN this ſituation, with no other alteration than the encreasing power of the nobles, did the conſtitution remain until the revolution in 1660, which produced a change equally aſtoniſhing in itſelf, and fatal to the liberties of the people. As this new-modelling of

(G) This fact has the teſtimony of all hiſtorians, and is farther confirmed by that memorable answer made by Waldemar to the pope's nuncio, who aſſumed great authority in the kingdom. "Our nature, ſays the monarch, we have from God, our kingdom from our

the government was effected at a period very disastrous to the nation; after the king had lost a great part of his dominions in the war with Sweden; when the treasury was exhausted; the public spirit low; without bloodshed; without force; and in the space of two days, it may justly be deemed one of the most remarkable events in history: however, we shall only touch upon it in this place, that the reader may have a view of the present state of the Danish government.

IMMEDIATELY after a peace was concluded with Sweden, a diet of the states assembled to consider of the means to re-establish the public affairs, and enable the people, almost undone by the misfortunes attending a tedious and bloody war, to recover their losses. As the difficulties which would occur were obvious, the king foresaw the disputes that must necessarily arise. He therefore had it artfully insinuated to the clergy, and the president of Copenhagen, speaker of the commons, that the public tranquility might be easily restored, if all the members of the state would bear their proportion of the expence. The commons, in consequence, laid before the nobility the deplorable situation of the people, and the impossibility of raising money for the current service, unless they consented to pay their share, which was the more reasonable, as they were the greatest gainers, and the only mortgaged men in the kingdom. The nobility, who were numerous, insolent, and powerful, not at all apprised of the collusion between the king and commons, dealt very roundly with the latter, telling them it was the highest presumption to enquire into their privileges, and the grossest ignorance in them to dictate to their masters; for vassals they were, and should remain. Fired with this haughty answer, the speaker of the commons replied, that since they would not use the means to preserve their privileges, they were unworthy of them; that their answer to the commons was equally insolent and cruel; and that though the commons could not make themselves noble, yet they would shew them it was in their power to make the weight of subjection fall upon others as heavy as, till now, it had lain upon themselves. After this spirited reply, the speaker retired, and was followed by the clergy and commons to a man, to a hall provided at some distance for that purpose. Here they came to the sudden and fatal resolution of devolving their own authority upon the king. Several private messages passed between them and the court in the evening, and next morning they attended his majesty in a body, and were admitted to an audience. They set forth, that as the present constitution did not, in their opinion, answer the end of government, they were resolved to put the administration wholly in his majesty's hands, because they were sensible of his prudence, virtue, and public spirit, as well as his great love for his people. His majesty at first pretended to have some scruples about accepting an arbitrary power; but, on the commons insisting upon their request, he told them how much he was obliged to them for their just sentiments of his affection; but that the consent of the nobility was necessary to render any public act, of the nature they proposed, valid and of effect. At the same time he ordered the city gates to be shut, under the specious pretext of securing it against danger from the ferment arisen in the diet; and having the army intirely in his power, it was impossible for any of the nobility to retire to their estates, without his leave, which brought his intrigues to a speedy issue. Now the nobility discovered their error; but it was too late and irreparable: some part of their privileges they determined therefore to resign, in order to secure the rest. With this view they made his majesty an offer to advance his prerogative considerably, and to settle the succession in the male line of his issue; but they were given to understand, that this would neither answer his majesty's purpose, nor satisfy the clergy and commons. At last they were forced to surrender all, and to render his majesty arbitrary, and the crown hereditary in his issue, whether male or female. A few days after the king, queen, and royal family, appeared on a kind of theatre erected for the occasion; and being seated in chairs of state, under canopies of velvet, received the homage of the nobility, clergy, and people, in sight of the army. Thus the states of Denmark, without compulsion, almost without intrigue, divested themselves by a certain fatality of those privileges, which had cost their ancestors so much blood and treasure. In this condition does the constitution now remain, the government being an absolute and despotic monarchy, the rigour of which has, however, been softened by the mild and just administration of the excellent princes who have since reigned.

ALTHOUGH the king of Denmark professes to square his conduct by the antient and fundamental laws of the kingdom, yet these he takes the liberty of new-modelling, or repealing, as he sees proper. He is the guardian of orphans, and assumes to himself the disposal of heirs and heiresses in marriage. As he is intitled to a third of the money arising upon the sale of lands, no estates can be sold without his permission, except those who are raised to the dignity of counts or barons.

THE king, in his council, determines all public affairs; deliberates on war and peace, alliances and treaties; and of taxes, fortifications, trade, &c. without any other assistance than a than that of the secretaries of state, who are esteemed, notwithstanding, rather as ministerial officers than counsellors of state. Of these great officers there are four, who direct business in their separate departments. The first is secretary for the affairs of Denmark; the second, for those of Norway; the third, for foreign affairs; and the fourth, is secretary at war.

ONE felicity still remains to Denmark; it is the brevity and perspicuity of the laws, justice being no where obtained with less expence, or greater expedition. The whole body of Danish laws is contained in a moderately sized quarto volume, written in the vernacular tongue, and so plainly, simply, and intelligibly, as scarce ever to require a comment. As they are grounded upon equity rendered familiar to the meanest understanding, every b man capable of reading, may soon become acquainted with his own case, and even able to plead it, without the assistance of those pests of society, attornies, solicitors, and the pettyfoggers of the law. Here is none of that chicane, and mystery of the law, which raises and destroys so many estates in other countries; a few advocates are sufficient to conduct the pleadings of all the litigious persons in the nation; and as their fees are small, and all suits necessarily determined within a year and a month after their commencement, they are seldom burthensome to the parties.

IN Denmark are three courts of justice, each of which has power to give a definitive sentence, and must acquit or condemn, though there lies an appeal from one to another, but without the formality and expence of again passing through the whole process. The most c circumscribed court is the Herredsfogds, similar in nature to our leet-court. It is a tribunal appointed for the dispatch of business in the country, to which the Byfogds court corresponds in towns and cities. From these there lies an appeal to the Landstog, or general head court for the province; and from thence to the Higt-Right court at Copenhagen, composed of the first nobility, and often presided by the king's majesty in person, the whole charge not exceeding ten or twelve pounds sterling. The Byfogds court of Copenhagen has this peculiar privilege; that its verdicts, instead of passing through the Landstog, is revised by the burgomaster and common-council of the city, proceeding immediately from them to the Higt-Right court. Should the matter in debate happen not to be positively specified in the written law, which seldom happens, the verdict is then in the king's breast, or in d that of his representative, who may be called keeper of the royal conscience. The sentences passed in the inferior courts are seldom partial, the judges dreading the revival of the high court, where strict justice is administered between one subject and another. The misfortune however is, that the first article of the law reserves to the king the privilege of altering or explaining it at pleasure; whence it is, that in all causes wherein his majesty or his favourites are interested, the subject can expect but little justice, especially if money be the point in litigation.

IN the inferior courts, the reasons upon which every verdict is founded are specified; but in the supreme court, no reason is expressed for the sentence; and the judges of the lower courts, are not only punished for misdemeanours committed in the execution
e of their office, but obliged also to render satisfaction to the party injured by an unjust sentence.

IN Denmark are no public societies of lawyers, or inns of court. Every man takes up the profession at pleasure, as it requires but little learning to become acquainted with laws so concise and intelligible; and indeed, the profits are so small, that few are induced to assume the long robe, who can apply themselves to any other profession. One excellent regulation we must not omit; it is, that all clerks and registers are obliged to bring the whole process of trial within a limited number of sheets, including the allegations, proofs, and sentence. A certain price is affixed to each sheet; and thus the parties have a certainty of the utmost expence of a proceeding. How happy would it be for this
f nation, which boasts of the freedom of its constitution, could some check be given to the rapaciousness of the interpreters of those once simple, but now embarrassed laws!

THE salaries of the judges are paid out of the exchequer; and so trifling are they, that a judge of the lower court hath not above twenty-five pounds per annum, and others proportionably, which would be a strong temptation to pervert justice, were they not awed by the supreme court. By the king's order, the magistrates of towns provide pleaders for the poor, and those who are unable to defend their own cause; an institution founded upon humanity, which we could wish to see followed in countries more applauded for liberty and generous sentiments.

IN criminal cases the severity of the law is extraordinary; and to this many writers have g attributed the good order and strict discipline of the people. The crimes of murder, robbery, house-breaking, high-treason, or even seditious discourses, are seldom heard of: so fixed is the government now on the basis of despotism, that the most turbulent spirits are awed into implicit obedience. The most frequent crimes are manslaughter and thieving, and the punishment is beheading, which is done by one stroke of a sword (H). a

In Copenhagen there is a magistrate of police, who presides over the morals of the people, quiets disturbances, composes differences among the merchants, examines whether their goods be marketable, restrains every profession within its proper bounds, causes the streets, bridges, and causeways, to be kept in repair, sees the markets properly supplied with bread at a reasonable price, seizes prohibited goods, assists with a proper body of men to extinguish fires, with every thing else which regards the good order, the safety, and the conveniency of the city (I).

CHIMNEY-sweepers are bound to keep an exact register, upon oath, of all the chimnies they sweep, that, in case of accidents, those by whose avarice or neglect they have happened, may repair the damage at their private expence. Torches and flambeaux are prohibited in the streets; instead of which, persons of the first distinction use large close lanthorns fixed upon a pole; a necessary precaution in a town where so many houses are built of fir timber. The polity master, as he is called, regulates likewise the price of travelling in open waggons, and severely punishes all impositions on passengers. He imprisons all who travel on the king's particular road, without permission; all poachers and sportsmen, who appear with guns, dogs, or game: lastly, he suppresses riots among the soldiers, who are prohibited to be seen in the streets after the signal for retiring is made by beat of drum. b apothecaries.

OF all the regulations in Denmark, perhaps that of the apothecaries is the most useful and salutary. No man is permitted to exercise that profession, until he passes the examination of the college of physicians, and is allowed unanimously to be skilled in his function. In lord Molesworth's time only two apothecaries were permitted to open shops in Copenhagen, and one only, in each of the other towns. Their shops and medicines are carefully inspected every quarter by the magistrates and physicians, and all the bad drugs thrown away. The price is affixed to every article, and the apothecaries are obliged to keep registers of all the medicines they sell or make up, with the names of the patients, and the proper dates; so that they are never at a loss upon whom to charge any unfortunate accident. c

Stifts-Ampts.

IN the country the government is conducted by dividing it into certain districts, called Stifts-Ampts, of which there are seven; four in Jutland, and three in the islands. Every stifts-ampt is subdivided into a lesser jurisdiction, called Ampt. A person of quality is generally chosen stifts-amptsmān, a post equivalent to lord-lieutenant in England, or intendant in France, to which last it approaches the nearest. Amptsmān, or under-governor of an ampt, is generally a person of inferior rank, who resides in the principal town of his district, and is entrusted with all matters relating to the public; the quartering of soldiers, providing for their march, collecting the king's taxes, directing the peasants employed in public works, or when the king travels: these employments are for life, and given as rewards to those who have faithfully served the court. Persons who have resided at foreign courts in quality of ambassadors, are usually preferred to stifts-ampts on their return, if their conduct has received the approbation of his majesty. His salary is a thousand crowns, and that of the amptsmān four hundred; but the chief advantages arising from their posts, are the interest they in consequence have at court, by which they shift off the most grievous taxes from their estates; and the great power and authority which it gives them within their jurisdiction, where they are considered as petty princes.<sup>a</sup> d

Revenues.

THE king's revenue arises either from the duties paid by his own subjects, from the customs paid by foreigners, or from the crown-lands, fines, and confiscations. The taxes upon his own subjects are either fixed or variable; we mean, that the prince in some cases chuses to follow a rule, established by himself, which, however, he may alter, if he finds

(H) The executioner or beadsman, as he is called, though infamous by his profession, compensates the want of reputation by solid profits, arising from other employments annexed to his office. His business it is to keep the sinks and offices in order, remove all rubbish and every thing offensive out of the streets, keep stables and out-houses clean and sweet, with several other necessary employments, in which no Danish servant will, upon any consideration, engage (1). For this purpose he has under him a great number of servants called Rakers, and as he charges his own price, soon raises a fortune superior to that of some of the chief nobility.

(I) One excellent custom is strictly observed in Copenhagen, and enforced by a law, of which the magistrate of police is judge. Here are select companies of men paid by the public, whose sole business it is to watch and extinguish fires, no others daring, on pain of death, to approach within a certain distance, lest, under pretence of helping the unfortunate, they should seize the opportunity of plundering them: a law this which not only prevents losses and frauds, but greatly contributes to suppressing fires, by the order and regularity observed on these occasions (2).

a it necessary. Of the first sort are the duties upon imports and exports, and formerly the excise upon the necessaries of life, now abolished. There are also duties upon marriage licences, upon stamp-paper, on bargains, contracts, grants, and proceedings at law. That is, the duty is laid upon the paper, and all the proceedings necessarily written on stamp-paper, the duty on which last amounts to several rixdollars each sheet. Formerly an excise was laid on brewing, malt, and corn that was grinded in mills; but we are told that this duty is either entirely abolished, or at least greatly lowered. Such were the fixed duties, which seldom received any alteration. The variable duties are, the land-tax, assessed not by the acre, but by the annual value of the farm or estate; the poll-tax, imposed upon every subject according to his wealth; money levied for repairing the old fortifications, or erecting new; an occasional tax laid on the marriage of a princess for the payment of her portion; a tax laid upon tradesmen, for the liberty of exercising their several occupations; the ground-rents in all cities and towns, taxed according to the value of the house, or the ability of the tenant. In Holstein the lands are taxed by the plough, each plough paying a certain sum of money monthly. About the year 1690, a valuation was made of all the houses in the cities and towns within the king's dominions, and the lands in the country were surveyed, the more easily to assess them, and determine their real value. The ground-rent in towns and cities was fixed at four per cent. of the real value of the ground, supposing it were put up to sale. As to the poll-tax, the most moderate assessment is in the following proportion. A citizen worth eight or ten thousand rixdollars, pays four for himself, four for his wife, two for each child, one for each servant, and as much for every horse. A publican pays one rixdollar for himself, another for his wife, twenty four stivers for every child, and sixteen for every servant. The tax levied for erecting and repairing the fortifications is usually laid high. A merchant worth six or eight thousand dollars, shall often pay sixty-eight dollars; an ordinary citizen eight or ten, and others in proportion; but the reader is to observe, that we have no late accounts of the state of the revenue, which is probably collected in a manner infinitely less oppressive than it was after a long and ruinous war.

In Norway the revenue arises from a certain proportion of the timber, tar, fish, and oil; that are exported, and also from certain duties upon these. To this may be added a small profit arising from mines; but the last and most considerable branch is drawn from the crown lands and confiscations. However, the king frequently grows the poorer for the addition to his demesnes by confiscations; for he no sooner becomes the proprietor, than labour ceases, improvements are neglected, and the whole is often converted into forests for his diversion; a most impolitic and destructive practice, happily abolished in our own country.

Upon the whole, the king's revenues are very considerable; and lord Molesworth has computed them as follows: The toll of the Sound worth sixty-five thousand rixdollars, per annum; the rest of the toll of Denmark, farming at one hundred and sixty five thousand rixdollars; the excise of Copenhagen farmed at one hundred and forty thousand rixdollars; the excise of the rest of his majesty's dominions at one hundred and forty thousand rixdollars, the smaller taxes of the kingdom at one hundred thousand rixdollars; the whole revenue of Norway at seven hundred thousand rixdollars; the crown lands, confiscations, &c. at two hundred thousand rixdollars; the revenue of Iceland, farmed at twenty-seven thousand rixdollars; Oldenburg and Delmenhorst at eight thousand; and the toll upon the Wefer, at five thousand: the whole amounting to two millions six hundred and twenty-two thousand rixdollars, from which a deduction of four hundred thousand rixdollars ought to be made, as the poll and fortification taxes were never levied in the same year. The sensible author of the Present State of Europe, estimates the revenue at nearly the same sum, though we are apt to believe he has been led into this mistake by lord Molesworth, who wrote in the year 1690, without reflecting upon the great increase of industry and commerce, and the extraordinary addition to the revenue from these, as well as from foreign subsidies, which amount to above a million of rixdollars from France alone. Certain it is, that the exportation of beef, butter, tar, timber, &c. has greatly increased of late years, and has proportionably enriched the exchequer, and the private trader, tho' it would be difficult to ascertain the exact value of this increase (K).

It

(K) That the reader may have a clearer idea of the above revenues, as well as of other particulars mentioned in the preceding pages, it may be necessary to give him a short account of the Danish coins, weights, and measures. A rose noble is eighteen shillings sterl. a ducat nine shillings, a rixdollar four shillings and six-pence, a flet-dollar three shillings, a rix mark eleven-pence, a flet-mark nine-pence, a silver one penny; besides which, there is a variety of smaller copper coins. It would appear, however, that the rixdollar and silver have no fixed valuation, as several writers reckon the former at four shillings and nine-pence half penny, and the silver at nearly a penny farthing. Their weights are the great and small hundred, the first one hundred and twenty, and the latter one hundred and twelve pounds: they have also their lispound, equivalent to our stone, and their shippand, which makes twenty lispounds. An hundred weight English hardly amounts to ninety-two Danish

Mod. Hist. Vol. XI.

It is allowed on all hands, that specie is scarce in Denmark, few persons having any ready cash lying by them; and the traders through whose hand it passes, having small capitals and large debts in Holland and Hamburg, no sooner receive money than they pay it away again. Another circumstance which greatly contributes to the draining Denmark of its specie, is the payment of the troops, as at least half the officers are foreigners, who place whatever they accumulate in foreign banks; a practice too frequent among the officers of state likewise. Formerly the balance of trade against Denmark used to carry off large sums; for it was estimated that foreign imports for the consumption of the country, exceeded the exported produce by near a fifth<sup>a</sup>: but how they were for such a number of years able to support so losing a trade, is what we are unable to comprehend. At present we believe the balance is in favour of the Danes, with respect to most countries where they trade, labour being incredibly cheap. The most plentiful coin, even now, is copper; whence if a man has a large sum to receive, he is forced to employ wheel-barrows to carry it off; and we have heard merchants declare, that in their accounts they have charged a certain sum for that purpose; a presumption this of the scarcity of money, notwithstanding we see the baser coins prevail in rich countries, though for different reasons.

Pay of the troops.

To an Englishman unacquainted with the value of money in northern countries, it would be incredible what an army the king of Denmark supports at a less expence than this nation can maintain eight regiments of horse and foot. It is computed, that Denmark and the German dominions maintain an army of sixteen thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and two thousand dragoons, in profound peace; and Norway thirteen thousand foot, and near three thousand horse and dragoons; together with three thousand seamen, who are employed in the king's dock-yards, when they are not wanted for the equipment of a squadron. From comparing this proportion of troops with the revenue, we may easily conclude how small their soldiers pay must be; but the less the treasury is drained by the payment of troops, the more does the poor peasant suffer upon whom he is quartered. All the navy-officers are in constant pay in peace as well as in war; whence it is, that the king of Denmark is able to equip a fleet of thirty sail of men of war upon almost the shortest notice (L). Thus we see that an army of between thirty and forty thousand men, and three thousand seamen, the charges of the civil list, the maintenance of the courts, king's children, public ministers, officers of justice, &c. are supported upon a revenue not greater than the civil list of Great Britain; whence we may judge of the œconomy of the government, the scarcity of specie, and the cheapness of provisions in Denmark.

Religion, marriages, &c.

It is time we should now come to treat of the religion, marriages, and funerals of Denmark, with which we shall close this section, and our account of the present state of the kingdom; adding only a few reflections upon the true political interest of that nation, with respect to the powers with whom she is connected, either by commerce, treaties, or situation.

In Denmark the people were pagans till the year 826, when St. Augarius, bishop of Hamburg and Bremen, first introduced Christianity in the reign of Harold Clakius, the first Christian Danish monarch<sup>b</sup> (M). About the year 1537, the doctrine of Luther was first propagated in this northern kingdom, by Bugenhagen, a Pomeranian divine, who met with a strong patron in Frederic I. Since Protestantism was established, no other religion, and particularly that of the church of Rome, has ever been admitted into the kingdom, or, at least, permitted worship in it, 'till of late years. Perhaps no Catholic country in Europe requires a stricter conformity than Denmark, people being prohibited to talk with freedom on the points in dispute, or to absent themselves from the churches upon any pretence. The clergy are the tools of the government, their doctrine being a blind and implicit obedience to superiors; in return for which they are protected by the court, and are highly respected by the people, because they see them regarded by the administration; which nish pounds. A Danish ell is about one-third less than an English; but of their liquid measure we find no exact account, nor indeed any thing so accurate as we could wish concerning their weights or dry measure (I).

(L) It will not be disagreeable to the more curious reader to see an account of the pay of the several officers and soldiers, which is as follows: a captain of foot is paid twenty rixdollars per month, a lieutenant eleven, and an ensign ten. A serjeant's pay amounts only to six rixdollars, a drummer's to three rixdollars and eight stivers, and a corporal's to about four rixdollars a month. A common soldier receives no more than seventeen stivers weekly, the rest of his pay being applied for bread, cloathing, and other things. As to the pay of the superior officers, we have no certain information: we are told, however, that a colonel's, including his pay as a captain, amounts to fifty rixdollars monthly, a lieutenant-colonel's thirty, and a major's twenty. Officers of horse have in peace the same pay with the foot, his horses being wholly maintained by the peasants on whom he is quartered. In Norway, we are told, that little money is expended in the payment of the troops, the private soldiers being wholly subsisted by the boors.

(M) This prince is not ranked among the Danish monarchs, being set up only by the Jutlanders while Regner was employed in a war with the Irish, and on his return deposed and slain.

(1) Vid. Arith. Comm. Busch. p. 15.

a makes their precepts be received with more weight. They intermeddle in no civil affairs, nor are they retained at court, or the houses of the nobility, in quality of chaplains; this office being always performed by a lacquey.

In the pulpit the clergy assume the authority of the ministers of Christ, and reprove with great freedom sinners of quality, who have practised public vices; nor are any liberties consistent with the duties of their function taken amiss, provided they never intermeddle with politics. The common people adore them for the spirit with which they reprehend their superiors; for nothing is so grateful to mankind, as to see those raised by fortune above them brought down to their own level. Their benevolences to the clergy are in proportion to the degree of satisfaction they receive in this respect; whence it is, that a minister of courage can raise his stipend to double the value. Another circumstance that greatly contributes to keep up the authority of the clergy, is their retaining confession, without which persons of the highest quality are denied the sacrament.

The Danes have constituted superintendants in the room of bishops and archbishops, who are deprived of the authority as well as the name of right reverend; however, they take it kindly to be addressed by this title, after which they have a hankering. Within the Danish dominions are ten of those superintendants, viz. one in Zealand, one in Funen, four in Jutland, and four in Norway. They have no temporalities, hold no ecclesiastical courts, have no cathedrals with deans and chapters, but are chiefly employed in animadverting on the doctrines and manners of the clergy and people. The superintendant of Copenhagen has a kind of superior authority, and a stipend proportionable, which is fixed at two thousand rixdollars yearly. Each of the other Danish superintendants have fifteen hundred, and those of Norway one thousand rixdollars each; hardly the value of a moderate English living. They preach without book, and use abundance of action. They observe holidays with the same rigid devotion as Sunday, the gates of Copenhagen being shut during divine service, and the people very constant in their attendance; but the service being ended, they relax their spirits with all kinds of pastimes and diversions. It is even common to sit down with a clergyman at cards immediately after he has quitted the pulpit, where he has preached so feelingly as to drown his congregation in tears. The clerical habit is a plaited black gown, with short wide sleeves, a large stiff ruff, and a round flat cap, resembling our university matriculating cap.

PENANCES imposed by the confessor are readily performed by the people; nor do they refrain coming to church, tho' they are condemned to stand like criminals at the door for whole months. To conclude, there is no country in the world where the minds of the clergy and people are more upon a level than in Denmark. If you meet with few of extraordinary talents and qualifications, as few are seen who merit the appellation of madmen, fools, or enthusiasts. A certain equality reigns among them, every one keeping the common beaten road of sense, without addition or diminution.

As to the marriage ceremonies in Denmark, they differ but little from our own. What chiefly deserves notice is, that the parties are often contracted for years before marriage is solemnized in church, and as intimate before as after the ceremony. It is sufficient that it be performed before the woman brings forth her first child; this is no offence in the eye of the people, nor is it animadverted upon by the clergy. The espousals, however, are extremely solemn before friends; and the parties are then, and not before, deprived of the liberty of marrying elsewhere: yet we are told by some writers, that the first contract is valid in law, the marriage ceremony being esteemed only a public declaration of their engagements.

The Danes bury their dead with the utmost funeral pomp; and it is not uncommon to keep a corpse for years, in order to make preparations for the utmost magnificent interment. The poor indeed have their remains laid in the ground with less ceremony; tho' even among them it is usual to have a band of hired mourners, employed by the parish to attend the body to the grave.

With respect to the interest of Denmark, it may be collected from what we have said of its present state. The rapid progress of the Russians to a civilized, warlike, and potent nation, renders it indispensibly necessary, that the crowns of Denmark and Sweden live in strict harmony, to secure the independence of both. As the maritime powers are, however, the strongest barriers against the encroachments of that vast empire, it is above all things necessary, that Denmark should cultivate their friendship; and this is equally important to the security of his majesty's trade and dominions. How far the present disturbances in Germany ought to induce his Danish majesty to break off his connections with France, and support his Prussian majesty, and the Protestant interest, at the hazard of breaking with Russia and Sweden, though with respect to the last he has little to fear amidst the civil commotions of the nation, it requires no great depth of sagacity to penetrate. But we have already exceeded our limits, and must now enter upon the Danish history, where we find such a long series of kings, as will render it impossible for us to enter upon a minute recital of all the important events, without swelling our work to an enormous size. However, as we believe no complete history of this nation has ever appeared in any modern language, we doubt not but the bare annals of so antient and famous a people will be acceptable to the curious reader.

Dan, 1st king
of Denmark.
Ante Christ.
1038.

ALMOST all historians agree, that Dan, the son of Humble, a native of Zealand, was the founder and first king of the country called Denmark, from his name. His possessions and influence were very considerable, not only in Zealand but in the islands of Langland and Mona; it was his courage, however, and skill in the art of war, that raised him to the crown of Denmark, and induced the inhabitants to chuse him for their king. He governed Zealand for his aged father, when the Saxons made an irruption into Jutland. The people, in despair, implored his assistance, promising him the sovereignty of the country, if he drove out the enemy. Dan, fired with ambition, immediately raised an army, marched against the Saxons, obtained a complete victory, and reaped the promised reward. Soon after his father died, leaving him sovereign of Jutland, Zealand, Langland, and Mona, about one thousand and thirty-eight years before the birth of Christ<sup>a</sup> (A). To strengthen his interest, and secure his possessions, he determined upon a strict alliance with the Saxons; and for this purpose married Gritba, a lady of great consideration among them, by whom he had two sons. After reigning forty years with the utmost justice and reputation, he died greatly lamented by his subjects.

THIS excellent prince was succeeded by his eldest son Humble, who was elected by the unanimous voice of the people (B). His reign was short, according to some historians<sup>b</sup>, and all agree that it was unfortunate; for he was deposed by his brother, and reduced to a private station, seven years after he had been raised to the throne.

LOTHER now usurped the crown of his unfortunate brother, who supported his misfortunes with a constancy and magnanimity which declared him worthy of a better fate. The usurper governed the Danes with the utmost rigour and severity; he banished, or put to death, all the nobility whose power rendered them dangerous, or wealth excited his avarice. Suspicion, lust, and cruelty, made him at length intolerable to a people, whose spirit was not yet extinguished by oppression. They revolted, and Lother lost his life, on account of those very vices by which he obtained his crown<sup>c</sup>.

By the votes of the people, his son Skioldo, then a boy, was appointed to succeed Lother. The sweetness of his disposition, his bodily strength, and his courage, distinguished even at that age, had determined the states not to punish the son for the crimes of the father; and the virtues which Skioldo displayed in the course of a long and prosperous reign, amply rewarded the justice of their choice (C). (A) Some writers deny that the kingdom of Denmark is so antient as Grammaticus, and the other authors we quote in the margin, assert. Gasser in particular affirms, that Dan lived only four hundred and ninety years before Christ; but we must either suppose, that the reigns of the Danish princes were uncommonly short, or that their historians have given lives of several kings who never existed; but Gasser does not take it upon him to assert the latter; and the absurdity of the former supposition is too evident to require any refutation. Indeed, the regular and clear genealogy and chronology of those princes, put it beyond all doubt, that Denmark is one of the most antient monarchies in Europe.

(B) We are told by Saxo Grammaticus, and the most antient Danish historians, that the electors stood upon long stones which they raised on one end on the ground, and by their stability, prognosticated the felicity of the future reign (1).

(C) Jo. Suaningius, in his Chronology of the Danish kings, places Bogbio, the son of Humble, before Skioldo; but we find his conjecture confirmed by the authority of no Danish historian (2).

- a trepidity happened at the age of fifteen. Being on a party of hunting, he seized upon a wild boar, of a monstrous size, and held the furious beast with his girdle until he was assisted by his companions; a specimen of his valour that rendered him more dear to his subjects, by whom he was already beloved. Soon after his reputation received additional lustre, by his engaging in single combat with the two most celebrated wrestlers and boxers of those times, whom he defeated. He married Avilda, a Saxon lady, who had been addressed by her king: this drew upon him a war with the Saxons, which terminated in the death of their prince, and the reduction of the country by Skioldo. However, his lenity was no less conspicuous than his courage; he permitted the conquered Saxons to chuse another king, contenting himself with a moderate tribute, to reimburse his people for the expences of the war. After this he applied his mind to the arts of peace; he rewarded virtue, punished vice, and encouraged industry. It was his constant saying, 'That the true grandeur of a prince consists rather in making his subjects happy, than in oppressing his neighbours, with a view to extend his sovereignty.' He was the patron of the poor; the protector of the injured, and the succour of the distressed. In a word, his virtues were so extraordinary, and his people so sensible of the blessings they enjoyed during his long reign, that all good kings were, for a series of ages, surnamed after him. Sinking at last under old age and infirmity, the nobles proposed that he should raise his son Gram to a partnership with him in the throne, in order to ease him of the weight of government, and instruct the young prince in the art of reigning. This proposition was vehemently opposed by Ringo, a nobleman of the first distinction in Zealand, who was ambitious of fixing the crown upon his own head. Skioldo immediately raised some troops, attacked the rebel, defeated and killed him, and after firmly establishing his son in the throne, expired, universally beloved and lamented. To this day the place where his palace stood is called Skioldeneffa.

G R A M.

- d GRAM inherited the virtues as well as the crown of his father. His whole reign was a series of victories and conquests, arising less from his ambition than the turbulence of his neighbours. The king of Sweden, taking advantage of the youth of Gram, made an irruption into Jutland with a powerful army; but he was attacked and slain by the young monarch of Denmark, who soon after annexed Sweden to his own crown. Gram discovering that Swarin, viceroy of Gothland, was conspiring against his life, in order to raise himself to the throne of Sweden, challenged him to single combat, and slew him. Scarce had he finished this gallant action, when honour called him to Norway, to revenge the disgrace of his sister, ravished by Suibdager, who had deposed her husband, and usurped the crown of Norway. After a course of victories gained over the Norwegians, at length he fell by the hand of Suibdager, and died with the reputation of a great prince, whose character was soiled with no other blemish than inconstancy and infidelity to his wives. He left behind him two sons, Guthorm, by Groa, his first wife; and Hadding, by Signe, his second, after e repudiating the former.

SUIBDAGER pursuing his victory, united the crowns of Denmark and Sweden to that of Norway, to neither of which he had any natural right. Moved by the prayers of Groa, the divorced wife of Gram, he replaced Guthorm in the throne of his father, on condition that Denmark should be tributary to him; gave Sweden to his own son Asmond, reserving only Norway to himself; after which he was defeated and slain by Hadding, the second son of Gram, in a sea-fight off the coast of Sweden.

- f. GUTHORM enjoyed the crown of Denmark but a short time: he found himself despised by the nobility, and hated by the common people, for stooping to hold a tributary crown. His father's virtues rose in their memory; they upbraided the son with them, which sunk so deeply into his mind, that he fell sick and died of grief, being succeeded by the brave Hadding, the avenger of his father's death, and conqueror of the usurper Suibdager.

trepidity. She shared all his misfortunes, conquered by his side, alleviated his distress, applied balsam to his wounds, and was at length the companion of his prosperity, after surmounting incredible difficulties. He was no sooner placed on the throne of Denmark, than Asmond king of Sweden, thirsting to revenge his father's death, attacked him with a numerous army; but he was so well supported by his faithful subjects, that he slew with his own hand in battle, Henry prince of Sweden, and afterwards the king his father, whose body he pierced with his lance. In this engagement Hadding received a wound in his foot, of which he was lame all his life after. Returning from this war, he found the treasury robbed in his absence, and immediately ordered Gramer, to whom he had committed the charge of his money and jewels, to be hanged upon a gibbet; an example that struck such terror as induced his accomplices to replace their share of the spoils.

WHILE Hadding was busied in framing laws, and establishing good order and tranquility in his kingdom, he was suddenly attacked by Uffon, the second son of Asmond, who after his father's death had succeeded to the throne of Sweden. Uffon, aware of the valour and power of Hadding, would not venture upon an open war; but collecting a great fleet and army, he made a descent upon the coasts of Denmark, set fire to the towns, carried off the inhabitants, and after laying a great part of the country waste, retreated to his own kingdom, whither he was closely pursued by the Dane, after he had first secured his frontiers by strong guards and garrisons. What he wanted in courage Uffon fully supplied in cunning; he declined battle, and so harassed Hadding with marches and countermarches, cutting off his provisions, laying waste the countries through which he must pass, and attacking his out-parties, that, reduced to the last extremity, he determined to hazard all to come to an engagement. As the Danes were by this time worn out with fatigue, and weakened by famine, the Swedes found it no difficult matter to resist their most strenuous efforts; upon which Hadding retired with prodigious loss, first to Helsingia, a northern province of Sweden, and from thence to Norway, where he applied to Hacquin the king for assistance. While the reinforcement was levying, he fell in love with Hacquin's daughter, married to a deformed nobleman of Norway, whom he challenged to fight. After having slain the husband, he obtained the daughter in marriage, with the consent of her father, herself making no scruple about espousing a king, though the murderer of her husband. The auxiliaries being ready to march, Hadding a second time led his army into Sweden, which so terrified Uffon, that he determined to effect by assassins what he had not the courage to attempt by a fair and open war. Promising his daughter, a beautiful young lady with a large portion, to whoever would bring him the king of Denmark's head, Thumming, a nobleman of Sweden, undertook the inglorious exploit; but finding all his attempts frustrated, he had recourse to the Biarmes, a people at that time inhabiting the remoter parts of Finland. Still he was unsuccessful; but that nothing might be wanting to gain so noble a prize as the king's daughter, he applied himself to magic: here likewise all his arts were foiled by an old magician in Hadding's camp, who countermined all his plots and contrivances. At last, mad with despair, he made an assault upon the Danish camp, and was repulsed with great loss. Hadding pursuing his victory, resolved to put an end to the war, by besieging Uffon in Upsal, then the capital of Sweden. Uffon, to ward off the impending blow, sent ambassadors to the Dane, with terms of accommodation, and gave some of his nobility as hostages: upon which Hadding, who suspected no treachery, entered Upsal, and was splendidly entertained. The house was filled with assassins, who were ready to execute their baseness on a signal given, before which they were fortunately discovered by some of Hadding's guard; and immediately put to death. To revenge the perfidy, Hadding pursued the war against Uffon, attacked, defeated, and killed him in the field; but with a generosity becoming a conqueror, gave the kingdom to Hunding, Uffon's brother, and buried the royal corpse with funeral honours, which the villainous treachery of his life little merited. After numberless exploits performed in Jutland, Courland, Saxony, and Britain, he laid violent hands on himself, probably in disgust at the unnatural conduct of his favourite daughter Uwilda, who had made repeated attempts upon her father's life. Thus he fulfilled a prophecy well known among the Danes, Swedes, and Saxons, "That Hadding would escape all the snares of his enemies, and the treachery of his own blood, only to lay violent hands on himself" (D).

(D) We find in some historians, that Hadding, after his return from Britain, hanged himself in presence of his whole court. It was reported that he died in that island, and Hunding king of Sweden, celebrating his funeral rites, was drowned in a caldron of wort. Hadding's death is attributed to his grief for this misfortune (1).

HADDING left two children by Ragnilda, a daughter of Hugh king of Russia. Frotho the son succeeded to the crown of Denmark, and Suanhuido, the daughter, to the sovereignty of Sweden. Frotho, from his excellent qualities, was surnamed Giffmild, or Generous, inheriting all the virtues of his father, with his throne. On his accession he found the treasury so exhausted, that he was unable to advance the soldiers their arrears. To remedy this evil, without laying fresh taxes upon the people, he attacked a dragon, as tradition reports, or rather Draco, a famous pirate, who had laid up prodigious wealth in remote caves, which he defended by a strong body of desperate ruffians. Draco was slain, and all his treasures fell into the hands of the conqueror, who was enabled thereby to enter upon the mighty designs which he had formed in his mind. In a word, he conquered Britain, Scotland, (for at that time the country south of the Tweed went by the name of Britain) Sleswick, Russia, Pomerania, Holstein, and other countries. He seized upon London, the capital of Britain, by an ingenious stratagem; for causing it to be rumoured that he died in the camp, leave was asked of the British governor to bury the royal corpse in a certain temple in the city, and a treaty concluded for this purpose. The governor suspecting no treachery, admitted a corpse, attended by a numerous procession of supposed mourners, who had concealed arms under their cloaths. Others dropped in afterwards; and when Frotho thought his strength sufficient, the signal was made for his men to fall upon the Britons, which they obeyed with incredible fury, slaying all before them till they got possession of the city, in spite of the desperate defence of the inhabitants. Returning thence to Denmark, he entered upon a fresh war with the king of Sweden, who had married his sister, and perished in battle, not by the hands of the enemy, but oppressed and borne down by the weight of his own armour, leaving behind him three sons, Haldan, Roe, and Scal, and the reputation of a great warrior<sup>b</sup>.

HALDANE, the eldest, an ambitious, cruel, and unnatural prince, succeeded to his father's crown, which he endeavoured to render secure by the death of his two brothers, in a manner equally brutal and insidious. It is indeed supposed by historians, that they both aspired to the throne; the only circumstance that can at all palliate the king's cruelty, who, not contented with polluting his hands with the blood of his brethren, steeped them in that of his most faithful subjects of all ranks; notwithstanding which he lived to an old age, the dread and detestation of his people. He left behind him two sons, Roe and Helgo, the successors of his throne, but not of his vices.

By right of seniority, as well as by the voice of the people, Roe might have reigned alone; but he absolutely refused the crown upon any other conditions than sharing his power with Helgo: an uncommon instance of affection, founded upon kindred and affinity. Roe was of a stature contemptibly small and mean; but this external defect he more than compensated by the greatness of his soul, his courage, generosity, and other manly virtues. He was a strict observer of justice, and the first prince who reduced the customs of the people, founded upon long tradition, to a written system of laws. Before his time, historians relate, that custom was the only rule of action. Murder, robbery, and theft, were punished, not as infractions of the law, but of the natural rights of mankind; Roe was the first who specified the punishments consequent on certain crimes, and reduced the law imprinted by nature on the human mind, to a more fixed and definite meaning and system. He was the founder of the city Roschild, which exists to this day: and while he was busied in civilizing his subjects, framing certain rules for government, and decorating the country with churches and buildings, his attention was diverted from the arts of peace, which he cultivated so diligently, to engage in a war with the king of Sweden. Frotho I. had given that kingdom in trust to Regner, the late king, who constantly paid the promised tribute; but he dying, and his son Hotbrod succeeding to the throne, the young monarch was ambitious of throwing off the yoke, and holding his crown independent of Denmark. With this view he refused to pay the usual homage and tribute, which gave birth to the present war, that ended with the life of Roe, who fell in battle, bewailed by his subjects, but most by Helgo, his brother and successor<sup>c</sup>.

ber of northern states; and now the first act of his prowess, since his reigning alone, was the engaging in single combat with Hunding prince of Saxony. Him he slew in the field, and of consequence annexed Saxony to his own dominions, as had been previously agreed. Returning thence to Jutland, he drove out a body of Saxons who had taken possession in his absence. After this he engaged the king of the Vandals by sea, and coming off victorious, he stopped for refreshment at a little island in the Baltic, where he became enamoured of a girl of mean station, by whom he had a daughter, that afterwards became the mother of Rolfo, who succeeded his father in the throne; an abominable incest, which obscures all the former glory of his reign.

SCARCE had Helgo finished the Vandal war, when resolving to avenge his brother's death, he marched against Hotbrod of Sweden, whom he slew in the field of battle, reducing the whole kingdom to obedience. The more fully to satiate his revenge, he established a cruel law, by which a Dane might, on any provocation, put a Swede to death with impunity. Placing the crown on the head of Atisla, son of Hotbrod, who had engaged to pay the tribute discontinued by his father, he returned to Denmark, and either from a disgust to public affairs, or as other writers more probably suggest, from recollecting the horrid impiety he committed in debauching his own daughter, he laid violent hands on himself, and died a martyr to his crimes. He was, indeed, a prince in whom the noblest virtues and grossest crimes were blended: his military ability, and attachment to his brother, would have rendered his fame immortal, were not those virtues more than ballanced by his unnatural lust, and shocking cruelty <sup>a</sup>.

R O L F O.

THE virtues of Rolfo soon obliterated the memory of his disgraceful birth. The graces of his person equalled those of his mind, and his stature and strength were so extraordinary, that he was surnamed Rbrage, a Danish word, expressive of these qualities. His valour and martial spirit did not, however, interrupt the peaceable felicity of his subjects; for tho' he wished for an opportunity of signalizing his prowess, yet he suppressed his inclinations to war from just views of policy, and a fatherly regard to the interest of his people. He was at length drawn into a war with his own step-father, the king of Sweden, to punish his inhuman usage of the queen, who was mother to Rolfo. The king of Sweden was killed in battle, and Rolfo soon after perished by the treachery of a Danish nobleman, whom he had distinguished by numberless instances of his favour; and, among others, by marrying him to his sister. No prince had ever more strongly engaged the affections of his people than Rolfo, though ambition had pushed on his brother-in-law to this shocking parricide. His virtues were splendid: magnificence, generosity, and valour, were united in his person. Justice, clemency, and a strict regard to his promises, had set him far above all the former kings of Denmark, in reputation. In a word, historians are so full of his praises, that we might suspect them of painting with the pencil of fancy, if their portraits were not amply attested by facts superior to all expression <sup>c</sup>.

H O T H E R.

ROLFO dying without children, the states immediately assembled for the election of a new king, and chose in his room Hotber, grandson by his daughter to Hadding, the father of Frotho I. This young prince had been sent in his infancy to Norway, and educated at the court of that monarch with the greatest care and indulgence. Upon notice of the death of Rolfo, he was advised by the king of Norway, to offer himself a candidate for the crown, who promised to assist him with all his interest and force. While preparations were making to execute this plan, a messenger arrived from Denmark, acquainting him of the election of the states, upon which he immediately set out for that kingdom. In gratitude to the king of Norway, he espoused his daughter, whom he raised to the throne of Denmark. By this marriage he involved himself in a war with Balder, a northern prince, who had paid his addresses to the princess, before Hotber had made any proposals to her. Several furious battles were fought between the rivals, when at length Balder was defeated and slain in a sea-fight, which gave name to that strait called to this day Balderfount. This glorious victory brought on the death of Hotber; for Balder's father, resolving to avenge his son, summoned all his nobles, and, in a pathetic speech, recommended it to their care to wipe off their late disgrace, by some signal exertion of their courage. Upon which Boe, his son-in-law, undertook to finish the quarrel with Hotber, and accordingly challenged him to single combat. The king of Denmark accepting his proposals, called his council, and, as if he had some foreboding of his fate, he pressed the states to declare his son Rorick the successor:

a he told them, that the event of war was doubtful, but the civil divisions which would happen in his kingdom certain, should it please the gods to deprive him of life before the succession was settled. Were his kingdom once secured against the calamities he foresaw, then would he cheerfully devote his life to glory, and the good of Denmark. The king's speech had such an effect, that Rorick was unanimously elected heir-apparent to the throne, though then but a child; after which Hotber went to meet his antagonist, by whose hands he fell (E).

NOTWITHSTANDING Rorick was appointed by the people to succeed to his father, the victorious Boo found means to lay aside this election, and fix himself in the throne; but how long he reigned, whether he died a natural death, or was deposed, history is silent; b and, indeed, some of the most accurate Danish historians, omit him intirely in the catalogue of kings<sup>a</sup>.

MEURSIUS and Saxo Grammaticus alone affirm, that he never ascended the throne<sup>b</sup>. We shall therefore continue the series of princes from Hotber to his son, without interruption. as the point is disputed, and at this distance of time cannot possibly be determined with certainty:

R O R I C K S L Y N G I B O N D.

BEFORE Rorick, or, as some writers call him, Roderick Slynigibond, had fully arrived at the years of maturity, he found it necessary to head his own armies, and oppose a formidable league which threatened destruction to Denmark. The young monarch used the utmost diligence in levying forces, and equipping a fleet, and his endeavours were c seconded by the affections of his subjects, who neglected nothing which might contribute to the glory of their king, on which rested their own security. It had been stipulated in a treaty offensive and defensive, made between the Swedes, Courlanders, and some other northern powers tributary to Denmark, that they should unanimously throw off their submission to this crown, refuse all tribute and homage, and defend each other with all their forces, in order to reduce the pride and power of Denmark. This resolution was taken with spirit, but soon broke through, by the superior fortune and valour of the Danes, who, headed by their king, defeated the allies by sea and land, forcing them d to pay a heavier tribute than before. Soon afterwards the victorious Rorick fell by accident into the sea, and was drowned, leaving behind him the reputation of a just and warlike prince, emulous of nothing so much as the affections of his people, and national honour. Other writers alledge, that the cause of his death, as well as the duration of his reign, are very doubtful; but all agree in giving him the highest character (F). One circumstance, however, seems to prove, that his reign was not so short as Grammaticus alleges; for he left a son who succeeded to his throne, and a daughter whom he married to Harwendil prince of Jutland; yet they say he engaged in the Swedish war when he was scarce of age, and died soon after it was finished: consequently this war must have been of long duration, or Rorick must have survived it for a great number of years, as the reader will find by consulting the last note.

(E) It merits observation, that some antiquarians suppose Dan, the founder of the Danish monarchy, reigned about the time that Saxo Grammaticus, Meursius, and Pontanus place Hotber, the 14th king, that is, the year before Christ 490. It must, indeed, be acknowledged, that the period allotted by these historians for a king's reign, is as much too long, as that assigned by Gasser and others is too short. This prince is entirely omitted by Saxo Grammaticus, Meursius, and Pontanus; but we have ventured to insert him upon the authority of the accurate Suaningius, and the learned Lyschander, who makes him the 16th king from Dan, the founder of the Danish monarchy (1).

(F) At this time Harwendil and Feggo, or Fogo, two brothers, reigned in Jutland, and paid homage and tribute to the crown of Denmark. The former had married, says Meursius, the daughter of Rorick, by which means he succeeded to his crown, soon after which he was treacherously murdered by his brother Feggo. Hamlet his son, suspecting that his uncle's ambition occasioned his father's death, feigned madness, the better to conceal his purpose of revenging his father's murder, in which he at length succeeded, having stabbed Feggo with his own hand at a public festival, while he was surrounded by all his nobility. Many of the circumstances related by Saxo Grammaticus, are exactly copied by our great dramatic writer in the tragedy called Hamlet. The event, however, is different; for, according to the historian, Hamlet enjoyed his uncle's crown for a great number of years, and died with the reputation of one of the best princes that had ever filled the throne. However, all the best critics are of opinion that neither Harwendil, Feggo, or Hamlet, ever reigned in Denmark, affirming that Rorick was immediately succeeded by Viglet, who killed Hamlet prince of Jutland in battle, as he was endeavouring by force to succeed to the crown of his grandfather Rorick. Pontanus and Suaningius positively affirm, that neither of these Jutland princes ever ascended the Danish throne, though they admit the truth of all the other circumstances related by Meursius: indeed, Saxo Grammaticus himself does not place them among the Danish monarchs (2).

king's son.

VERMUND, the son of Viglet, next succeeded, who was no less remarkable than his father, for a mild, pacific, indolent disposition; but there were not wanting the seeds of courage, though circumstances never so fell out as to afford him an opportunity of displaying the valour of his ancestors. After a long reign he at length became the joyful father of a son, who, to appearances however, promised him no great felicity as he grew up. He arrived at the age of manhood before he was ever heard to utter a syllable; and many of his actions bespoke a weak intellect, bordering upon idiotism. The old king was greatly affected, and, to add to his misfortunes, was afflicted with loss of sight, in consequence of old age, and a malady that had seized him some years before. Under these circumstances the aged and venerable Vermund was insulted by the prince of Saxony, who offered himself a candidate for a throne, which he said the spirit of the Danes ought never to permit being filled by a blind dotard, or a natural fool; for this was the purport of an insolent harangue, pronounced by his ambassador at a full diet of the states of Denmark. Vermund, stung with reproach, forgetful of his old age and blindness, and eager to vindicate his majesty, replied, that the reproach thrown upon him was truly worthy of a Saxon; that a man of spirit would contend for the honour of defending a prince, sunk under age and infirmity, instead of endeavouring to aggravate his misfortunes, by despoiling him of his just rights; and, finally, that notwithstanding blindness and decrepitude, he doubted not but the gods would give him still strength sufficient to repel all the attempts of so vain-glorious a boaster, in consequence of which hope he was willing to rest the fate of his crown upon the issue of a single combat between them. Astonished with the courage of the old prince, the Saxon ambassador declined the challenge, saying it was unworthy of his master to contend with a blind man, who had a son able to support his quarrel. The states were silent at this reply, which Uffon, prince of Denmark, observing, rose up in a fury, and told the ambassador, that the king had a son, and Denmark a prince, able and willing to defend their rights and the honour of the nation. "Tell your insolent master, says he, that Uffon, whom he supposes unworthy of succeeding to the crown, will not only accept of his challenge, but fight singly against him and any other Saxon he will make choice of." Surprised at this intrepid reply from a prince who had never spoke before, or ever given the slightest proofs of spirit or understanding, the states joyfully appointed the time and place for deciding the quarrel. They, however, represented to Uffon the rashness of engaging with two antagonists, each of them probably of equal strength with himself; but he was fixed in his resolution. Accordingly the parties met, and the old king ordered himself to be conducted to a precipice that hung over the sea, near the field of battle, resolving to put an end to his life, should his son be worsted, and the kingdom of Denmark disgraced. The combatants engaged with the utmost fury; Uffon, like the brave Horatius, on whom depended the fate of Rome, gradually retreated and defended himself, until he had separated the enemy, and exhausted their strength; after which he attacked the weakest with such intrepidity and strength, that he soon laid him dead at his feet. Now the two princes fought hand to hand, and Uffon perceiving his superiority, generously offered to grant the Saxon his life, if he would submit to pay him homage, and a tribute; which the other refusing, he laid him dead at one stroke, and was carried triumphant off the field on the shoulders of the Danish nobility, who were overjoyed to find valour, strength, and understanding, united in the person of a prince,<sup>e</sup>

O L A U S I.

Soon after his accession he changed his name to that of Olaus, and was surnamed the Merciful, from the generous proposal he had made to the Saxon prince, as well as from his natural good disposition. His reign was an uninterrupted series of felicity to his subjects, and victories over his enemies; but history relates no particulars. He married a lady of noble birth in Sleswick, by whom he had a son, who was raised to the throne upon the death of Olaus<sup>b</sup>.

THE young king was called Dan, the second monarch of that name who had swayed the Danish sceptre. No prince was ever more beloved during the first years of his reign. His military capacity had greatly enlarged his dominions, and the tributes paid by foreign princes augmented the power, wealth, and glory of the state; but, flushed with success, he became insolent, cruel, and prodigal of his wealth and fame, dying at an advanced age, as much detested for his vices as before he was esteemed for his virtue<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> HUGLETH was next elected king; but whether he was the son of the preceding monarch we have no account. All that history relates of him is, that he conquered in a sea-fight Hometh and Hogrin, two of the chief persons in Sweden, who had long exercised piracy in the Baltic, and scourged all the coasts with a powerful fleet. He likewise kept the king of Sweden in awe, though he had raised a powerful army to support a resolution he had formed of discontinuing the tribute, and shaking off the Danish yoke. It would appear that his reign was uncommonly long, as from the year 225 before the birth of Christ, to the year 172, we find no other king mentioned; and indeed, some historians call him by the name of Hugleth the Little, second son to Dan<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> AFTER the death of Hugleth, Frotho, the second of that name, surnamed the Vigorous, was raised to the throne. There never was a prince endued with nobler qualities of mind and body; more courteous, generous, and brave; he soon became the darling of his people, and the terror of his rebellious neighbours, most of whom were tributary to his crown. He subdued Norway, after killing the king in single combat, and annexed it, with some islands in the Baltic before unconquered, to his dominions. Having reigned thirty years he breathed his last, leaving the crown, with the consent of the people, to his son Dan, who became the third monarch of that name<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> IN the very beginning of Dan's reign, the Saxons were so insolent, as not only to refuse payment of the tribute due to the sovereign of Denmark, but to insist on Dan's reimbursing them all the money extorted from them by his father, by Hugleth, Dan II. and by Olaus and Uffon; a demand which soon produced a war, in which they were forced to submit to their former condition. This prince engaged likewise in a war with Sweden, concerning the event of which history is silent. All we know is, that he was wounded in a single combat by the Swedish monarch. We are told, indeed, that after this he conquered all those states inhabiting the countries on each side the Elbe, to whom the Danes gave the general name of Saxons; after which he was seized with an acute fever, that carried him off in the prime and vigour of life<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> To him succeeded Fridleff, surnamed the Swift, who immediately, on his accession, entered into a close and intimate correspondence with the king of Halland; for at this time Halland was a separate and independent sovereignty. The intention of this league was to secure and protect each other's dominions against all enemies, to clear the seas of pirates, and thoroughly to reduce the Swedes and Norwegians, who wanted only a fit opportunity to shake off the galling yoke of Denmark. This treaty, like most other compacts between princes, was broke as soon as either party imagined he could take an advantage of the other. The monarch of Halland was the first aggressor; he raised an army, and made a descent on Denmark, at a time when security had rendered Fridleff totally unprepared to receive him; but the vigour of this prince made him soon repent his treachery. Fridleff assembled a powerful army, and defeated Huirvill in a pitched battle, making great slaughter of his troops. In the pursuit Huirvill was killed, and Fridleff not only eased of the war, but fully revenged upon his insidious enemy, whose kingdom he annexed to his own dominions. After this we are told he carried his arms into Ireland, and having overrun a great part of the country, made himself master of Dublin, the capital. The same attempt he made on Britain, from whence, after sustaining a signal defeat, he scarce escaped with life. Chagrined with this repulse, he determined upon applying his mind to domestic affairs, and studied rather to make his old subjects happy, than to acquire new, in which laudable undertaking he died, at an extreme old age<sup>a</sup>.

A. C. N. 37,

SUCH was the reputation Fridleff acquired with the people during the last years of his reign, that they unanimously agreed to raise his son Frotho, then a child, to the weighty charge of governing a powerful kingdom. Guardians were immediately appointed him, and the affairs of the nation committed to a select council of the nobility, with this reserve, that all their decrees should be submitted to a general diet of the states, and there confirmed or repealed as the people thought proper. In this situation things remained for the space of fourteen years, when the king took the government upon himself. The first years of his reign passed in indolence and inactivity, whence he gained the name of Frotho the Pacific; but the corruptions that had crept into the administration, waked him at length out of this lethargy, to an exertion of those extraordinary abilities, which, in a little time, acquired him the appellation of Great, and the reputation of the most valiant prince of his age. He carried on nine wars with the most powerful northern nations, and came off victorious in all. At length poison accomplished what neither the courage, the numbers, nor the animosity of his enemies could effect. A variety of fabulous circumstances relating to this event, are recorded by all the Danish writers; but we have omitted them as favouring too strongly of the ignorance and prejudices of those times, to be read with pleasure in a more enlightened age.

FR O T H O dying without male issue, the diet took the extraordinary resolution of making him king, who should write the best verses on the memory of the late monarch; and Hiarn being adjudged the best poet, was accordingly raised to the throne, in reward of his superior genius. He was of that class of people called Scialdres in Denmark, and Bards in other countries, whose business it was to roam about the country, reciting their productions at the houses of the great, and entertained by them as the repositories of the wit and learning of the times; all history, and the achievements of their ancestors being contained in those long tales and narratives composed by the ingenious bard. The poet did not long enjoy his exaltation, being deposed by Fridleff, a relation to the late king, who had spent the greater part of his life in foreign service, and was now returned upon the news of his majesty's death, to lay claim to his crown. This he obtained by killing the poor bard in single combat, and convincing the states, by a relation of his conduct in the services in which he had been engaged, that his valour merited the highest distinctions. Pontanus indeed relates from Grammaticus, that Hiarn, after several battles by sea and land, which he maintained with great obstinacy, was at length slain by his rival, in a sea fight on the coast of Jutland, the island Hiarn, situated on that shore, taking its name from this unhappy event<sup>b</sup>.

No sooner was Fridleff seated in the throne, than he sent ambassadors to Norway to demand Fergertha, daughter to that king, in marriage. The insolent refusal of the Norwegian monarch produced a war between the two kingdoms, which terminated in the death of Amand king of Norway, and in the espousal of Fridleff with his daughter. We are told of a number of miraculous battles this courageous prince fought with certain giants<sup>c</sup>.

- b FROTHO IV. his son, then but twelve years of age, was proclaimed his successor. Frotho IV. 28th king. This prince began to give very early proofs of his virtue and generosity: inasmuch that before he arrived at maturity, he quashed a dangerous rebellion that had been raised by a combination of the principal nobility, to dethrone him, merely by the prudence of his conduct, and steadiness of his measures, without spilling a drop of blood. He obtained the surname of Generous, from the beneficence and humanity of his disposition, which was never so amply gratified as with the opportunity of bestowing favours on deserving objects. His courage was likewise displayed in several battles he fought with Swerting and Harif, two Saxon lords, who had raised great armies in defence of their liberties, and with a view to throw off their subjection to Denmark. Swerting perceiving that Frotho was invincible in the field, had recourse to treachery, pretended a perfect reconciliation, and invited the Danish monarch to a festival, at which he proposed destroying him by setting fire to the house. The good fortune of Frotho saved him, however, from this dangerous snare, and his valour turned the due punishment upon the insidious Saxon, whom he attacked sword in hand, and soon laid dead at his feet: but he died himself not long after, of a wound he had received from a poisoned weapon in the contest with Swerting<sup>2</sup>.

I N G E L L.

- c THE states immediately assembled and chose his son Ingell, or Ingle, to succeed his father. This prince at first abandoned himself to a life of indolence and debauchery, into which he was artfully drawn by some of the nobility, who formed designs upon his crown, intending by this means to alienate from him the affections of his people. The foresight and natural good sense of the young monarch penetrated into their machinations, and recovered him at a time when he was plunged in a life of dissipation and pleasure. All of a sudden he discarded his old companions, and, like our Henry, assumed at once a behaviour and dignity worthy of majesty. This dismissal of the first nobility of the realm occasioned murmurings among them, which soon broke out into open rebellion. Here it was d that Ingell distinguished his valour, his prudence, and his clemency. He first defeated his enemies, obliged them to submit to his terms, and then not only pardoned them, but took them again into favour, which he esteemed the true method of gaining their affections, and securing their allegiance; but he first insisted upon a total reformation of their manners, and enforced this by his own example<sup>3</sup>. We find indeed a different character of this prince in Meursius, who relates, that after the suppression of this rebellion, he fell again into his old courses, and ended his reign in the same inglorious manner in which he began<sup>m</sup>.

- e UPON his death his son Olaus II. ascended the throne, inheriting all the vices of his father, without one of his virtues. His whole reign, which happily did not exceed ten years, was a series of luxury, profusion, and the most scandalous lust and debauchery. He died however seemingly penitent, as appears by the speech he made to his sons on his death-bed, in which he exhorts them to retrieve by their conduct the national honour, which had greatly suffered by his weak and dissolute measures (G). (H) The Danish writers are divided in their opinions concerning the departments these princes agreed upon. Pontanus says, that maritime affairs were committed to Harold; though this probably happened after the miscarriage of his brother (2).

Frotho entered first upon action, and made an unsuccessful descent upon some of the neighbouring coasts, his soldiers, most of whom were married, refusing to engage in any dangerous enterprize, by which their families might be brought to ruin; and Meursius expressly affirms, that the influence which Frotho's queen had over him, occasioned his disgrace.
The particulars, however, of this affair are not recorded, and we only know that he quitted his employment in disgust to Harold, who immediately established a maxim, that no married man should be enlisted into the sea or land-service; a measure that was attended with the happiest consequences. The soldiers, emulous of glory, and free from domestic cares, braved all dangers, and obtained numberless victories under the conduct of the brave Harold;
after which they were permitted to return home, to settle and enjoy the fruits and glory of their toil and courage. Frotho was stung with envy at the success of his brother's arms, whose valour had so much eclipsed his own actions; and unable to support the sight of a person, whose victories reminded him of his own defeat, and whose public character he deemed a tacit reproach, took the base resolution of having him murdered. His resentment had fortified his heart against the dictates of honour, brotherly love, and humanity: he employed an assassin, accomplished his end, and then murdered the tool of his villainy, the better to conceal it. But parricide is a crime, against which the Almighty seems, in a particular manner, to have pointed his vengeance. Frotho's own conscience was a sufficient accuser, and gave such evidence against him, as convinced the whole world that Harold met with his death from the hand of his own brother. All his measures were dictated by phrenzy and despair, which became visible in his countenance. He imagined he could not be secure while the children of Harold lived, and took measures to quiet his mind, by encreasing the number of his crimes, and superadding the murder of his nephews to that of his only brother. His designs, however, were frustrated by the vigilance of a nobleman, to whom the education of the young princes was committed. After concealing his pupils in a cave, the faithful guardian returned to court, and implored his majesty that he would abstain from shedding his own blood, and not deprive his innocent nephews of life, after robbing them of a royal and brave parent. Frotho, pretending to be moved by the intreaties of this honest nobleman, had nearly accomplished by dissimulation what he could not effect by force. A few years after, he got the young gentlemen into his hands, and was going to have them assassinated, when their own address saved them: they pretended to quarrel, and desired leave to decide their dispute by the sword, which the king readily granted, in expectation that their warmth, courage, and animosity, might effect his purposes, without dipping his own hands in their blood. He was even cruel enough to be a spectator of the fight, and thus his punishment was brought about by the invisible operations of Providence; for the princes, upon a signal agreed, turned upon their uncle, and in an instant laid him dead on the ground with their swords. Thus perished the treacherous and bloody Frotho, by the hands of his own nephews, after a reign rendered infamous to all posterity, by the barbarous murder of a brother, who was the greatest ornament of his family and kingdom, as well as the most valorous prince of his age.

H A L D A N E II. and H A R O L D II.

FROTHO was succeeded by the two sons of Harold, the oldest named Haldane, and the youngest called after his father. Haldane immediately engaged in a war with Siward king of Sweden, for reasons with which we are unacquainted; after giving him frequent and signal defeats, he at length slew him in battle with his own hand. Erick, the son and successor of Siward, to revenge his father's death, made a sudden descent on Denmark, with a powerful armament, while Haldane was taken up in deciding a dispute with some Saxon lords. Harold immediately assembled an army, and gave the Swedes battle; but the success was not agreeable to his courage and the justice of his cause; for after an obstinate engagement he was slain in the arms of victory, which now immediately declared for Erick.
Upon this Haldane immediately returned to Denmark, drove Erick out of his dominions, pursued him into Sweden, defeated him, and terminated the quarrel by the death of his enemy, whom he engaged in single combat. After this glorious transaction, he fitted out a powerful fleet against the pirates who infested his coasts, and was no less successful in this than he had been in all his former wars. Towards the close of his life, and in a very advanced age, he married the princess of Norway, and by her had a son born on the very day in which he died, of a lingering disease contracted in consequence of the fatigue and cold he sustained in his last campaigns. Such were the actions of the glorious Haldane, commonly called the son of Thor, (a Danish deity) from his invincible courage and those generous qualities which seemed to elevate him above the rank of mortals. His name had spread itself over all the northern kingdoms, and in Sweden particularly his me-

THE diet of the states elected in the room of Haldane his cousin, nephew, or as some historians allege, his natural brother Unguin, or Haguin, king of the Goths. Some writers call this prince the son-in-law of the late king, tho' Meursius and Pontanus affirm, that Haldane's daughter had been given in marriage to Ebbo, a northern prince, in her father's life-time. All we know of this reign is, that it was short and bloody, the crown being obstinately disputed by Reginaldo king of Sweden, by whom Unguin was slain. Unguin, or Haguin, 33<sup>d</sup> king.

REGNALDO did not, however, succeed in his designs, for the states immediately elected Siwald, Siwald, 34th king. in the room of his deceased father. The war still continued with Sweden, some say, from Reginaldo's continuing his claim, while others affirm, that Siwald renewed it with intention to avenge his father's death. Pontanus, indeed, speaks of the Swedish war as if it had happened towards the close of Siwald's reign, and attributes the many quarrels in which he was at first engaged to the beauty of his daughter, who raised contentions among all the northern princes, some of them endeavouring to force Siwald to comply with their proposals. Indeed, the transactions of his reign are so variously related, that we can affirm nothing of this monarch more than that he did not degenerate from the heroic spirit which had distinguished almost all the preceding kings of Denmark. His death is as variously related as his life, some writers asserting, that he died in his kingdom; while others affirm, that he ended his days a miserable exile in Scotland <sup>e</sup>, whither he had been driven by Haco, the son of Hamund, who had defeated him in a sea-engagement; a circumstance which Saxo Grammaticus, Meursius, and other historians relate of Siwald II (I).

SIWALD left behind him three sons, Sigar, Alfo, and Alger, the former of whom, by right of primogeniture, succeeded to his crown. D. 1774. though the Danes kept in their own hands the power of electing monarchs, yet they seldom set aside the royal issue, and particularly the eldest son, unless incapacity or some other reason rendered it necessary. This prince being of an indolent tame disposition, committed the care of government to his brother, a prince of a very different cast, and equally respectable for the qualities of his body and mind. The first act of Alfo's administration, was the sending ambassadors to demand in marriage Avilda, daughter to the king of Gothland; a lady who, at this time, contrary to the manners and disposition of her sex, exercised the profession of piracy, and was scouring the seas with a powerful fleet, while a foreign prince was offering sacrifices to her beauty at the shrine of love. Alfo, perceiving that this masculine lady was not to be gained by the usual arts of lovers, took the extraordinary resolution of addressing her in a method more agreeable to her humour. He fitted out a fleet, went in quest of her, and engaged her in a furious battle, which continued two days without remission; thus gaining possession of a heart to be conquered only by valour <sup>f</sup>. After this conquest of the brave Amazon, Alfo turned his arms against other pirates who had infested the coasts of Denmark. In this expedition he fell in with a fleet commanded by the three sons of Hamund, king of Ireland, and immediately entered upon action. After continuing the whole day an engagement, which was fought with equal obstinacy on both sides, night separated the combatants, and next morning proposals were made for an accommodation, which were accepted by the parties. They each of them had sufficient proofs of the courage of their antagonists; and as neither harboured any personal resentment, they parted with hearty professions of sincere esteem and friendship. Alfo disputes the heart of the prince of Gothland by arms, and after conquering her marries the amazon. Notwithstanding this treaty, Alfo again renewed the war against the Hibernian princes, at the instigation of an old crafty Danish nobleman, who persuaded him that his honour was engaged in obtaining a complete victory over those boyish commanders. In consequence he fitted out a fleet, engaged them a second time, and after killing Helvin and Hamund, the two eldest of the brothers, was himself slain by the hand of Hagabert the youngest. The victorious Hagabert, hearing of the extraordinary beauty of the king of Denmark's sister, dressed himself in women's apparel, and found means to insinuate himself in quality of a maid of honour to the princess, to whom he soon made a declaration of his sex and quality, and the motives which had compelled him to so extraordinary a proceeding. His youth, beauty, and love, soon wrought upon the affections of Signa, for that was the princess's name, and the consequence was the loss of her virtue, and of Hagabert's life; for the intrigue coming to Sigar's ears, he ordered him to be hanged upon a gibbet without form of trial. This was so cruel a stroke to the fond Signa, that in despair she set fire to the palace, and afterwards strangled herself, putting an end to a life which would be insupportable to her, after the ignominious catastrophe of her lover. Sigar was inconsolable at the unhappy end of a sister and brother he loved with a tender affection; and his misfortune was aggravated by the melancholy situation of his kingdom, now invaded by a powerful army from Ireland, commanded by Haco, the king's fourth son, who was come to revenge the death of his brethren. Sigar's grief did not, however, prevent his taking every possible measure for the security of his kingdom. He placed guards on the coasts, and took possession of all the strong posts through which Haco must pass to Roschild and Letbra, then the residence of the Danish monarch; but all these precautions were eluded by the art and conduct of Haco: he ordered his men to cut down boughs and green branches of trees, which they held in their left hands, marching with their drawn swords in the right.

 So extraordinary a phenomenon as a moving forest terrified the Danish out-guards, and made them abandon their posts without the least resistance; so that Haco met with no obstruction until he arrived with his army at Letbra, where Sigar was encamped with a body of forces. A battle ensued, and the Danish monarch fell, while he was exerting a courage superior to what it was ever imagined he possessed <sup>a</sup>.

Siwald II.
 36th king.

IN his room was elected Siwald II. his son, by the unanimous voice of the people. So eager was the young king to expel Haco, or Hacquin, as Pontanus calls him, and to revenge his father's death, that he assembled an army composed of both sexes, and gave battle to the Irish, after Haco had embarked near half his army. The fight continued for near three days without victory's declaring herself, till Haco fell towards the close of the third day; upon which a panic immediately seized his troops, who were slaughtered without mercy by the Danes, until they were satiated with blood. Such was the carnage made on the field, that to this day it goes by the name of Valbrana, a word expressive of the horrible slaughter <sup>b</sup>; though Meursius alleges, that this appellation was given to the field in which Sigar was defeated and killed. It is, indeed, the general opinion, that both princes perished in this engagement; and the male line of the royal family being extinct, the government of the kingdom was committed to five of the nobility, who divided the authority. Zealand was given to Hunding, Schonen to Ostmar, Funen to Hano, and Rorick and Ho- ther were chosen to preside over Jutland, which countries would seem to have constituted the whole of the Danish dominions at that period. In this situation was Denmark governed for the space of forty-one years, till Haldane, who had espoused Gurith, daughter to Siwald, was raised by her means to the throne. <sup>c</sup>

H A L D A N E III.

Haldane III.
 37th king.

THIS prince, the third of that name, was inferior to none of his predecessors in valour, and the other qualities of a great king; but his strength was so remarkable as to procure him the surname of Strong. The manner in which he gained the consent of Gurith his queen to address her, was an extraordinary instance of his prowess; for he slew with his own single arm, twelve guards, the boldest men who could be found, placed round her person to deny access to all suitors; a precaution which some attribute to her chastity, and others, to the policy of the regents, who were sensible they must surrender their authority as soon as she was married. Some years after his accession to the throne, he engaged in a war with Vifet (K), a prince who had been his rival in the affections of Gurith. Several desperate battles were fought between them, in the last of which Haldane was killed, yielding to the good fortune of his enemy, and rival in glory and in love <sup>c</sup>.

H A R O L D III.

Harold III.
 38th king.

AFTER his death the states met for the election of a new king, and their choice fell upon Harold, the son of Haldane. Harold began his reign with an attempt to complete the measures entered upon by his father, the reduction of the regents, who had refused to

(K) Vifet was son to Hunding, viceroy or regent of Zealand. He succeeded his father in that office, and kept his authority for several years after the accession of Haldane to the throne. Probable it is, that his refusal to surrender it was one of the chief causes of the war.

- a surrender their authority to Haldane, though duly elected by the states. In this he was more successful, having obliged all the provinces to submit to the crown in the space of a few years. He begun his operations with declaring war against Vifet, who had killed his father: him he destroyed at a festival, which Vifet gave to his friends at the celebration of his nuptials with a lady of Schonen. He next directed his arms against the governor of Southern Jutland, and soon reduced that country, by the death of the governor, whom he slew in the field of battle. His next expedition was against the regents or governors of North Jutland, in which he met with the same success. Zealand and Funen followed the fortune of the other provinces; and thus the kingdom of Denmark was again reunited, and all those petty tyrants subdued and destroyed in the space of two years, by the vigorous and intrepid conduct of Harold, who was now a second time proclaimed king of all Denmark. After this he restored by force to his throne and dominions Asmond king of Norway, from whence he had been driven by a strong party that had declared in favour of his sister. During his residence in Norway, Ivar king of Sweden breathed his last, leaving three sons, Ingo, Olaus, and Ingell. Ingo the eldest succeeded to his throne; but, not satisfied with his paternal dominions, he and his brothers, supported by a powerful army, made a descent on Denmark. Meursius relates, that the brothers only meditated an invasion, the news of which coming to Harold, he immediately entered Sweden, attacked the forces commanded by Ingo and Olaus, whom he slew in the field, after entirely routing their army. This defeat obliged Ingell to sue for peace, and accept of the terms which Harold thought fit to impose.
- c The Danish monarch, equally generous in prosperity and firm in adversity, granted such conditions as Ingell ought to have been satisfied with; he seemed to acquiesce, expecting soon to find an occasion of wiping off the late disgrace. Accordingly he invaded Schonen, while Harold was lulled in profound security, and carried off by violence the sister of the Danish monarch, whom he espoused. Hence the war was renewed, prosecuted with various success, and at length happily terminated, Harold, as just as brave, preferring an indifferent peace to the most successful war, which must necessarily be attended with the blood and ruin of many of his subjects. He was scarce returned from Sweden before the insolence of Ubbo, lord of Emden, or one of those states which now compose the circle of Westphalia, called him again into the field. It was not long before Ubbo found cause to repent his temerity; for he was defeated and taken prisoner, but afterwards set at liberty by the clemency of the conqueror. Nor was this all; Harold married him to his daughter, secured his friendship, and by his means strengthened his own interest upon the continent: but his success was not limited to these conquests; he reduced several nations upon the Rhine, took the Vandals, a people inhabiting that country on the Baltic, situated between the Vistula and the Elbe, into his protection, over-run Aquitain, and a part of Britain, which, says Grammaticus, had withdrawn its allegiance from Denmark since the death of Frotho III. But what sets the equity of this monarch in the most conspicuous view, is that, after raising an army to punish the perfidy of Ingell king of Sweden, he not only desisted from the enterprise on the death of that prince, but appointed guardians to his infant son, though the fairest occasion offered for annexing Sweden to his own dominions; a rare instance of moderation, which deserves to be recorded in honour of sovereignty. The young Swedish king, unmindful of his obligations, no sooner arrived at the age of maturity, than he declared war against his generous benefactor Harold, the event of which was the death of this great prince, admired even by his enemies for the elevation of his spirit, his valour, generosity, and above all for his justice. We find by the preparations made for the war, to what a prodigious height of power this monarch had raised the kingdom of Denmark. Saxo Grammaticus relates, that his fleet was so numerous as to extend like a bridge across the Sound, separating Zealand from Schonen; and that, besides common soldiers he mustered thirty thousand nobility in his army. His death occasioned the defeat of this otherwise invincible power, and obliged the Danes to patch up a peace at the price of Schonen, which was ceded to the victorious Ringo.

O L O or O L A U S III.

THE glorious Harold was succeeded by his sister's son, a prince of a very opposite character to his uncle (L). His name was Olo; and first he was appointed to the government 38th king.

(L) Pontanus speaks differently of this prince, though we know not upon what authority. According to him, Olo possessed the noblest qualities of mind and person, having this remarkable circumstance about him, that his eyes killed like those of the basilisk; meaning, perhaps, the sternness of his countenance, which struck terror into his enemies; a conjecture which we find supported by a fact. One of the Danish nobility having resolved to stab him, when he was undressing to enter the bath, the grim and fierce countenance of Olo made him drop the poignard just as he had raised it to give the fatal blow (1).

of Schonen by Ringo, who likewise obliged the Danes to submit to the authority of Herba, a woman of a masculine spirit. Upon their remonstrances, however, he recalled her, and compensated her with the sovereignty of that country now called Sleswick, where she built the city of that name. Olo he substituted in her place, whence it appears that Denmark was, in consequence of Ringo's victory, little more than a province of Sweden, though all the Danish writers omit Ringo's name in the list of their kings. Whether it was, that the Danes were uneasy under the administration of a prince imposed upon them by their inveterate enemies the Swedes, or whether their disaffection arose from his own cruelty, as some writers affirm, is a point disputed by historians: certain, however, it is, that he was taken off by a conspiracy, formed against him by many of the chief nobility of the kingdom, and his son Omund elected king: a presumption that Olo's misfortune arose from personal pique and mal-administration, more than from the resentment of his subjects against the Swedes <sup>f</sup>.

O M U N D.

Omund,
39th king.
A. D. 331.

OMUND, says Meursius, was elected, not out of regard to his father's memory, but from the expectation which so promising a youth afforded, of his resembling in virtue his great uncle Harold. When arrived at age, his nobility advised him to think of encreasing the royal family by marriage. This made him turn his thoughts to the daughter of Ringo, whom he had seen and admired when he visited the court of that monarch in his youth: but to the accomplishment of his wishes there was an obstacle which he determined to surmount. Ringo had publicly declared, that he never would receive for his son-in-law a prince who had not signalized his valour. To render himself worthy of this honour, Omund entered upon a war with the king of Norway, who had lately refused to pay the usual homage to the crown of Denmark, and a powerful fleet was equipped for the occasion. In his way he was joined by Oddo, a prince who had received some cause of disgust to the Swedish monarch. Ringo was at this time cruising with a fleet off the coast of Ireland, and Oddo persuaded his new ally, that now was the opportunity for recovering the liberty of Denmark, curbing the power of Sweden, and accomplishing his wishes with respect to Ringo's daughter. Persuaded with these arguments, Omund complied with Oddo's proposal of making a descent on Sweden, which was accordingly executed. Intelligence being sent to Ringo, he returned instantly for the protection of his dominions, and a furious engagement ensued, in which both parties claimed a victory. To render things more decisive, they recruited their forces by mutual agreement, and fought a second battle more bloody than the former, at the close of which Ringo was mortally wounded. Upon this he sent for Omund, and told him, that now he had given proofs sufficient of his valour to merit the daughter of a warrior, and therefore he should contentedly resign himself into the arms of death, as he had the happiness to see his family strengthened by the alliance of such a son-in-law; after which words he expired. Omund's next exploits were against Rusla, a warlike virgin, who usurped the sovereignty of some provinces of Norway, and endeavoured to extend her power over Denmark likewise. Her he defeated in a sea-fight, but not so decisively but she soon recruited her forces, and was again ready to enter upon action. Omund not caring to hazard a defeat from a woman, determined to use policy, and by dint of gold weaned from her the allegiance of the Norwegians, who deserted her, and afterwards delivered her into the hands of her brother, whom she had dethroned, in revenge for which he put her to death, and was mean enough to pay homage to Omund, in acknowledgment of his services. Having honourably concluded some other wars in which he was necessarily engaged, Omund preserved his dominions in profound peace for a number of years, and then died sincerely regretted and esteemed by his people, who immediately chose his eldest son to succeed him. He was, indeed, a prince equally skilled in the arts of war and of peace, who had obliterated by the prudence and success of his administration, all memory of his father's cruelty <sup>g</sup>.

Siward,
40th king.

SIWARD, on his accession to the throne, was complimented by an embassy from the king of Sweden, who demanded his sister in marriage. Imagining that this alliance might assist in uniting kingdoms always at variance, and prove advantageous to both, Siward complied, and the treaty was concluded. Halland was the place fixed upon for the celebration of the nuptials; but the Swedish monarch being beset by ruffians on the road thither, broke off the treaty and prepared for war, from a notion that the assassins had been hired by Siward to murder him. Both kings having raised forces, they met on the confines of <sup>g</sup> a the spot appointed for a more friendly intercourse, and a battle ensuing, the Swedish monarch was slain, and his army totally defeated (M). Defeats and kills in battle the king of Sweden.

THE war with Sweden in which Siward was engaged, furnished some tributary princes on the continent with an opportunity of revolting. They raised an army, obtained a victory, and reduced their sovereign to great straits. Such was their success, and the ill fortune of Siward, that he lost all his dominions except Zealand and a few inconsiderable islands. His spirit, however, was not broke; he raised fresh forces, and determined either to perish by their hands, or to reduce to obedience his rebellious subjects. Accordingly, he engaged the rebel army, commanded by one Simon, and just as victory began to declare for him, died of a wound he received by the hand of the rebel general, after he had given a mortal blow to his antagonist, both falling dead upon each other. Such was the end of this brave but unfortunate prince, who had become odious to many of his subjects, rather from a spirit of rebellion in them, than any fault in him. He left two sons; but they being carried off and kept prisoners by the rebels, his brother was elected king in his room <sup>a</sup>. He is slain in battle against the rebels.

B A T H U L.

BATHUL was raised to the throne less upon account of his own merit, which was but inconsiderable, than from a regard the people had for the blood royal, and respect for the memory of Siward. The state of Denmark was now truly deplorable; her dominions rent in pieces by rebellion, her power and credit sunk, and a king elected; the most unfit in the world to retrieve her affairs, by courage or conduct. There remained, of all the potent kingdom of Denmark, but Zealand, Funen, and those little islands, called by the Danes Smalands; Jutland, Norway, Schonen, Sleswick, Embsen, and other countries on the continent; as well as several islands were dismembered from the crown. In this situation it would probably have remained, had not Jarmeric, the son of Siward, fallen upon the means of recovering his liberty, returning into Zealand, and of asserting the dignity of his ancestors; which was sunk during the weak and timid reign of his uncle Bathul, who now willingly resigned the burthen of sovereignty, to which he found his own strength unequal. Bathul, 41st king.
The deplorable condition of Denmark.

J A R M E R I C.

d THE first endeavours of this heroic prince were to recover the revolted provinces, and reduce them to their former obedience. He begun with Sweden, that had led the way and encouraged his subjects in their rebellion, by which Gotbar the king got possession of Schonen, Jutland, and some other Danish provinces. He raised a great army, entered Sweden, defeated and killed Gotbar, and of consequence recovered all that the Swedes had taken from his father and uncle: thence he marched into Sleswick and Holstein, and soon reduced them: from Sleswick he marched into Pomerania, and thence to Silesia, laying all that country under contribution, and exacting an oath from the nobles, that they would pay homage and a yearly tribute to the crown of Denmark. In a word, he not only recovered in a short time all the countries his ancestors had ever possessed, but greatly enlarged the boundaries of the Danish sovereignty. All this prosperity was not unattended with a mixture of adversity and domestic misfortunes, which more than counterbalanced the power and grandeur of Jarmeric. He had discovered an intrigue that was carrying on between a beautiful young lady he had taken for his second wife, and Broder, a son he had by his former. Enraged at a crime so unnatural, he gave orders they should both be instantly put to death, a sentence which was executed accordingly upon the queen; but his son found means, thro' the favour of his keepers, to escape, and raise civil commotions, which ended only with the life of his father, whom he besieged, took, and put to death, in a strong castle which Jarmeric had built as a retreat in case of any unforeseen change of fortune. It is true, that both the queen and Broder were innocent of the crime laid to their charge, the whole being a contrivance of Bicco's, a nobleman of great power and ambition; who, out of resentment or envy to Jarmeric, wanted to distract his councils. Such was this man's art and address, that he fomented the quarrel between the father and the son to such a height, that notwithstanding filial duty on the one side, and paternal affection on the other, strongly urged them to a reconciliation, they were both made to believe that their security could only be effected by the death of the other. Thus ended the glorious reign of Jarmeric, a Jarmeric, 42d king.
His conquests retrieve the face of affairs.

(M) The event of this battle is variously related, Meursius in particular affirming, that Siward was defeated, and forced to retreat precipitately to Jutland, where he was a second time routed by the Sclawi; a people who had revolted from his authority, and pursued to the island of Funen; upon which he made peace with Sweden, by ceding Schonen to that crown (1).

Broder,
43d king.

BRODER succeeded to his father's throne by the unanimous voice of the people, who soon had reason to repent their choice. The indolence and weakness of his reign encouraged several of the provinces recovered by his father, again to revolt; and the Swedes in particular took possession of Schonen. This is all we know of him, history being silent concerning the manner of his death, and of most of the particulars of his life <sup>b</sup>.

He was succeeded by Siwald III. a prince who had arrived to a great age before he was raised to the throne. Siwald III.
and Snio.

A cruel famine prevails in Denmark, and occasions a barbarous proposal, which gave birth to the first migration of a colony from this country.

A. D. 383.

Now Denmark began to resume her wonted vigour, and immediately entered upon the recovery of Schonen, and the revolted provinces, which were soon obliged to submit, and surrender the ringleaders of the rebellion. Snio in the next place resolved to secure the crown in his family by marriage, and accordingly sent ambassadors to demand the daughter of the king of Swedish Gothland, who were all put to death by this savage prince, under pretence of their being spies. Irritated at this indignity, Snio raised a powerful army, entered Gothland, laying the country waste with fire and sword. Gotho, for that was the king of Gothland's name, perceiving that his forces were unable to resist the rapid progress of the Danes, challenged Snio to single combat, a proposal which he accepted, on condition that the kingdom of the vanquished should submit to the conqueror. Upon this Gotho declined the combat, sent his daughter into Sweden, and fought a battle, in which his army was defeated, and himself forced to submit to the terms imposed by the victorious Snio. The king of Sweden married his ward, and while he was enjoying all the pleasures of love, was suddenly despoiled of his wife and treasure, by a rapid descent made on his kingdom by Snio, who carried her off in triumph. This rape gave occasion to a long and bloody war, which was terminated by a greater misfortune. Both kings having levied all their subjects, hardly any persons were left to cultivate the lands; the consequence of which was a cruel famine, that carried off incredible numbers of the people. This gave birth to a law, prohibiting, on pain of death, that a single grain of corn should be converted into malt, or used in any other manner than bread, of which the rich were in equal want with the poor; but this edict not having the desired effect, it was proposed by Aggo and Ebbo, two noblemen of Jutland, or of some other of the Danish provinces, that all the old men and children should either be put to death, or compelled to seek for new habitations in foreign countries. Intelligence of this execrable scheme coming to the ears of Cambora, or as other writers call her Magga, the king's mother, a woman of an heroic spirit, she immediately entered the council-chamber, and in a very pathetic speech, represented the inhumanity of sacrificing their aged parents and innocent babes, who were unable to secure themselves possessions in foreign countries. It would better become, she observed, the piety and valour of the Danes to send forth their young men upon expeditions, which required strength, vigour, and health; and thus supply the wants of the infirm, weak, and aged, by leaving them their share of the public stock of provisions. This, she said, would answer the same purpose as barbarously sacrificing with their own hands, those beings who gave them life, and those innocent tender babes, whose support depended on their parental fondness. She proposed, that if the enterprize appeared so dangerous as to terrify any of the nobility from taking the command of this large colony, to lead it in person, and banish herself from her native soil, for the sake of her country, for the sake of humanity, and every principle the most dear and valuable to a true-born Dane. Snio immediately acceded to her proposal, and assembled the nobility and commons to settle the plan of migration. In this assembly it was agreed, that every ninth man in Denmark and the provinces, able to carry arms, should compose the colony: that it should be conducted by Aggo and Ebbo; and that the place of rendezvous should be that province lying between the Elbe and the Oder, and washed by a the Baltic, the antient name of which is not determined (A). By this means plenty was introduced in Denmark, and Snio lived in peace to a good old age, after having by prudence and conduct restored his kingdom to its antient splendor, and without a single blemish upon his reputation, except his carrying off by force the queen of Sweden, which may be looked upon as the cause of all the dreadful misfortunes which afterwards attended him by a cruel and ruinous war, and a still more destructive famine. We are not informed by any historian, whether Sitwald his father resigned the throne to Snio, or whether he died soon after he had taken him a partner in the throne. Character and death of Snio.

b BIORNO his son succeeded Snio; a prince of little merit according to Saxo Grammaticus Biorno. and Meursius, though Lyschander, Pontanus, and Suaningius affirm, that the male royal line was extinct in Snio. All writers indeed agree, that here is a chasm of two hundred and ninety-eight years in the Danish history, Biorno alone standing in the space between Snio and Gormon; that is, from the year 401 after the birth of Christ, to the year 699 of that æra; a period this the most busy but obscure in ancient history, during which all those very extraordinary migrations were made from the northern countries, which destroyed the Roman empire, and wholly changed the face of affairs in Europe. Pontanus and others, to fill up this chasm, relate the expedition of the Wandali, Longobards, Lombards, and other northern nations, giving at the same time a long list of Saxon and Swedish kings; but as Some difficulties concerning the chronology.
c these matters relate nothing to our history, we think it more satisfactory intirely to pass over this period, and resume our narrative with Gormon, who was elected to the throne in the year 699 or 700 after the birth of our Saviour (B) <sup>b</sup>.

G O R M O N I.

ACCORDING to Lyschander, Gormon was the fiftieth and second monarch who wielded the Danish scepter from Dan, and a prince the most extraordinary of his age, not for the usual qualities of a king, but his profound skill in magic, and deep penetration into the secrets of nature. We must refer the reader to the wonderful tales he will find related of his magic skill, by Saxo, who ascribes them all to a strict correspondence he maintained with the parent of deceit; they might pass for truth in the age of that entertaining writer, but they will scarce furnish amusement in these enlightened times, where even fiction itself requires the assistance of probability. We know only for certain of this prince, that he lived to an advanced age without engaging in any wars with his neighbours, and was succeeded by his son Gotrick, surnamed the Generous <sup>c</sup>. Gormon I. 52d king.

G O T R I C K.

SOME writers call this prince Guilach, and others Godfred; but we chuse to follow the authority of Grammaticus and Pontanus. In the first year of his government the Saxons Gotrick, 53d king.
e rebelled, and he raised a powerful army to suppress them, which he soon effected, by giving them a signal overthrow, and obliging them, upon the birth of a Danish prince, to send a present to the king of an hundred milk white horses, in token of their submission and vassalage to the crown of Denmark. Immediately after, he married the princess of Norway, sending at the same time an ambassador into Sweden, to appease certain tumults which broke out at the general diet of that kingdom: but the ambassador's authority was despised, and himself killed by a large stone thrown at him in the mob; an insult which Gotrick thought it his duty to punish <sup>d</sup>. In consequence he invaded Sweden, defeated the persons concerned in the murder of his ambassador with a heavy fine. Scarce had he returned from Sweden before Saxony was over-run by Charlemagne's army, while Vitichond lord He subdues Sweden.

(A) Various are the conjectures of historians and critics concerning the time of this migration, the place where the colony established itself, and the derivation of their name, all agreeing that they were called Lombards after their departure, and Winnuli, or Winili, before. The Danish writers to a man affirm, that the famine which occasioned the migration happened in Snio's reign; though Paulus Diaconus, and other writers, make it later. Prosper, a writer of credit, asserts, that they settled in the isle of Rugen and country adjacent, till the year 484, when they removed themselves into Pannonia, and other provinces of the Roman empire. As to their name, some derive it from their beards, Longo-Barb; others from their weapons called Bardens, or Longo-

Bardens; but the curious reader will find a satisfactory account of this people, whether Lombards or Longobards (for we make a distinction) in the nineteenth volume of our Antient History, p. 12. 497. & sequent. (1).

(B) To supply the chasm, Lyschander in his Genealogy of the Danish kings, and Suaningius in his Chronicon Danicum, give the following table of kings; viz. Rorick II. Swan I. Guilach II. Harold III. (according to them;) Ercball, Vermund II. Omund III. to whom succeeded Biorno his son, whom we have made the son and successor of Snio. Of these princes they give no account, nor have they even quoted their authority for inserting them.

of the country, unable to resist so potent a force, implored the assistance of Gotrick, whose sister he had married; and the Danish monarch readily promised him speedy succour, because he saw the necessity of checking the growing power of Charlemagne, who, like an impetuous torrent, threatened to swallow up all Europe in one universal monarchy. Charlemagne's retreat to oppose the Saracens prevented a battle at this time with the main army; but some posts which he maintained were forced, and his troops driven quite out of Saxony. When Charlemagne returned from Spain, Gotrick sent ambassadors to remonstrate to him, that Saxony was a fief of Denmark, which he thought himself bound to protect. He therefore requested him not to disturb the peace of that country, which would necessarily reduce the Danes to the necessity of opposing him with all their power, a measure that would not at all be agreeable to a people who entertained the highest respect for his majesty. As Char- lemagne gave no explicit answer to this remonstrance, Gotrick resolved to enforce it by arms, and accordingly sent a powerful reinforcement to Vitichond, which enabled him to drive the French out of the barrier towns, and garrison them with Danes and Saxons. Charlemagne, offended at this presumption, sent an army under Conrade to reduce all Saxony to his obedience; but this general was defeated, and his army dispersed. Enraged at the indignity, Charlemagne entered Saxony at the head of an army, and by forced marches had nearly surprised Vitichond, who fled precipitately and took shelter with Gotrick beyond the Elbe. His army being destitute of a commander, became an easy prey to the French monarch, who determining to strike terror in the inhabitants, ordered above four thousand Saxons to be executed, after which he retired with his army, leaving strong garrisons in all the towns<sup>a</sup>.

Gotrick re-

a second time.

GOTRICK no sooner had advice of this defeat, than he led his army into that deplorable country, expelled all the French garrisons, and reduced it to its former obedience. Upon his return to Denmark, he heard that Charlemagne proposed sending his son Pepin with a mighty army, to invade the Danish provinces upon the continent, and resolved to oppose him with an equal force. He levied a prodigious army, and equipped a fleet of above three hundred large ships, with which he proposed making a descent on the coast of France, and by this means to weaken Pepin's army. In a word, such was the valour, the conduct, and the mighty force of Gotrick, that Charlemagne's empire was never more endangered than from this formidable enemy, had not an unforeseen accident, and his usual good fortune, saved that powerful monarch. After Gotrick had over-run East Friesland, and some other provinces belonging to the enemy, leading his army straight to Aix-la-Chapelle, at that time the capital of Charlemagne's empire; he was stabbed in his tent by a centinel, bribed, as some writers imagine, by Pepin, to remove this dangerous rival to his father's glory. Other writers imagine, that this unworthy action was committed by his own son, in revenge for his having repudiated his mother, and taken another wife. Be this as it will, certain it is that the great Gotrick fell by the hands of an assassin, at a time when he was about to dispute the empire of Europe with the greatest monarch of the world, leaving behind him the reputation of a just, brave, merciful, and munificent prince, possessed of every quality which could gain the love of his own subjects, and the esteem and respect of all other nations. That he was the dread of his mighty competitor, appears from the excessive and indecent joy which Charlemagne expressed on the news of his death<sup>b</sup>. The exact time of this event is disputed; but Suaningius, and some of the best writers, place it in the year 801 after Christ.

Olaus IV.
55th king.

GOTRICK being killed, his eldest son Olaus, the fourth of that name, was elected king of Denmark. This prince is entirely omitted by many historians, and others place him after Hemming, though Saxo Grammaticus and Meursius expressly say, that he was the son and immediate successor of Gotrick. Olaus, while he was endeavouring to bring to justice the murderers of his father, had the misfortune to involve himself in a civil war, in which we have reason to believe he perished, though we do not find this circumstance mentioned by any writer besides Eric of Pomerania.

ACCORDING to the same author, he was succeeded by Hemming, his only child. The first act of this prince's administration was to conclude a treaty with Lewis the Pious, settling the limits of their respective dominions, which was effected to the satisfaction of both parties, without any encroachment on the boundaries of Denmark, now comprehending great part of the German continent. After reigning for two years with great applause, this ex-

DENMARK was divided between them, and a constant jealousy and perpetual wars ensued, by which this potent kingdom began to dwindle, and lose the respect it had so long commanded from the surrounding states. At last the condition of the Danes became deplorable. Siward's subjects deposed him, and raised his infant son Regner to the throne, which furnished his rival Ringo with a fair occasion of invading Zealand and Schonen, where he met with little resistance. Immediately on his arrival he threatened with the most cruel and ignominious death, all the inhabitants who refused to acknowledge him for their king. In this critical situation, the people desired he would permit them to deliberate upon his proposal, which being granted, they assembled to debate on the measures which they ought to pursue. On the one hand their affection, and the oath they had sworn to Regner, inclined many of the inhabitants to remain firm in their duty; on the other, the power and dreadful menaces of Ringo terrified them. Various measures were proposed, and all were attended with a thousand difficulties; in consequence of which the assembly was ready to break up without coming to any conclusion, when Regner, though then but twelve years of age, spoke in the following manner. "To what purpose is it, my faithful friends, to irritate a powerful enemy, by an obstinate attachment to an unhappy prince, whom you have not strength sufficient to defend? As deserting your king, and flying from your colours without urgent necessity, would be a crime of the most heinous nature, so, adhering to them at the hazard of your own lives, when you are sensible you cannot better the cause in which you are engaged, is downright folly, and a trespass against the first principles of nature. Deceit in some cases is allowable: can it ever be practised in a more just cause than the present, or with more probability of success? You must deceive the enemy you are unable to combat; you must counterfeit submission, until an occasion offers of resuming your principles, recalling your king, and throwing off the yoke of the oppressor. Adverse fortune is never so easily surmounted as by yielding to it." This sensible oration from a child determined them to follow his advice, as soon as they had conveyed him safe into Norway. They accordingly submitted to Ringo, and immediately gave notice of their intention to Siward, who without hesitation struck his tents and marched to give battle to his rival, equally desirous of coming to a decisive action. The armies met and engaged with unrelenting fury, until Ringo was killed and victory had declared in favour of his adversary, who had likewise received a mortal wound, of which he died the next day; and happy had it been for Denmark, had this event happened earlier, though each was deserving enough of the crown, had he enjoyed it without a competitor. It was their rivalry and ambition that reduced the kingdom to its melancholy situation, and the continuance of their wars would probably have made way for its total conquest by some foreign power d.

BOTH these princes being removed by death, Regner was recalled from Norway, and replaced on the throne (A). As soon as this prince had settled the domestic œconomy of his kingdom, which he found intirely ruined and confounded by the late civil discords, he marched into Norway against Froe, king of Sweden, who had invaded that kingdom, imagining that he could easily reduce it before the situation of the Danes would admit of their sending forces to its relief. Froe had, indeed, defeated Siward king of Norway, and made prisoners of his wife and daughters, before the arrival of Regner. He had exposed them, and all the virgins who had fallen into his hands, to the most cruel indignities and insults, which made them receive Regner as their deliverer. The indignation of this prince was so highly inflamed by their piteous relations, that he marched instantly against the barbarous conqueror, and gave him battle; but with a very dubious event, until Lathgartha, a virgin of an heroic disposition, who had been ravished by the brutal Froe, entered the ranks, and with incredible valour, drove the Swedes every where before her, till she opened a way to their king, whom she pierced through the body before he was prepared to guard against her furious attack e. The war being finished by this decisive action, Regner was so captivated with the bravery of the virago, that he sought her of her relations in marriage, and obtained her with little difficulty.

(A) Authors differ considerably in the orthography of this prince's name, some calling him Regner, others Regin-fred, and not a few Ragnifrid. We have adhered to the orthography of Grammaticus, Meursius, and Pontanus.

DURING the king's residence in Norway, the provinces of Schonen and Jutland revolted, and some commotions were excited in Zealand; his presence soon reduced affairs to their former situation, but not till he had given battle, and defeated the rebels, all of whom he generously pardoned, excepting a few of the ringleaders, who were reserved for an exemplary punishment. Another revolt soon however broke out, and was suppressed with the same expedition and vigour; to this succeeded a third, and to that a fourth, which obliged him to treat these obstinate delinquents with more severity, and to put it out of their power to disturb the course of government by their rebellious and restless disposition.

The fidelity

Lathgartha.

REGNER's marriage with the valorous Lathgartha was unfortunate; for she was supposed to aspire at the crown independent of her husband, against whose life she was unjustly thought to harbour designs; upon the discovery of which he repudiated her, and demanded in marriage the daughter of Haroth king of Sweden. Before he could obtain this lady, it was necessary he should fight the two greatest bullies in Denmark. This he performed with success, having killed them, and, in consequence, gained the prize, which had been contended for by all the surrounding young princes, inflamed either with love or ambition. By this lady he had seven sons, Rathbert, Dun, Vorth, Siward, Biorno, Agner, and Ivar. In the mean time the Cimbri threw off the Danish yoke, and chose a king, whom they called Harold Klang; upon which Regner raised an army in Denmark, and reinforced himself by a strong body of auxiliaries from Norway, which was afterwards strengthened by a fleet of one hundred and twenty ships of war, which Lathgartha had equipped for his service, and commanded in person. Regner was astonished at this instance of her affection; but she frankly told him, that no inconstancy on his side could wean her from her duty, or oblige her to revolt from the allegiance she owed, both as his subject and his wife. "If, says she, the charms of my person be faded in your eyes, it is requisite that I should endeavour to supply that loss by other qualities, more conducive to your glory and the good of these kingdoms." Such was the generous revenge which this noble lady took on the infidelity of her spouse. He marched with his army directly against the rebels, and begun an action, which continued with great warmth and spirit without appearance of advantage to either side, till Siward, the son of Regner, was killed, which occasioned great confusion in the wing of the Danish army he commanded. Regner hearing of his son's misfortune, flew like lightning along the lines, exhorting his men not to add to his calamity by their misconduct, and rallying them with amazing spirit and resolution, while Lathgartha led on the wing the king had left, and pushed the enemy with such irresistible valour, that they were broke and totally defeated.

A combat fought be-princes of Sweden.

HAVING settled the affairs of this country, rewarded, and refreshed his soldiers, he led them without delay into Saxony, which he resolved to punish for its frequent revolt to the emperor. Arriving here with a fleet of two hundred sail, he landed his men with such expedition, that the Saxons were subdued almost as soon as they had intelligence of his arrival. The emperor Lotharius, then encamped with a large army on the Elbe, gave battle to Regner, and was defeated; but the Danish monarch was prevented from pursuing his victory, by disturbances that were raised in Sweden after the death of their king Haroth, whose children the nobles had driven out of the kingdom, raising one of their own number to the throne. Regner sent his sons with an army to reinstate the royal family, which they soon effected by a signal defeat, given the usurper. Sorlus, so the usurper was called, finding himself unable to combat the forces of the king of Denmark, sent a herald to desire that the issue might be decided by selecting a certain number of combatants out of each army; a proposal that was accepted. Sorlus chose one Scardo, the most famous swordsman in Sweden, and his seven sons for his seconds; and on the side of the Danes, the three princes Biorno, Fridleff, and Rathbert, offered themselves. The combat began in sight of both armies, and Scardo being killed, Sorlus and his children, unable to stand against the fury of the Danish princes, were soon forced to follow his fate. This conquest being obtained, the Danish army attacked the Swedes, and obtained an easy and decisive victory.

It would appear, that Regner went in person to Sweden; for we are told, that here he carried on an intrigue with a person of fashion, by whom he had a son called Ubbo, who, born under an unhappy planet, says Meursius, afterwards contrived to dethrone the parent that begot him.

THE death of Thora, his beloved wife, so grievously afflicted Regner, that he found it necessary to divert his mind by engaging in some foreign war. Accordingly he published an edict, ordering all his subjects who were harrassed either with idle children or servants, to send them to him for employment. As soon as he had raised a sufficient force, he put the affairs of his kingdom in the best order, and committed them to the care of a council, composed of twelve of the most prudent and weighty men in Denmark. After which he a embarked his troops, and made so successful a descent on Britain, that in a short time he reduced the island, not even the Orkneys escaping his arms. In his return to Denmark, he appeased some commotions, set on foot in Norway by the pride and ambition of several of the nobility, who aspired at the crown. He was not long in Denmark before he married a third wife, by name Suanloge, and had by her three sons, Reynold, Widferc, and Erick.

THE next exploits of this conqueror were performed in the Hellepont, against Dio king of that country, anciently called Myfia, who refused to pay certain duties which had always been claimed by the ancestors of Regner. This war ended as successfully as the former; upon which he turned his arms against the Russians, who had lent considerable assistance to Dio, by which he was enabled to prolong the war. We are told by the Danish historians, b that this rude people confided more in the power of incantations, charms, and their skill in magic, than in arms; that they raised such storms of hail and snow, as reduced the Danes to the last extremity, and had almost conquered him by famine, who had always proved invincible in arms. Regner, after losing near half his army, was forced to retreat into Courland, where he was kindly welcomed and furnished with every necessary which the country afforded. Incensed at his late disgrace, he again entered Russia, with a resolution to bring the savage monarch to action. The king of Russia, for so he is called, foreseeing Regner's return, had procured a strong body of auxiliaries from the king of Finland, whose troops were exceeding expert in throwing the lance. Relying upon these succours, he ventured to attack the Danes, unable, on account of the mountains of ice and snow, to extend c their wings, or draw out in order of battle. Regner, for this reason, kept in his camp, and watched the opportunity of finding the enemy unguarded. Next night presented the happy occasion he wished for; upon which he led his army with the utmost expedition and silence in the middle of the night, and broke into their camp, while they were felicitating themselves with the notion of starving the Danes into submission. In this disorder he obtained an easy victory; and after taking sufficient revenge, withdrew his army out of this inhospitable country.

THE long absence of Regner furnished his bastard son Ubbo with an opportunity of displaying his ambition, and unnatural desire of deposing his own father, and seizing upon a crown to which he had no kind of right. In this wild project he was assisted by his grand- d father Esbern, a man of great power in Swedish Gotbland, where he raised a numerous army in support of Ubbo. But Esbern was defeated by Biorno, who was left præfect of Gotbland by his father; and Ubbo meeting with a check from Ivar, the other son of Regner, went into voluntary banishment. Soon after, by the assistance of his grandfather, he equipped a large fleet, with intention to surprize his father at sea in his return from Russia. He met with him accordingly, but was forced to yield to the superior valour and justice of the parent. In this action Esbern was slain among the first, and his head fixed on the prow of Regner's galley, which so terrified Ubbo, that he made all the sail he could towards Zealand, where, once more, making trial of his fortune, he was defeated, made prisoner, and slain by his keepers, for having attempted to make his escape.

e REGNER, who was born to shine as the first of heroes in the Danish annals, had no sooner suppressed this domestic foe, than he was attacked by a more formidable foreign enemy; and this was no other than Daxo, the son of Dio, king of the Hellepont, whom he had lately overcome in several battles. The peace which Dio had concluded, was by no means sincere, and patched up only with intention of seizing the first opportunity of revenge. He submitted from necessity to the terms of the conqueror, and permitted his dominions to be governed by Widferc, Regner's son, who was left in quality of lieutenant, Daxo retaining nothing more than the name and pageantry of majesty. Daxo embraced the opportunity of a fair that was held in the city, to perpetrate his base design of massacring Widferc. Accordingly he invited that prince to a feast, and had concealed a number of armed assassins; f but this scheme being frustrated by some business, which had prevented the lieutenant's attendance, he went early in the morning to his house, attended with the assassins, dressed like peasants, and finding admittance, was forcing his way to Widferc's chamber, when the prince, alarmed with the noise, leaped out of bed, and placed himself, sword in hand, in the entrance. Here he bravely defended himself till he received a wound, was overpowered with numbers, and taken prisoner. His valour had such an effect upon the treacherous Daxo, that he offered to share the kingdom with him, and to give him his sister in marriage, provided he would promise never to revenge this attack. But the generous Widferc preferring death to owing an obligation to his perfidious foe, resolutely replied, "That g " he desired no greater favour of his hands, than his imbruing them in blood that would not fail of drawing upon the insidious Daxo the vengeance of Regner." Incensed at this haughty repulse, the cruel Daxo ordered him, with all his attendants, to be bound and thrown into a large fire lighted for the occasion, there feasting his eyes with the unhappy catastrophe of the valorous and noble-spirited Widferc. coming to the ears of Regner, it gave such a shock to his constitution, as had near unsettled his understanding. He ran about the palace like a maniac, tore his hair, rent his cloaths, and committed all the other actions of phrenzy and despair. This paroxysm of madness was succeeded by a fit of despondency and sullenness, which it was feared would intirely destroy his reason; but the good sense of the queen Suanloge got the better of his grief, and roused him to a sense of his own condition, the situation of the kingdom, and the folly of lamenting, like a woman, what ought to be avenged with all the fury of an injured king and father. Convinced, with the many forcible arguments this lady advanced, he levied an army, marched into Daxo's country, defeated his army, took him prisoner, and, like a truly generous prince, again set him at liberty: "Enjoy that life, said he,
" which would only be an unworthy atonement to the manes of my brave son; and let " thy own conscience be thy punisher." However, to add to his mortification, he ordered that he should pay an annual tribute, and come in person, once a year, attended by twelve noblemen, all barefooted, in token of his subjection. After this, leaving his son Eric his lieutenant over the conquered countries, he returned to Norway, where some new commotions began to disturb the public tranquility. These he soon suppressed, and settling the affairs of that kingdom, left his son Biorno to preside over them.

BEFORE his return to Denmark, his queen Suanloge died, a circumstance which threw him into a fit of deep melancholy, that could only be subdued by the din of arms; and now the occasion offered: for England and Scotland both refused to pay the usual homage. This obliged Regner to raise a prodigious armament by sea and land, which he transported into Scotland, and there fought a dreadful battle, which lasted three days, and ended in the defeat of the Scots, and death of their king. The victory, however, was not cheaply bought; for Regner lost his sons Dan and Rathbert, with a prodigious number of officers and soldiers in the engagement. Passing from hence into England, he fought there with equal success, and subjected the whole kingdom to his obedience, after defeating Hella, the son of Haum, who was assisted by a powerful reinforcement from France. Nor did Ireland escape the terror of his name, and the weight of his arm; for transporting his army to that kingdom, he slew Molbric, the Irish general, in battle, routed his army, and made himself master of Dublin, the capital, which he gave to be plundered by his soldiers. Before he returned to Denmark, his subjects there had broke out into open rebellion, and recalled Harold, who had before been set up as king in Jutland. This prince reflecting upon the power and valour of Regner, resolved to make use of every precaution to withstand him, and secure the possession of his new-acquired authority. Accordingly he sought the alliance of the emperor, which he obtained conditionally, that he would embrace the Christian religion, and propagate it with all his power through his dominions. Harold, the better to secure the emperor's friendship; without any religion, immediately became a convert to Christianity; without faith, abjured infidelity, destroyed all the pagan idols, and erected a church in Sleswick, where the doctrine of Jesus was publicly preached. Regner arriving in Denmark, as these new schemes of religion and politics were carrying on, attacked Harold without delay, overthrew him, and forced him a second time to seek shelter in Germany. Then he destroyed the Christian temple erected in Sleswick, and restored the worship of the pagan gods; a circumstance which derogates by no means from his reputation, as he had yet received no conviction of the truth of the gospel, and had he embraced it, must have proved a convert from political motives: a reflection, which we thought necessary, in answer to the ridiculous defamation of Christian writers. This last act, say they, was evidently punished by the Almighty; for Hella, king of England, revolting a second time, had seduced Ireland to second his views of independency. This once more drew the aged Regner into the field, where his usual good fortune, but not his valour, deserting him, he was defeated and made prisoner. His cruel enemies, without regarding the character of the hero, threw him bound, into a dungeon filled with snakes, vipers, and poisonous animals, thus ingloriously putting an end to a life grown old in glory and victory. A proverbial saying of this great king's in prison, determined Hella to set him at liberty; but too late, he had breathed his last before the order came to the jailor (A). Other writers have given a different account of the death of the great Regner; but we are of opinion, that the authority of Danish writers ought, in facts respecting their own country, to weigh against the testimony of foreigners: we have therefore related it as we find it asserted by Grammaticus, Pontanus, and Meursius, who correspond directly in all the circumstances of his reign. His whole life was an uninterrupted course of glorious victories, wise measures, and noble generous actions. His repudiating his wife Lathgartha, a woman of so sublime and elevated a soul, may be imputed to him as a weakness, if we suppose it proceeded from the inconstancy of

(A) Sunningius says, that Regner was defeated by Hella, in Ireland, expressly affirming, contrary to the testimony of all other writers, that the conqueror of the brave Danish monarch was king of that country. P. 63.

a his nature. But this does not appear; on the contrary, Meursius and Grammaticus affirm, that this lady's chastity was publicly taxed; and it was unworthy of Regner to cohabit with a wife who had even been suspected of incontinence. Thus we see the errors of those writers, who place the conversion of the Danish kings in the reign of this monarch<sup>a</sup>. It is true Harold was a Christian, if we may give that appellation to a man who professed this religion only to serve temporary views; but he never was king of Denmark, he was only an usurper, who, by means of a faction, was raised four months to the throne, during the absence of the lawful prince, by whom he was driven into his primitive obscurity<sup>b</sup>.

b It is now difficult to fix with certainty the successor of Regner, and continue the series of Danish kings. The disputes and differences on this head, among writers, are numberless; and it would be a vain endeavour to reconcile them: we shall therefore adhere to those who have kept the nearest to a natural chronology, though all, indeed, have greatly failed in this particular (A).

I V A R.

According to the best authorities, Ivar was raised to the throne of his deceased father, and began his reign with revenging the unworthy death of that famous warrior. He was proclaimed immediately after Regner's death which happened, according to Meursius, in the year of Christ 836; and if we credit Pontanus and Sueningius, five years after. He raised an army, equipped a fleet, and, without hesitation, invaded England; but finding Hella too strong for him, he sent to his brothers for succours. Their arrival with a powerful reinforcement, soon turned the scale in favour of Ivar, who defeated Hella, and took ample vengeance on him for the cruel death of his father. Some writers affirm, that he took him prisoner, and ordered him to be hanged on a gibbet before the camp; but Grammaticus, with more probability relates, that Hella fell in battle (B).

c THE better to secure the country, and gain the affections of the people, he remained two years in England; during which time the Danes revolting, raised his brothers Siward and Eric to the throne. This news alarmed Ivar, and obliged him to have recourse to the assistance of the English, of whom he embarked a large body, and sailed with them directly to Holstein. At length he met with the Danish army, engaged and defeated it near Sleswick, after a very bloody and obstinate contest, in which the rebels lost twelve thousand men. He now resolved to keep the Danes in awe by his presence, and therefore sent his brother Agner to govern in England. Here Agner resided but a short time before the English, uneasy under a foreign yoke, raised an army, and were on the point of reducing him to extremity, when Siward, his brother, arrived with a body of forces to his relief; by which he was enabled to reduce them to their former obedience; and to prevent another insurrection, he cruelly massacred the pious king Edmund, with all the nobility of the court<sup>c</sup>.

d WHILE these horrid transactions were carrying on in England, a rebellion was raised in Sweden by means of one Osten, a man of a turbulent aspiring disposition. Thither Agner flew with an army of English, and engaging the enemy with too great impetuosity, was slain in the heat of the engagement; but we are not told which of the parties obtained the victory. Ivar outlived his brother but a short time; for he was carried off by a fever in the fifth year of his reign; but not until he had acquired and merited the reputation of a great and warlike prince.

S I W A R D S N A K E - E Y E.

f To Ivar succeeded Siward, surnamed Snake eye, his brother. In his youth this prince had distinguished himself by many extraordinary feats of valour in the field; but now having acquired the crown, he turned his inclinations to the arts of peace, endeavoured to restore industry, and promote the public tranquillity, that had so long been disturbed by a series of foreign and domestic wars. God, says Meursius, seconded his pious intention, and enabled him to complete a reign as pregnant with real felicity and true glory, as any which the annals of Denmark can produce. He died and left an infant son, chosen by the states to succeed him in the throne<sup>d</sup>.

(A) Sueningius and Pontanus intirely omit Ivar in their list of kings, though it is certain that Regner had a son of that name, of whom we have made frequent mention; and as these writers have chiefly made use of the authority of Saxo Grammaticus, we are at a loss to conjecture upon what testimony they excluded this prince. As they have given no reason for these proceedings, we think ourselves excusable in adhering to the authority of that elegant historian.

E R I C.

Eric 59th
king.

THE name of this young prince was Eric, surnamed Bern, or, as the Scotch to this day pronounce it, Bearn or Cbild. In his minority he was deposed by Eric, brother to the Harold we have so frequently mentioned in the reign of Regner, who took the reins of government into his own hands, assumed the supreme authority, and by means of a faction, obtained the title of king: a revolution that happened, according to Meursius, in the year 847, though, more probably, just ten years later.

Eric the Usurper,
60th king.
A. D. 857.

MINDFUL that his brother was deposed soon after he embraced the Christian religion, he took the strongest aversion to the doctrine of Jesus, put all the ministers of the gospel in Denmark to death, and every where restored the pagan religion; from which we may infer, that Christianity had now begun to take root in this kingdom. As Saxony and England had now begun to shew their uneasiness under the Danish yoke, and to raise armies for the recovery of their liberty, Eric struck up a league and strict alliance with the kings of Sweden and Norway, obtained large supplies of land and sea forces from them, raised himself a powerful army, and with an hundred thousand fighting men, and a proportionable fleet, entered upon the reduction of England and Saxony, dividing his forces, that he might attack both together, and prevent their mutually assisting each other. Spreading terror wherever he went, the fame of his power was sufficient to reduce the revolvers to obedience, and submit to the terms he thought fit to impose, before he had set foot in either country.

A. D. 858.

The usurper embraces and propagates Christianity.

IT was after his return from this expedition that we may date the æra of Christianity in Denmark; for Eric was again brought back to embrace the truth of the gospel, in which both he and his brother Harold had been educated. Ansgarius bishop of Bremen, was the happy instrument of this conversion; in consequence of which Eric abolished the idols he had but lately restored, and published an edict of toleration, permitting all his subjects to follow the doctrine of Christ with impunity. Such was the force of truth, or such, perhaps, the inconstancy of human nature, always eager after novelty, that Christianity spread with amazing rapidity, and was greatly aided in its progress by the zeal and piety of the king, who, notwithstanding his devotion, never once thought of restoring the crown to the right owner: but the invisible hand of Providence brought about justice in a way which the usurper little expected, amidst the tranquillity in which he had hitherto possessed the throne. Guthorm, his brother's son, became his rival, and connected his own cause with that of young Eric, the son of Siward, and the lawful king of Denmark. Violent were the dissensions raised among all degrees of men by this opposition. Such of the nobility as had taken part with Harold against Regner, or held places under the usurper, remained his fast friends; the rest of the nation in general, those who remembered the glorious Regner, and retained any sense of justice, gratitude, and compassion, took the side of Guthorm, and declared in favour of the young prince. A bloody battle was fought, in which almost all the nobility of Denmark were slain, and the numerous progeny of Regner entirely extinguished, except the son of Siward, the last hope of this illustrious family. The usurper too was slain, and by this means made way for the young Eric once more to mount the throne of his ancestors. At first he strenuously opposed the growth of the Christian faith: nay, took the most vigorous measures to suppress and root it out of his dominions. He put several of the most devout and zealous Christians to death, who had refused to abjure their religion; others he forced or bribed into compliance with his will. He levelled all the churches even with the ground, and sent an army to ravage Saxony, chiefly because the people of that country had received the light of the gospel. Not long after, however, he not only withdrew his resentment, which had grievously oppressed the Christians, but published an intire liberty of conscience, and embraced himself the true faith, by means of the eloquent and prudent Ansgarius, to whom this as well as the former conversion is wholly to be ascribed. He erected, at his own expence, a magnificent church at Ripen, ordered the Pagan temples to be razed, and now became as bigotted a Christian, as a little before he had been a Heathen; thus acting in extremes, and probably in neither from conviction, but from superstition and prejudice. At the persuasion of Ansgarius, he appointed persons properly qualified to teach the gospel in every corner of the kingdom, allowed them handsome salaries, and took Ansgarius for his director, not only in spirituals but in temporals likewise; an office for which the good bishop was but indifferently qualified. Having thus afforded a remarkable instance of the weakness of the human understanding, which at different

ERIC left an only son called Canute, and afterwards surnamed the Little, or, according to some writers, the Hairy. As his infancy persuaded the states that a long minority might prove dangerous to the kingdom, they resolved to elect one of their own body, who should govern with the title and authority of a king during his life, the crown then to revert to Canute or his children. Accordingly Ennigunp, a nobleman of great wisdom and valour, b was chosen by public consent; but he was scarce seated on the throne, before Olaus king of Sweden entered the kingdom, seized upon the crown, maintained it till his death, and then transmitted it to his son Siward, who was slain some years afterwards by an insurrection of the Danes, in favour of Canute, now arrived at years of maturity.

Canute the Little, 61st king.

In the very beginning of Canute's reign, a large colony of Danes went forth to look for new habitations (though for what reason we are not told) and settled themselves in Prussia, the eastern parts of Courland, and in Carelia. Now it was that Norway entirely shook off the yoke of Denmark, under the auspices of Harold, surnamed Yellow-hair (A), which is the only circumstance of any note we find mentioned under this reign. This prince differed greatly from his father with respect to his religious disposition; for c Eric was either a zealous Pagan or bigotted Christian; whereas Canute was perfectly indifferent to both, and regarded the priests of all religions little better than pious impostors, whom it was necessary to protect on account of the veneration in which they were held by the people; a way of thinking that brought great scandal upon his memory<sup>e</sup>.

A second migration of the inhabitants of Denmark.

F R O T H O VI.

FROTHO VI. the son of Canute, succeeded him; but the year of his succession to the throne is disputed. He was the greatest warrior that wielded the Danish scepter since Regner. He reduced England, which had rebelled during the indolent reign of his predecessor, and first planted the Christian religion there, if we may credit the Danish historians. The d better to propagate the faith in Denmark, he was preparing an embassy to pope Sergius III. to acknowledge his supremacy in spirituals, and to request that he would send some persons perfectly qualified to teach the gospel in Denmark, when death put an end to all his projects, and deprived his people of an excellent prince. He was married to Emma, daughter to the king of England, by whom he had a son named Gormo, who succeeded to his crown<sup>h</sup>.

GORMO was surnamed Angle, or the Englishman, because he was born in England; where he likewise received the first rudiments of his education. Upon advice of his father's death, he immediately embarked for Denmark, and there received the crown, e by the unanimous consent of the people. In his absence, the English again took the opportunity of recovering their liberty; nor did he make any attempts to deprive them of it, whether from indolence, or from a rectitude of opinion, a strict regard to justice, and affection for the country of his birth and education, is uncertain. Grammaticus indeed says, that his nature was mild, modest, and moderate; that he was contented with the government of one kingdom, and thought it impossible for a prince to do that justice to the subjects of two different and distant kingdoms, which his duty required; an opinion that reflects great honour on his memory. After a peaceful reign of four years he died, and left the crown to Harold V.<sup>i</sup>.

THE peaceable reputation which Gormo acquired, and the tranquillity which his subjects enjoyed, was not lost or disturbed by Harold, who was a prince of much the same disposition. He acted upon his father's principles, preferred ease and tranquillity to every other advantage, preserved the kingdom in just the situation he found it, and handed down the crown without additional lustre or stain to his son<sup>k</sup>.

to the king of England. He was a bitter enemy to the Christians, whom he persecuted in every quarter, demolishing their churches, and banishing their clergy. Among other sacred buildings, he totally destroyed and razed the famous cathedral in Sleswick, and ordered the Pagan idols to be erected wherever they had formerly stood.

The exploits of Gormo's sons.

GORMO's sons were both men of great ability in war, twins by birth, and rivals in glory. Their first exploits were directed against the Vandals, whom they subdued: next, they carried their arms against the English, who had for some time enjoyed their liberty, and conquered them; but without dethroning their uncle, who at that time wielded the sceptre of this country: however, they obliged him to sign an instrument, whereby he conveyed the crown to them at his decease. From England they passed into Ireland, and laid siege to Dublin, where Canute received the wound of which he died a few days after; upon which Harold pushed the siege, took the city, settled the affairs of the country, and returned into Denmark.

WHILE his sons were gathering laurels abroad, Gormo took arms against the Saxons, with a view to oblige them to renounce the Christian religion. Having reinforced his army, by a large body of auxiliary Vandals, he destroyed the country before him with fire and sword, sparing neither sex nor age that did not abjure the faith. The emperor Henry the Fowler soon came to the relief of the Saxons, defeated Gormo, and drove him out of Saxony. Pursuing his victory, he entered Holstein, passed into Sleswick, took the city of that name, then a town flourishing in trade, and gave it to his soldiers to be plundered. At a small distance from thence he built another town, transmitting thereby to posterity, that here he fixed the boundaries of his empire. He then granted peace to Gormo, on condition that he would cease to persecute his Christian subjects, and permit liberty of conscience to all. Gormo was not acquainted with his son Canute's death for some time after his return from Saxony. When it came to his knowledge, it affected him so strongly, that he sickened with grief, and died<sup>1</sup>.

Harold VI.
surnamed
Blaatand,
66th king.

HAROLD his son was immediately elected king; but he refused to accept the crown, until he had first performed his father's last obsequies with all the magnificence becoming his high rank and quality. He was no sooner crowned than he had to dispute the throne of England with Haquin, king of Norway. His claim to this was indeed indisputable, both on account of his affinity, and by the will of Ethelred, who had bequeathed him his dominions, in exclusion of his own son; though, from motives of equity, Harold avoided disputing the crown with this last prince, and permitted him to wear it unmolested to his death. As Adelstan died without issue, he now thought he might fairly assert his claim, and accordingly made preparations for that purpose. Haquin in the mean time invaded England; besides which, Harold had other reasons for engaging in a war with him. But this alone was sufficient; a conduct that was owing to respect for his uncle and cousin, late kings of England, might not now be construed into indolence or cowardice, he therefore passed with a fleet into England; and sent another to support the claim of Harold, a prince of the Norwegian blood, who had craved his assistance. The king of Norway, hearing his dominions were invaded by a pretender to the throne, returned thither before Harold of Denmark's arrival in England. On the coast of Norway he engaged the Danish fleet commanded by Hovind and Caroslo: but finding himself inferior in ships, he landed his men, and drew the enemy into a land-engagement, in which he defeated them; but did not live to enjoy his victory; for he was killed in the pursuit: by which means Harold, the pretender to this crown, succeeded him, and paid the promised tribute and homage to Harold of Denmark, in return for the generous aid he had lent him. Thus Norway, once more, became a province to Denmark<sup>m</sup>.

He succeeds to the crown of England.

AFTER Harold had settled the affairs of England, he sailed against the Vandals, who committed horrid depredations on the coasts of the Baltic: nor had scarce rid his hands of this war, when his aid and protection were solicited by Stubiern king of Sweden, who was driven out of his own dominions by Eric. To enforce his request, Stubiern had brought along with him Gyntba his sister, a lady of admirable beauty and accomplishments. The stratagem had the proposed effect: Harold became enamoured of her, married her, and promised the brother all the assistance in his power to reinstate him. Raising an army, he led it into Holstein; and marching from thence into Sleswick, he took by storm the new-built city of Henry the emperor, put the commanding officer to death, and made prisoners of the garrison, leaving a sufficient number of his own men in their stead. He restored to this city the ancient name of Sleswick, and annexed it again to the dominions

- a of Denmark. While he resided here, the Vandals resumed their piracies; and Harold again attacked them with such vigour, that he reduced and plundered all their strong holds, and, among the rest, the rich and important city of Wollin, built in an island of the same name, which is formed by two branches of the river Oder. This city he presented to Stubiern, who became extremely dear to him, on account of the brave exploits he had seen him perform in the course of this war. He now therefore resolved to turn his arms against Eric, and to reinstate his brother-in-law, before he undertook any other affairs. Recruiting his army with the utmost expedition, he led his forces through Halland against Eric. In the mean time advice was received, that Otho I. had entered Jutland with a powerful army, and penetrated to the very heart of the country, to revenge the indignity offered the empire by the attack on Sleswick. Otho, indeed, gave other reasons for his conduct. He pretended to be the protector of Christianity, which Harold persecuted; to be the ally of the Vandals, whom Harold conquered; and the lawful possessor of Sleswick, which the Dane took and plundered. The emperor found Jutland an easy prey, all the inhabitants fit to bear arms being enlisted by Harold to serve in the Swedish war. Some assert, that he proceeded to Dantzick, and thence travelling along the coast, flung a spear into the sea, marking that strait as the boundary of his empire. Crantzius affirms, that he passed into the island of Funen, and there built a city called after his own name: but this we find denied by all the Danish writers; for the city which resembles his name was built, say they, by Othin, many years before the birth of Otho. What the event of this war was, we know not. Some German writers assert, that Harold, collecting all his force, pitched his camp on the narrow neck of land at Sleswick, to intercept Otho, which he did, and was defeated. On the contrary, Grammaticus writes, that Otho, hearing of Harold's march against him, retreated with the utmost precipitation, leaving behind many necessaries of his camp, which became so many trophies to the Danish monarch<sup>a</sup>. All agree, that the princes having adjusted the preliminaries of a personal conference, met; and Harold, overcome by the arguments of Otho, and the clergy about him, embraced the Christian religion, solemnly and publicly abjuring Paganism. On this occasion he received baptism, Otho, the emperor, being sponsor; and the same ceremony was performed on his queen, and all his children. During this congress Stubiern was defeated by Eric, who, in consequence of his victory, seized upon Halland and Bleking, two provinces of Schonen, belonging to Harold. This occasioned the latter to provide against all future irruptions, by erecting that strong wall across the isthmus of Sleswick, which he called Danemarck, or the work of the Danes. Some writers ascribe this wall to the emperor Otho, though for what reason, we are at a loss to conjecture: the very name sufficiently indicates the authors.

- AMIDST these transactions, Harold king of Norway died, and his son Haquin succeeding, refused the homage and tribute which his father constantly paid to Denmark. This he believed was a seasonable opportunity for claiming his independency, when Harold was engaged in quarrels with two such powerful monarchs, as the emperor Otho, and Eric king of Sweden. It fell out however, otherwise than he imagined; for Harold immediately demanded the usual homage, and levied an army to enforce his demand. Haquin refusing to comply, he sent a fleet and army thither, under the conduct of some of his generals, while himself marched against Eric, whom he defeated; and obliged him to sue for peace upon such conditions as were proposed by the conqueror. In the mean while his army was defeated in Norway by Haquin, and this was only the prelude to his future misfortunes; for his own son Swen, spurred on by ambition, and the intreaties of the Sambi and Cimbri, two powerful provinces, who were ready to revolt, aspired at his father's crown (A). Swen was accordingly crowned king at Weiburg, and a great force raised to support his claim; and indeed, such was his influence, that the seeds of disaffection began to spring up in every part of Denmark. Harold, however, determined not to be wanting in his duty, raised an army, and gave battle to his son, but was defeated on account of the treachery of his officers, many of whom went over with whole troops to worship the rising sun. He next equipped a

This servile occupation those proud and warlike people could not support without indignation, and this it was that alienated their minds from Harold. Harold seeing a stone of prodigious weight raised by the workmen, asked his jester, whether he had ever seen so prodigious a weight raised by human strength? fleet; nor was his fortune more favourable, for he was a second time defeated, and obliged to take shelter in Zealand, where he found means to refit his ships, with which he determined once more to hazard an engagement. The event was no less unsuccessful than the former: upon which he fled into Normandy, and obtained large supplies of men and ships from the duke. With this reinforcement he returned to Zealand, and once more gave battle to his son. Both were sensible that they now fought for the last stake, and the battle continued for two days with the utmost obstinacy. Great numbers were killed and wounded on both sides; but neither could resolve upon yielding the victory, and of consequence the crown. A treaty therefore was set on foot by some of the more moderate and prudent men in either army; to which the father and son assenting, a truce was settled, and next day appointed for a congress to adjust the particulars of the ensuing treaty. In the mean time Harold was killed by the hands of a common soldier, while he was walking in a grove near his camp, to relax his mind after the fatigue of the day, by which the crown descended to Swen, without dispute or litigation. Thus died Harold, a prince of very shining qualities, and equally versed in the arts of war and peace. His piety was no less remarkable than his other virtues. Under him the Christian religion had made great progress, and three bishoprics were endowed in his dominions<sup>a</sup>. He built many churches, founded monasteries, convents, and other religious houses: but what renders his memory respectable is, that he governed with equity, was a just king, a kind master, a tender husband, and an affectionate father, though he met with ungrateful returns from his son and subjects. His body was buried with great funeral pomp, his son paying those honours to his memory, which his ambition prevented his performing while he lived; and now only it was, that his subjects became sensible of his merit, and their own folly, when it was too late to remedy their fault.

Sven, surnamed Split-beard.

Sven, tho' educated a Christian, persecutes Christianity.

He is taken prisoner by the Vandals.

He is defeated and banished by Eric king of Sweden.

AS Sven was the first Danish monarch who had been bred from his youth, and publickly baptized in his infancy according to the Christian faith, we may date the perfect establishment of the gospel in Denmark in his reign. He was called Sven-Otho, in compliment to his godfather the emperor, and surnamed Split-beard, from some peculiarity observed about his beard. He was scarcely established in the throne, when it was perceivable that the minds of the nobility began to relapse into the idolatry of Paganism, and recur to their old superstition. Sven, willing to shew his gratitude to those men who had forfeited their fidelity, and hazarded their lives to procure him a crown, ordered the heathen idols again to be erected in compliment to them. He even went further, and persecuted the clergy, tho' he never publickly abjured the doctrine of Christ, or sequestered those lands which his father had annexed to the church. Next he took up arms against the inhabitants of Wollin on the Oder, for having assisted his father in the late rebellion; but here he was thrice defeated by those brave and loyal islanders, and in the last engagement taken prisoner, and set at liberty on paying a ransom of twice his own weight, when full armed, in pure gold. This ransom was settled at three payments; but the king's person was confined till the last payment was made, which was raised by the generosity of the Danish ladies, who sold their jewels for this purpose, the treasury being quite exhausted, and the country oppressed by heavy taxes for the payment of the two former divisions of the ransom. Upon his return he made some laws favourable to the women; and among others ordained, that they should inherit a third of the estates real and personal. Moreover, he redeemed with all possible expedition, all the jewels they had sold for his liberty, and returned them to the proper owners.

His misfortunes did not, however, reclaim him, says Grammaticus; he still pursued his idolatrous courses, and persecuted the faith, which drew down upon him the vengeance of the Almighty with more weight. Eric of Sweden, contracting an alliance with the king of Poland and the emperor Otho, and besides, holding Sven in the utmost contempt, after the frequent defeats he had received from a handful of Vandal islanders, raised a great army and invaded Schonen. Sven marched against him; but was defeated in the first engagement, and driven out of his kingdom. Thence he wandered an exile into Norway, went to the court of Olaus, who had succeeded his brother Haquin, reminded him of the obligations his father Harold owed to the king of Denmark for placing him on his throne; but

- <sup>a</sup> was answered, that no ingratitude could equal his, who had robbed his father of his crown and his life. Finding no hopes of success by further applications to this monarch, he went to England, and there met with a reception equally cold and mortifying. Not thinking himself secure here, he retreated into Scotland, and was kindly received by the king, and maintained handsomely at the public expence, for the space of fourteen years <sup>b</sup>. Eric now dying, and misfortune opening the eyes, and softening the heart of Swen, he began to perceive the folly he had committed in persecuting the faith in which he had been instructed. He attributed his past calamities to the hand of God, who had thus justly punished his impiety, and returned with redoubled fervour and zeal to the profession of Christianity. His restoration soon followed, through the mediation of the king of Scotland, <sup>b</sup> who exerted himself warmly in behalf of the unfortunate prince. On his return he recalled all the clergy he had banished, set at liberty, and compensated in the best manner he was able, the sufferings of those he had confined; and lastly convoked a diet of the states, to whom he related the circumstances of his banishment, by which he became the sport of his enemies, and the object of compassion of his friends. He had lost his crown and reputation, dearer than life itself, by the hands of a man who had been defeated, and driven out of Schonen, by his mother; whence it was visible that the hand of God had interposed, and made use of Eric as the instrument of his vengeance, in order to render his punishment and defeat the more disgraceful. As he could not now avoid acknowledging the justice and wisdom of that invisible Power whom they had impiously abjured, he requested his people, as <sup>c</sup> they valued their present and future happiness, to be warned by his example, to receive the light of the gospel, and leave that false and profane religion, which God might permit for a time, but would not fail to punish and destroy in the end. His proposal did not meet with the reception he expected, and he therefore resolved upon other means of accomplishing his wish, and re-establishing Christianity. This was soon effected by the arrival of Poppo, a German divine of great piety and eloquence, who, by dint of example and persuasion, brought about what the king's authority could not. Several miracles are related of this prelate; and indeed he was possessed of the happy talent of impressing the people with whatever notions he thought fit to inspire, in which perhaps consisted his supernatural powers. All the clergy were recalled, lands and houses appropriated to their maintenance and residence, and a see given to Poppo, appointed to preside over the rest of the Danish clergy; but at the same time a suffragan of Adelage, bishop of Bremen <sup>c</sup>.

Received by the king of Scotland, and restored to the throne.

A. D. 994.

The Christian religion restored in Denmark.

- WHILE Sweden was thus employed in promoting piety and the Christian religion, Olaus king of Norway was taking measures for disturbing the public tranquillity. Apprehensive that Swen, after settling the internal œconomy of his kingdom, might resume his claim to a supremacy, over Norway, he determined to anticipate his measures by levying a powerful army, and entering into strict league with Sweden. Swen, receiving advice of these intrigues, found means to countermine the machinations of Olaus; by marrying the queen-mother of Sweden, by which he secured the friendship of king Eric; insomuch that they executed a treaty for the defence and propagation of Christianity, and the mutual security of their <sup>e</sup> kingdoms. Olaus was now enraged with disappointment, and, determined at all events upon revenge, he declared war. The fleets of Denmark and Norway met: they fought with inveteracy, and the latter was totally defeated and dispersed. Olaus escaped out of the battle with a few ships; but was so closely pursued, that, to avoid the disgrace of being taken, and in the power of his enemy, he leaped into the sea, and was drowned. In consequence of this victory, Norway was again annexed to the crown of Denmark, and Swen immediately published an edict there in favour of the Christian religion <sup>d</sup>. Having settled the affairs of Norway, he prepared to invade England, which had for some years thrown off its subjection to the crown of Denmark (A). Ethelred II. held at this time the supreme authority in that kingdom, the particular condition of which <sup>f</sup> shall be related in its proper place. Here the Danish and English historians differ considerably in many important circumstances, and we shall have occasion to mention their several relations in our History of England, the proper place for such a disquisition. Sufficient it is for our present occasion, that a peace between Ethelred and Swen was concluded, after the latter had over-run great part of the kingdom, and obliged the former to acknowledge his (B) sovereignty <sup>e</sup>. (A) We must observe, that although Danish writers assert in general terms, that England was subjected to the kings of Denmark, near three hundred years before Canute the Great, it is probable they never conquered above one or two divisions of the Saxon heptarchy. In these early times they were just such a people as the Saxons had been about five hundred years before; their invasions were sudden, their ravages barbarous, and their retreats quick. They probably extorted a promise of homage from the conquered; but never resided long enough in the country to enforce it by authority and power before Canute's reign, who first took the title of king of Denmark, England, Norway, &c. &c.

the exemplary piety, strict justice, and remarkable proofs of military genius and valour which he had displayed towards the close of life. There could not, indeed, be a stronger satire on the manners of his youth, than that total change of conduct he put on in his old age. The same man, who with the most criminal ambition, had sought a father's life, for the sake of a crown, was now contented with the bare homage of a prince, always esteemed a vassal by the kings of Denmark; permitting him to enjoy all the power, authority, and honours belonging to a king <sup>a</sup>.

It is not very certain who was the immediate successor of Swen, though almost all historians allow that he had two sons, Harold and Canute. Saxo Grammaticus and Pontanus, take no farther notice of the former, than by mentioning him as the son of Swen; affirming that the latter, though youngest, was raised to the throne in preference to his brother. <sup>b</sup>

70th king.

ON the contrary, Meursius and Lyschander number Harold among the kings, asserting, that he succeeded Swen by right of primogeniture; this being an invariable maxim with the states, where some very extraordinary circumstances and reasons for laying aside the elder brother did not occur. Upon their authority we shall venture to insert Harold in the list of kings, however unworthy of that dignity he afterwards proved. His effeminacy, lewdness, profligacy, and intire contempt of decency, virtue, and morality, rendered him so odious to a people always brave, and now perfectly civilized by the beautiful system of religion and morals introduced among them, that he enjoyed but a short time the honour he <sup>c</sup> so little merited. He was deposed with every possible mark of disgrace and infamy, and his brother raised to the throne; of which he likewise had like to have been deprived, on account of his constant engagements in foreign wars, the Danes neither bearing with temper a perfect indolence, nor too great activity in their princes <sup>e</sup>.

Canute the Great, 71st king.
A.D. 1015.

CANUTE, deservedly surnamed the great, began his reign with the invasion of England and Norway, both these kingdoms having thrown off the subjection they had promised to his father Swen. The talents of Canute for the cabinet and the field were greatly superior to his father's, and indeed equal to those of any prince who had wore the Danish diadem. The English recalled Ethelred their king, who had abdicated the throne; and as their affections were ever in extremes, Canute perceived that this event would be attended with an attempt to render him independent of the crown of Denmark, and took his measures accordingly. But that he might not be oppressed with such a multitude of foreign wars, as he found he must necessarily be engaged in, he temporized with the Vandals, and other northern nations, who claimed the same independency with England and Norway, in order to direct his whole force against the two last kingdoms. England was his main object; and to prevent its receiving succours from Norway, he artfully drew Claud the king's brother into his views, by persuading him to lay claim to the crown. After this he sailed for England; and in his way met, say the Danish historians, with the English fleet, commanded by king Edward in person, whom he defeated after a sharp engagement (C). At first, say they, victory, which was disputed with great obstinacy, seemed to incline to the English, when Thymon, a nobleman of Zealand, arriving with a reinforcement, soon obliged her to declare in favour of Canute <sup>d</sup>. Numberless difficulties, indeed, occur in this period of our history, and the strongest contrariety of sentiments in the English and Danish historians; but we shall leave them to be discussed in our History of England, that being the theatre of the war, and the proper place for entering upon such disquisitions, which very little affect the History of Denmark. <sup>e</sup>

Contradiction of the English and Danish
historians.

CANUTE had other motives than the power of Ethelred for returning to Denmark. His absence had furnished Olaus of Norway with an opportunity of invading his kingdom; but his return, and the vigour with which he attacked the Norwegians, obliged that monarch to embark not only with great loss, but also to seek shelter in Russia, whither he was pursued by Canute's son, who ravaged a great part of that country, and totally subdued Esthonia, <sup>f</sup> land, but of reducing them to that obedience they had so often promised after repeated defeats. He was willing, he declared, to allow Ethelred the name and power of king of England, provided only that he acknowledged the sovereignty of Denmark; a proposal which was accepted by Ethelred, as he had not forces or a fleet sufficient to dispute it.

(C) These are the express words of Meursius and Pon- tanus, which are diametrically opposite to the relations of all English historians. According to these last, Ethelred reigned in England at this time, Canute landed without opposition; and, relying upon the dilatory disposition of the English monarch, imagined he should carry all with little trouble; but misfortunes had rendered Ethelred more prudent, and his vigorous measures obliged Canute to reimbarc for Denmark (1).

a a province of Livonia, at that time subject to the Muscovites, obliging the inhabitants to pay tribute to the crown of Denmark <sup>b</sup>.

In the mean time Canute, after holding a personal conference with the king of Sweden, to adjust some disputes which threatened to disturb the public tranquillity, and settling the affairs of Denmark, was preparing to embark again for England, where he imagined his presence would be advantageous to his affairs upon the death of Ethelred. But the old king of Sweden dying before the fleet intended for England was ready to put to sea, his intention was deferred, upon receiving advice that Omund, the young king of Sweden, was taking measures to reinstate Olaus of Norway, in his throne and dominions. Omund, in fact, not only granted Olaus a passage to Norway through his dominions, but assisted him with a powerful body of troops, by which the exiled prince was soon in a condition to appear at the head of a formidable army, and to fortify all the posts against Canute. Not contented with this, it was agreed between him and the king of Sweden, that the former should invade Zealand, and the other Danish islands in the Baltic, while the latter should make a descent on Jutland: they had moreover endeavoured to stir up an insurrection in England, where the malcontents were to declare themselves at the very time when he should be most engaged in the defence of his own dominions. By this extended plan, and such a variety of attacks in different places, they hoped to confound his councils, to weaken and divide his forces in such a manner as would render victory certain, and clip the wings of this soaring and ambitious king. But his policy, his penetration, courage, and steadiness, frustrated all their designs, and turned their intrigues against themselves. He procured some of the most faithful noblemen of Zealand to carry on a secret correspondence with Olaus, and to promise that they would take up arms, with all their vassals, as soon as his fleet appeared. Several other designs they formed; and appeared so earnest and sincere, that Olaus, having no suspicion of treachery, had nearly been surrounded by Canute's fleet, while he was waiting the effects of the promised insurrection. Thus were all the measures of Olaus overturned, without the loss of a man, and himself forced to retreat with such precipitation, as equalled the disgrace of a defeat. As soon as Canute had refreshed his troops, he passed with such celerity to Schonen, that he surprised, defeated, and slew in battle the king of Sweden <sup>c</sup>.

HAVING now rid his dominions of foreign enemies, his next measure was to raise such civil commotions in Norway, as would render it impossible for Olaus to disturb the peace of Denmark. With this view he artfully distributed large sums of money among the leading men of that kingdom, encouraged Harold the king's brother, to renew his claim to the crown, and, in a word, took such effectual and politic steps, as not only answered his purpose, but ended in the death of Olaus, who, as some affirm, had been murdered, by a conspiracy formed by his brother Harold; and, according to the relation of others, was deposed and put to death by his own nobility, influenced by the gold and intrigues of the court of Denmark <sup>d</sup>.

CANUTE was now the most formidable potentate perhaps in Europe. Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and England, were tributary to him: his alliance was courted by the greatest monarchs; and even the emperor Conrade sought his daughter in marriage, and voluntarily renounced all claim to Holstein. When Conrade was afterwards deposed, he reaped the fruits of Canute's friendship; for, by means of his interest and power, he was again restored to the imperial dignity. After this he embarked for England, in which country he spent the remainder of his life. Finding the extent of his dominions, and the government of so many distant kingdoms, too great a weight for any single person, he resolved to divide the authority; and accordingly gave the crown of Denmark to his second son Hardi-Canute; to Harold, the eldest, according to the Danish historians, he gave the crown of England; and to Swen, the youngest, he assigned Norway (A). As we shall have occasion to enlarge upon the military actions of this great prince in our History of England, to avoid repetition, we shall only subjoin in this place, that he died a natural death in England, after he had reigned with great applause for the space of twenty-five years over that kingdom, and is deservedly enrolled with the greatest princes who ever wore the diadem. His early age was rendered famous by conquests, glorious victories, and the most refined policy: the last years of his life were amiable by temperance, a strict regard to justice, affability, clemency, and every other virtue that could render him beloved and respected by his subjects. But this is not the place to expatiate on his character, of which we only trace the out-lines (B).

Hardi-Canute,
72d king.

THIS prince, the second son of Canute, obtained the appellation of Hardi-Canute, or Hardi-Knute, from the difficulties he combated, and the valorous actions he performed in Russia, when his father had sent him thither in pursuit of Olaus king of Norway. He was preparing to invade England, then governed by his brother Harold, when some insurrections among the Norwegians, who were desirous of recalling the Olaus family, rendered his presence in that country necessary. His transactions in Norway are variously related. Some affirm that he sent an army thither, which was defeated by Magnus, the son of Olaus, the elected king of Norway. Others are of opinion, that in order to prosecute his voyage to England, Hardi-Canute entered into a treaty with Magnus, and yielded to him the crown, of which his brother Swen was unworthy; but still obliged him to acknowledge himself a vassal of the crown of Denmark. Be this as it will, certain it is that Hardi-Canute equipped a great fleet, and sailed to Bruges in the Low Countries, at that time the residence of his mother Emma, by whom he was made acquainted with the death of Harold. Here it was that he was met by the English ambassadors, sent to invite him to accept of the crown. As from henceforward he may be looked upon as an English king, we shall leave the particulars of his reign to be related in the history of that country. Sufficient for our purpose it is, that he reigned king of Denmark from the year 1035, one year before his father's death, to the year 1041; and died with the reputation of a prince whose character was compounded of the most detestable vices and the noblest virtues. His valour and generosity were in the number of the latter; his cruelty, ferocity, intemperance, and debauchery, composed the former<sup>1</sup>.

Magnus,
73d king.

PONTANUS relates, that, after the death of Hardi-Canute, Magnus, the son of Olaus, king of Norway, succeeded to the throne of Denmark, in consequence of a compact between him and Hardi-Canute, that the survivor should inherit both kingdoms; but we find no mention of this treaty in any other historian, nor was it in the power of Hardi-Canute to bequeath his crown, without the consent of his people. On the contrary, Meursius affirms, that Magnus invaded Denmark with a powerful fleet and army, immediately on the death of Hardi-Canute. It was the dread of his power that induced the states to elect him, in order to avoid the necessity of being compelled into that measure. Immediately he received the allegiance and homage of the nobility, and was publicly proclaimed king of Denmark and Norway; for by this time the English had renounced the Danish blood, and raised Edward, surnamed the Confessor, to the throne. His election was uncontested; but Swen, the nephew of Canute the Great, by his sister, soon after the accession of Magnus, put in his claim to the throne, imagining he should be strongly supported by England, in consequence of a promise he had received from Edward, and some other steps he had taken in that country. This Swen is spoken of as if he had been king of England after Hardi-Canute's death; for Grammaticus and Meursius both say, that he left the affairs of the kingdom in the hands of Harold, Godwin's son, who betrayed him, and was the great instrument of expelling the Danes out of that island. Relying upon this support it was that he disputed the crown of Denmark with Magnus, intending to use force, should his application to the states prove ineffectual. Both his designs were now frustrated, and the Danes driven out of England, which they could never afterwards recover.

Swen defeated.

NOTWITHSTANDING these unfortunate occurrences, Swen determined not to relinquish his claim: he had the address to gain over a great number of the Danish nobility to his interest, and by their means equipped a fleet in Jutland, with which he gave battle to Magnus, and was routed, being forced to take shelter in the island of Funen. Here he refitted, and ventured upon another engagement, which terminated as unsuccessfully as the former. His whole fleet was taken or dispersed, himself escaping with a single ship to Zealand, whither the conqueror pursued him, and obliged him to retire to some of the remoter provinces of Sweden<sup>m</sup>.

Magnus over-

Vandals in a

THIS war being ended, Magnus resumed his operations against the Vandals, with whom it seems he was at war before Swen occasioned the late commotions. He had slain their historian. Having in his cups killed one of his soldiers, he immediately assembled the people, and insisted upon his being tried by a jury, who brought him in guilty, but reserved the sentence and punishment to his own pleasure. He had before rated the price of murder at a certain pecuniary mulct, a third of which went to the king, a third to the relations of the deceased, and a third (say the Danish writers) to the army. He now decreed, that himself should pay nine times the value of the usual fine; and to remove difficulties about his own third, he ordered it should be given to the clergy (1).

(1) Meurs. l. iii.

a prince Ratiborius, who left behind him eight sons, all sworn enemies to Magnus, and men of great valour, who resolved on revenging their father's death. Accordingly they overrun with a multitude of troops the coasts of Jutland, laying waste all the country through which they passed, with all the cruelty of incensed barbarians. Fired with resentment, and the deplorable condition to which his unhappy subjects were reduced, Magnus raised an army, seized the strait or narrow pass at Sleswick to intercept the enemy, and there gave them battle, with such advantage as fully avenged his subjects, and punished those barbarians for their savage cruelty. Some historians relate, that forty thousand of the Vandals were left dead on the field, and that those that remained compelled to lay down their arms, and surrender at discretion; but Meursius reduces the number of slain to fifteen thousand,

b affirming, however, that the prisoners greatly exceeded this number.

This victory, and his clemency to the prisoners, acquired him the surname of Good; He is surnamed the Good. and so endeared him to all his people, that on his return they met him in crowds, loading him with blessings, abjuring Swen, and offering their lives and fortunes for the extirpation of that pretender to his crown, and the defence of his majesty's person and dignity. It was not long after the defeat of the Vandals that Magnus died by a fall from his horse, which took fright at a hare's crossing the road before him, and threw his rider upon stakes fixed in the ground, or some trunks of trees that had just been cut down. Other writers allege, His death and character. that he was drowned in the Baltic, in passing from one ship to another in a small boat. Certain it is, that his death was greatly and deservedly lamented by his people, who enjoyed

c under him all the felicities which it was in the power of a wise and brave monarch to communicate to affectionate and faithful subjects, in so short a reign as eight years, or, as some writers imagine, of no more than three years.

S W E N III.

AFTER the death of Magnus, Swen, who had ever since his defeat been an exile in Sweden, was called without opposition to the throne, to which he was the nearest heir by blood. From his mother, who was sister to Canute the Great, he took the surname of

Estrith; but notwithstanding his alliance to this great prince, necessity, rather than affection, made the Danes elevate him to the dignity of their king, the whole blood royal being extinct in Harde-Canute. A great part of the nation, and indeed the bulk of the nobility and people, who had sided with Magnus against him, would have been glad to d see any other person upon the throne, as they dreaded the resentment of a prince whose pretensions they had so strenuously opposed. Another circumstance besides the necessity from kindred, contributed greatly to Swen's promotion. The late defeat of the Vandals had greatly weakened that people; but then it increased the animosity to the Danes, in the same proportion it diminished their strength. They impatiently watched the opportunity for revenge; and a better could never offer, than when Denmark was embroiled in a civil war, which would inevitably happen, had any opposition been made to Swen's elevation. This the prudent men foresaw, and chose therefore to run the hazard of his resentment, e for having taken part with Magnus against him, than to expose the kingdom to certain destruction, from the incursions of so barbarous, cruel, and incensed a foe, as the Vandals.

SWEN began his reign by making some regulations in the church, and settling the jurisdiction of the several bishops, concerning which some disputes had arisen among the clergy. While he was busied in this manner, the Norwegians recalled Harold, the brother of their king Olaus, and placed him on the throne, after he had lived a great number of years an exile. Harold knowing that Swen was elected king of Denmark, and finding that

f his power was insufficient to dispute with that monarch, scrupled not to hold his kingdom as a fief of Denmark, until a fit occasion should offer for his claiming its independency, and throwing off so shameful a vassalage. He seized the opportunity of Swen's being engaged in a war with the Vandals, and levied powerful forces, with which he had the presumption to invade part of the Danish dominions. Intelligence of his proceedings soon recalled Swen, who gave him battle, and with prodigious loss. A great part of his fleet was taken without a single man on board, the seamen plunging themselves into the sea to avoid the disgrace of falling into the hands of an enemy they had been taught to hold in contempt, in consequence of the repeated victories gained over them. Meursius relates, that Swen having first gained a complete victory, but generously setting the captives at liberty, Harold immediately renewed the fight, while the Danish monarch was wrapped in security, and easily defeated him. Swen being thus conquered, took refuge with the remainder of his fleet in the small islands, from whence he went over to Schonen and Zealand to recruit his forces, and endeavour to retrieve the loss sustained from his too great humanity. As soon as he had completed his levies, and repaired his fleet, he again fought the enemy in the Baltic. To prevent his ships deserting him, he had them chained together, and tho' greatly inferior in force, bravely maintained the engagement till night, and would probably have obtained a victory, had not Harold received a reinforcement, which greatly dispirited the Danes, or rather a number of Germans who served in the fleet, and now separated themselves in the night, to prevent the consequences of a defeat, and their falling into the enemy's hands. Swen, whose courage was invincible, renewed the battle next morning, notwithstanding a third part of his fleet had withdrawn, and hoping to make up by resolution what he wanted in strength, fought with the utmost fury, and most obstinate valour, until he was at length overpowered by numbers, and forced to yield to his ill fortune.

Harold killed and defeated in England.

HAROLD, not satisfied with two victories obtained over the Danes, landed his forces, and laid waste all the coasts of the islands and Danish continent, burning, destroying, and ravaging many villages and cities, and among the rest Sleswick. Swen was forced to content himself with harrassing Harold in his march, not being able to raise a force sufficient to give him battle; but when he had least reason to expect it, Providence wrought a happy change in his situation. The civil divisions in England had raised Harold's ambition to extend his conquests and influence, which he thought he might probably do by taking part with Godwin's children against their sovereign. The low condition to which he had reduced Swen, gave him no disturbance about the consequences of his absence from Norway; he therefore resolved upon an expedition to England, where he was killed; by which means Swen recovered the peaceable possession of all his dominions. Harold's sons Olaus and Magnus shared their father's dominions, and entered into a treaty and alliance with Swen, which was confirmed by the marriage of Olaus with the daughter of Swen.

The Danes depart from England.

THE death of Harold II. king of England, slain in a battle fought with William of Normandy, called the Conqueror, furnished Swen with an opportunity of putting in his claim to the crown of England, as the only remaining descendant of Canute the Great. He had kindly received the two sons and daughter of Harold, who took refuge with him upon their father's defeat; and the latter he married to the prince of Russia. He accordingly equipped a fleet of two hundred sail, and put on board a large body of land-forces, under the command of his sons Harold and Canute. On their arrival in the mouth of the Humber, they were suddenly joined by a great body of malcontents, who were resolved at any rate to throw off the unsupportable tyrannical yoke of William. After a series of transactions, which will be recited in the English history, they retired, at the persuasion of Osbern, brother to Swen, who had been corrupted by the gold of Normandy. The king his brother was so incensed at this meanly venal action, that on the return of the fleet, he immediately ordered Osbern into perpetual banishment.

The Vandals
over-run
Holstein.

A FEW years before Swen's death, the Vandals again revolted, from their dislike to the Christian religion, which they had been forced to embrace, after the great defeat they last received from Harold. After overturning and ruining all the Christian churches among them, setting up their pagan idols, and putting to death a bishop and several Christian prelates, they entered Holstein with fire and sword, and made the country an entire desert. They moreover pillaged the city of Sleswick, levelled the churches with the ground, and in derision broke the crucifixes which mistaken piety had erected in different quarters of the town. But the greatest insult upon Swen was, the manner in which they treated his sister Syrith, whom they stripped naked, and in that condition sent to Denmark. With such celerity did they execute all these barbarities, that they had over-run the provinces of Sleswick and Holstein, before Swen had intelligence of the irruption. He immediately raised an army to revenge these injuries, but soon dropped his resolution, and wasted his time in unseasonable acts of devotion at Roschild. Superstition had now weakened all his faculties; priests became his privy-counsellors, and all the duties of a king, and of a man were absorbed in a narrow zeal and criminal bigotry to the pageantry of religion. His subjects were oppressed with taxes to support the luxury and pomp of the clergy, to purchase plate, and other church ornaments, and to endow religious foundations. Hence it is that the clergy alone have extolled the character of this prince, as the most munificent, pious, and merciful prince that ever filled the throne of Denmark; notwithstanding his incontinence was so great, that of fifteen sons he left behind him, not one was legitimate; and he had polluted the house of God by the cruel murder of several of his nobility: an offence which he sufficiently expiated by his munificence and generosity to those who assumed the power of granting absolution for the most heinous crimes.

- a. THIS prince died of an acute fever in Jutland, while his son Canute was quelling a rebellion which appeared in Esthonia, that province of Livonia which the Danes preserved from the time that Hardiknute conquered it. When Swen perceived that his dissolution was approaching, he assembled all the nobility about him, and obliged them to promise that they would chuse his eldest son for their king, and after him the next surviving brother; in consequence of which obligation, five of his children successively arrived at that dignity; an instance that cannot perhaps be equalled in the history of the world. As to the character of this prince, his unfortunate battles with Harold of Norway prove him a great warrior; for military talents are not always to be estimated by the event. His excessive indulgence to the clergy at the expence of his people, who were almost ruined by his pious donations; b. prove him either to be naturally weak, or at least emasculated by superstition. The number of his illegitimate children demonstrate him to have been libidinous; and his massacring a number of his nobility as they were offering their devotions in church, is a testimony of his cruelty and impiety, however he might throw a veil of grimace over the latter; but his conduct in the Norwegian war are sufficient proofs that his natural disposition was brave; liberal, and generous to a degree of weakness.

- HAROLD*, the oldest son of Swen, was elected in the room of his father, after warm disputes about the succession. The noble qualities of Canute, a younger son, had raised a strong party in his favour; but the promise made to the late king, and Harold's gold, at length prevailed: upon which Canute went over to Schonen, there to carry on the war against the Vandals, that had been left unfinished by his father. This was a kind of honourable voluntary banishment, into which he entered to avoid exciting his brother's jealousy, or disturbing the tranquility of the kingdom. So prudent and moderate a conduct in a young prince of known ambition wrought such an effect on Harold, surnamed the Simple, that he gave him the kindest invitations to return, and offered to receive him as his colleague in the throne; but Canute adhered to his first resolution, either foreseeing that a divided authority would be attended with inconvenience, or disdaining to share the supreme power, with a brother whose capacity he despised.<sup>a</sup>
- d. SOME writers place an inter-regnum of four years about this time; but whether after the death of Swen, or of Harold, we cannot affirm; nor do the best historians make any mention at all of such a chasm in the regal government; for Harold was elected by the first diet that assembled after the death of his father; and Canute, who then resided in Jutland, was immediately recalled on the death of his brother<sup>b</sup>.

- BEFORE Harold mounted the throne, he made the largest promises to the people of framing new laws, such as would redress all the grievances consequent on those at that time in force, and of governing them with the most scrupulous regard to justice, and the public good; but the first part of his engagement he never fulfilled, except in one instance. This was a law by which criminals, where positive evidence was wanting, should be allowed to clear themselves by an oath, and, without passing the ordeal, or trial by fire, as was usual in Denmark, and all the other kingdoms in Europe. The law was received with universal approbation: after which Harold, as if he had sufficiently established his reputation, resigned himself to the most shameful indolence and sloth, neglected to enforce the laws already made, and suffered the whole kingdom to be polluted by the most scandalous corruption, licentiousness, and venality; in which situation Canute found it at the death of his brother, who survived his elevation but two years, according to Grammaticus and Meursius<sup>c</sup>, though the latter acquaints us, that some writers have prolonged his reign to upwards of six years (A).

- f. CANUTE was recalled by the states on the death of his brother, and appointed his successor. Grammaticus says, that this prince accepted of the crown merely with a view to extend the Christian religion, and not from motives of ambition. The war he had carried on in his brother's life time against the Vandals, was for the sake of religion; and he now renewed it, when his power enabled him to punish the impiety of those infidels with more success and severity. Nor did he ever relax in this design until he had accomplished it, by obliging several idolatrous nations lying on the frontiers of Livonia and Muscovy, to receive the truths of the gospel. Having happily finished this war, he married Ethla, daughter to the earl of Flanders, and then applied himself to curb the licentiousness, immorality, and corruption which had crept into public offices, and among all degrees of men, during the inactive reign of Harold. But sensible that example would operate more powerfully on the minds of the people than the most rigid laws, he began a reformation, by the strictest observance of every moral and religious virtue, by enforcing the laws already made, and by shewing his own compliance to them, in the same manner he required of the meanest subject. The effect answered his most sanguine expectations. Every man was ambitious of emulating his sovereign; merit and virtue were the only recommendations to court-favour; and this rendered them universally sought after. In a word, Canute's reign may be called the reign of religion, virtue, and true worth in Denmark, in which temperance, chastity, liberality, justice, and all the heroic and social virtues were cultivated from the king to the peasant: an astonishing instance to what a pitch of piety and virtue a nation may be brought by the example and practice of a discerning monarch<sup>a</sup>.

AFTER civil affairs had undergone a thorough alteration, Canute next applied himself to ecclesiastical matters, in which he made several useful regulations. The first was to detach the body of the clergy intirely from the civil government, and confine their authority wholly to the affairs of the church; such as inspecting into the lives, manners, and doctrine of the inferior clergy; prescribing the forms of public worship, &c. The power of the bishops, however, was greatly augmented, for they were raised to the dignity of dukes and princes, and took place of the senators and nobility of the highest quality. Such was his regard for the bishops, that he even invested them with the civil sword, and permitted them to go to war with all the power of independent monarchs; an institution which plainly shews, that all the good sense of Canute was not proof against the craft of superstition and priesthood; as nothing could be more absurd than this authority committed into the hands of eight prelates (for that was the number of bishops in Denmark) while all the rest of the clergy were wholly cut off from civil connections, and deprived of that weight which alone could give influence to their doctrine, or declare them of the same function with those dignified prelates<sup>c</sup>.

Canute's regard for learning.

BUT it was not the least glory of Canute, that he paid the utmost respect to men of learning, and promoted the study of arts and sciences by his own private benevolence, as well as by public rewards, and certain literary foundations, which he annexed to the ecclesiastical government. It is certain, however, that a prince may carry his regard to religion and learning, to a pitch dangerous to himself, and oppressive to the people. Canute's bounty to the clergy and learned men had no bounds; besides the numberless institutions he made in their favour, he granted them the tythes, which occasioned an universal disaffection, and at length brought on his ruin. Large sums of money were expended in erecting churches and pious foundations, which were raised from the sweat of the labourer, and the oppression of the useful husbandman and mechanic<sup>d</sup>.

He meditates the reduction of England.

IN this situation were the affairs of Denmark, when Canute, laying aside civil and ecclesiastical affairs, resolved once more to embark in war, and attempt the recovery of England. He communicated his intentions first to his brother Olaus, who greatly approved of it from private views, and afterwards to the senate, who did not discourage the project. Upon this Canute equipped a fleet, and raised an army with all possible expedition. The earl of Flanders, and a great number of English exiles residing at that nobleman's court, rejoiced at the occasion that was likely to restore them to their own country, whence they were driven by William's severity and partiality to the Normans. While the fleet and army were waiting at the appointed rendezvous, until Canute had finished some public business, and appointed regents to govern the kingdom in his absence, he discovered that his brother Olaus had been secretly endeavouring to deprive him of the crown: upon which he immediately set out with a few troops for Sleswick, of which his brother was governor, to secure his person, and bring him to public justice. Olaus had, however, so gained upon the affections of the soldiers, that they refused to obey the king's orders to seize him: upon which Eric, brother both to Olaus and the king, broke into his apartment, and brought him bound in chains to his majesty. Canute, not caring to pollute his hands with a brother's blood, sent him to his father-in-law the earl of Flanders, with directions that he should be treated in a manner suited to his rank, but so narrowly watched as to prevent his return to Denmark. In the mean time, the tools of Olaus had so wrought upon the minds of the soldiers by their artful insinuations, that they disbanded themselves before the king's return, which obliged him to postpone his expedition to England, and convoke another diet, before he could raise an army<sup>e</sup>.

- a ancestors, by the faithful attachment of their subjects; of their conquests in the different parts of Europe, and particularly in England, which country they held for two hundred years in subjection, and now lost from the indolence and pusillanimity which laid hold of the once intrepid Danes. He represented to them the shame of deserting their monarch, who was in full pursuit of glory, conquest, and dominion; and of so scandalously abandoning a cause, which required no more than their presence to terminate happily. He laid before them the advantages which would result to Denmark, a poor, rocky, cold, and unfruitful country, from the conquest of an island abounding with all the conveniences and luxuries of life: in a word, he omitted no arguments that could seduce or impel them to their duty; but in vain. The emissaries of Olaus were indefatigable, and the minds of the people wholly alienated from their sovereign from the time he had granted the tenths to the clergy. They insisted upon the revocation of this decree, and Canute was unhappily obstinate to confirm it. The people rose in arms in different quarters, and he was forced to seek shelter in the island of Funen, where he soon after perished through the treachery of a nobleman, in whose fidelity he placed his greatest confidence. He died by the hands of a people he loved; and but for a few errors in his conduct, and the ambition of his brother Olaus, would have governed happily. His valour, justice, generosity, and piety, were universally acknowledged; but a certain easiness of temper, and tincture of enthusiastic devotion, betrayed him into weaknesses that were the original causes of his unfortunate end. In a word, the reader cannot but perceive a striking analogy between his character and melancholy catastrophe, and that of our Charles I. Both were princes, who, but for the peculiar circumstances of the times, would have reigned equally beloved by their subjects, and esteemed by foreigners; both fell the sacrifices of amiable foibles, dangerous indeed in monarchs, but greatly admired in private life <sup>a</sup>.

He is betrayed and put to death.

O L A U S, surnamed the Hungry, or Famished.

- CANUTE's* death was no sooner known, than the friends of Olaus set every spring at work to procure his liberty, and raise him to the throne. They doubted not but they should enjoy his chief confidence and favour, as they were the instruments of his promotion. Accordingly a sum of money was raised for his ransom, and his brother Nicholas sent to the earl of Flanders to conduct Olaus to Denmark (G). On his arrival his brother Eric, who had seized him in Sleswick, retired with his family into Sweden, not doubting but the young king would deeply resent an action which had occasioned his long imprisonment.

- THE first act of Olaus's government was the shewing his gratitude to his brother Nicholas, then confined in Flanders, and sending thither a large sum of money for his redemption. He next proceeded to several popular regulations, in order to secure the affections of the people, as he knew that a great part of the nation dreaded his resentment, on account of their espousing the cause of Canute: but he was interrupted in the midst of this laudable conduct by a terrible misfortune, which he could neither foresee nor prevent. A dreadful famine, in consequence of a bad harvest, prevailed so much, that the richest people in Denmark were forced to supply the want of bread with roots, and other vegetables; while the poor, who were unable to procure even these, perished in the streets and highways. Nor was this all: the heat of the preceding summer, and the deluges of rain which had fallen in the autumn, occasioned such a corruption in the air, and alteration in the human frame, as was attended with the most deplorable pestilence that had ever been known in any northern country. Both these terrible calamities, of famine and pestilence, seemed to contend which should most afflict the miserable Danes. Thousands of souls were swept off by each, and public fastings and prayers appointed in all the churches, to beseech God to remove so insupportable a scourge, which they now looked upon as the just punishment of their late rebellion against the best of monarchs. Sweyn, bishop of Roschild, undertook a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, thereby to appease the Almighty, and atone for the crimes of the people. At length it pleased God to put a stop to the plague, and to send a plentiful harvest, which removed the wants of the people; but not during the life-time of Olaus, who, oppressed with grief at the miseries of the nation, died suddenly, and, as some affirm, upon the following occasion. It had long been customary for the nobility to dine with the king on Christmas-day, and they were accordingly invited by Olaus. When dinner was served up, the king called for bread; but was told, there was not a bit in the kingdom:

Great scarcity in Denmark.

(G) In the conduct of Nicholas, we find a remarkable instance of brotherly affection; for the earl of Flanders refusing to set Olaus at liberty, Nicholas offered himself a prisoner in his room, was accepted, and voluntarily put on the chains which his brother had just laid aside (1).

a reply that struck him with such horror, that he put up a prayer to God, beseeching him to accept of his life as an atonement for his crimes, and the sins of the nation. His prayer was heard; for he instantly expired, and the famine ceased. We must however observe, that this anecdote is not very consistent with the account given by the best writers, and even by Grammaticus himself, though he relates this story; for they all assert, that the famine was removed by the ensuing plentiful autumn. Some writers alledge, that Olaus reigned only seven years; but Ælnothus, a cotemporary historian, affirms, that he wore the crown for eight years and nine months<sup>1</sup>.

E R I C III.

Eric III. 781b
king.

OLAUS dying suddenly, the states immediately assembled to elect a successor, and it b was unanimously agreed, that a deputation should be sent to Eric, then an exile in Sweden, to invite him to the throne. Under this excellent prince, who was possessed of many heroic and amiable virtues, Denmark began to retrieve her ancient character and power. In the beginning of his reign he entered upon a war with the Vandals, who had protected two notorious pirates, banished out of Schonen for their crimes; and, under their conduct, committed the most impudent depredations and robberies on the high seas, as well as on the coasts of Denmark. Fitting out a fleet, he invested their capital in the isle of Rugen; and, after a brisk siege, took it by assault. Then, to deprive those pirates of this strong hold, he ordered the fortifications to be razed, and the town so thoroughly dismantled, that c for a great number of years it did not recover its ancient strength and splendor. He next pursued the pirates into all the different ports of the Baltic, and punished severely those who fell into his hands, in order to terrify others by these examples. Eric's nature was mild, and prone to mercy; but he saw the security of Denmark depended on the extirpation of this nest of thieves. After having wholly subdued the Vandals, as he imagined, he returned to his capital, where he was received with the acclamations of a joyful people, who had penetration enough soon to discover the true character of their sovereign. His residence here was but short, when the Vandals made shift, notwithstanding their late reduction, to enter Denmark, spreading terror and desolation wherever they went, in revenge for the destruction of their city; but making so short a stay as rendered it impossible for Eric to attack and d punish them, before they quitted his dominions. Enraged with this insult, he raised a body of troops, and, entering their country, so severely chastised them, that during his life they never again attempted giving the least molestation<sup>k</sup>.

Canute.

ON his return he sent a deputation to Rome, setting forth the virtues and piety of his brother Canute, who perished a martyr to religion by the hands of an enraged mob, and requesting that his name might be enrolled in the calendar of saints, which petition was honourably received and granted by his holiness, who had too much policy and breeding to refuse a request from so potent a monarch, which at the same time implied a compliment to his own authority. Not long after the pope, Paschal II. found an opportunity of displaying his power more amply to the Danes; for a dispute, concerning some temporalities, arising between Eric and the bishop of Bremen, that prelate went in person to Rome, e and, laying the case before his holiness, obtained a verdict, though Eric refused for some time to stand by this award; but was afterwards forced to yield to the clamours of his own clergy, and the thundering menaces of the conclave. It is even affirmed, that he was forced to go in person to Rome to supplicate the pope's pardon, and make up the breach between him and the holy see, by the most respectful submission and deepest contrition: the account, however, of this event, is very obscurely related by all the Danish historians<sup>1</sup>.

AFTER Eric's return from Rome it was, that a musician boasting to him of his skill on the harp, asserted, that his power over the faculties extended so far, that he could at any time deprive his hearers of their understanding, and render them frantic by force of harmony. Eric, who greatly doubted the truth of the musician's asseveration, ordered him f to give a specimen of his skill, and was himself the first instance of the truth of what he asserted; for his passions were so wound up, that in an extasy of madness he flew like a maniac round the apartment, and in his transport killed four soldiers of the guard, which the musician observing, immediately changed his cadence to a soothing strain, and soon assuaged the violent transports he had excited. Grieved at what he had done, Eric rewarded the musician, and after making all possible recompence to the relations of the deceased, vowed a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in order to do penance, and expiate thereby the horrid crime he had committed. For some time he concealed his intention from the states; but all things being ready for his journey, he made public declaration of his vow. They unanimously remonstrated against his design, which must inevitably involve the kingdom in numberless calamities. They embraced his feet, and bathed them with their tears, be-

- a seeking that he would not expose to danger a life upon which depended the felicity of a whole kingdom; but Eric was inflexible. He accordingly pursued his journey, and passing through Greece, was honourably and magnificently entertained by the emperor Alexius. From Constantinople he took ship for Cyprus, and there ended his days a short time after his arrival. His death so afflicted Bathilda his queen, and faithful companion of his pilgrimage, that she survived him but a few hours, and was buried with him in the same tomb. This event fell out, according to Grammaticus and Suaningius, in the year 1101 after the birth of Christ, although an author quoted by Meursius, places it four years earlier; and thus Denmark was deprived of an excellent king, through a false and mistaken devotion. Eric was surnamed the Good, from an excessive benevolence in his disposition, which rendered him the sure friend and patron of the distressed and unfortunate. His affability was so great, that he conversed with his meanest subjects, received their complaints, and relieved them, either by his authority, or out of his own private purse: yet had he the address of blending the dignity of a king with the humility of a subject; for he was equally beloved by his nobility and commons, and respected by all the neighbouring powers. We are told that his eloquence was so great, that he was never under the necessity of exerting his authority in the senate: the irresistible persuasion that hung upon his tongue carried all before it; and if he was ever opposed, it was only that his people might have the satisfaction of yielding to the sweetness of his oratory. However absurd his piety may appear in these more enlightened days, his implicit faith in the pope's infallibility was the fault of the times: in other respects he practised the rigid precepts of morality, which are ever inseparable from true religion; and the last act of his reign shewed his strict regard to his vows, though it may be condemned by such as are of opinion, that a proper regard to the public good might have sufficiently absolved him from an obligation rashly entered upon<sup>a</sup>.

Eric's pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

His character.

- When Eric departed for the Holy Land, he left his son Harold regent of the kingdom: but the states being made acquainted with his death, recalled Nicholas, paid his ransom to the earl of Flanders, and placed him upon the throne, out of respect to the promise they had made to his father on his death-bed. They were urged the more to this by the severity of Harold's manners, which they foresaw would render them unhappy, if they raised him to the throne. Before the arrival of Nicholas, Swen, relying upon his interest with the diet of Wiburg, put in his claim to the crown as the elder brother, and was hastening thither when he was seized by a fever, of which he died in a few days. Ubbo, the next in age, wanted not a party of the nobility to espouse his cause; but he declined the crown out of respect to his younger brother, whose capacity, he modestly declared, was more adequate to the weight of governing; a rare instance of self-denial and brotherly love.

N I C H O L A S.

- Thus the sceptre was put into the hands of Nicholas, who at first wielded it with great applause; but falling off in his character, and degenerating from the virtues of his ancestors, and from his own, he fell into the utmost contempt (H), and involved himself and his people in a variety of misfortunes. The breach of the public tranquillity had its first rise from Henry, son to Godeschal, prince of the Vandals. This prince, after the destruction of his country in the last reign, lived privately for some years in Denmark; but, on Eric's setting out for the Holy Land, found means to recover his hereditary dominions. He was nephew to Nicholas, and had frequently besought him to restore his mother's portion; but had always met with a harsh refusal. This irritated the young prince, and determined him to have recourse to arms. Entering into an alliance with the Nordalbingi, a people of Lower Saxony, or properly the Holsteiners, he soon subdued all that country lying between the Elbe and Sleswick. Thence he made such terrible incursions into the duchy of Sleswick, that Nicholas, who at that time resided in the capital, was forced to double his guards, and provide for the security of the city. For this purpose he sent to the several parts of his dominions for troops, and unfortunately committed that trust to Elive, a nobleman, who held a clandestine correspondence with Henry, and stipulated with him to betray his royal master. With this view he used all possible delay in marching the troops; and, to cover his treachery, was continually sending expresses to Nicholas, representing the occasion of his dilatoriness, and raising some new difficulty. At length the infantry arrived, and with them Nicholas, at Elive's persuasion, determined to give battle to Henry. The event fell out as the traitor foresaw: Henry's horse broke and put in confusion the Danish

(H) Here would seem to be an inter-regnum of six years, as Eric died in the year 1101, and Nicholas was not placed in the throne until the year 1108. It is probable, that Harold, during this period, held the office of regent; and so indeed we find it asserted by Suaningius, though this fact is omitted by all the other historians. Vid. p. 74.

infantry; and now, when it was too late, the perfidy of Elive was discovered. Nicholas was a defeated, and forced to retreat with precipitation into Denmark; where he no sooner arrived than he divested the treacherous Elive of all his employments, and confiscated his estate, believing that, and its necessary consequence, poverty, to be a more severe punishment than death itself <sup>a</sup>.

Canute, the son of Eric, obtains the government of Sleswick, and obliges the Vandals to sue for peace.

In the mean while Henry, grown bold by his victory, made more dreadful incursions into the Danish territories, and, laying waste all the sea-coasts, made an attempt on Sleswick; but was repulsed with loss. Canute, the son of Eric, the late king, and nephew to Nicholas, perceiving the misery to which this fine duchy of Sleswick was reduced by the cruelty of the Vandals, requested the government of a country which had been refused, on account of the danger, by many of the nobility. With a great deal of intreaty and interest, he at length obtained it, and immediately set out to perform the duties of his employment. His first measure was to offer proposals of peace to Henry, which he assured him he would willingly enter into, without any other conditions than his indemnifying the duchy of Sleswick for her losses, and the king of Denmark for the expences he had been at in the war. These were terms which he was sensible the haughty spirit of Henry, now rendered more insolent and untractable by prosperity, would reject, and therefore provided accordingly, by raising a body of troops with the utmost expedition and secrecy. With these he marched in the middle of the night, with all possible silence, directly to a castle on the frontiers of Sleswick, where Henry kept his head-quarters, and was fortunate enough to surround the place before the Vandal prince received any intimation of his march. In this situation, Henry, perceiving that resistance would be fruitless, mounted his horse, and by a secret path made his escape, leaving the castle to be plundered by the Danish soldiers, who did not fail to retaliate the many injuries they had received from him <sup>b</sup>.

Canute defeats Henry prince of the Vandals.

HENRY's escape occasioned a prolongation of the war: he levied a strong body of troops, with which he had frequent skirmishes with Canute, without ever venturing upon a general engagement. At length the Dane, tired out with the tediousness of a war which kept him in perpetual apprehension, determined to finish it by one decisive stroke. He augmented his army, entered the enemy's country, laid it waste, and then defeated Henry, who had hazarded a battle. The consequence was, that Henry sued for peace in the most supplicating and abject terms, promising to submit to any terms which the conqueror would think fit to impose. His submission was immediately accepted by the magnanimous Canute, who, says Grammaticus, after Virgil, was satisfied with humbling a haughty foe, and delighted with extending his clemency to the conquered. He immediately took horse, attended only by an escort of twenty persons, and entering Henry's dominions with more valour than discretion, sent a messenger to his castle to acquaint him with his arrival. The Danish messenger entered the castle just as Henry was sitting down to dinner; upon which he instantly seized his arms, and ordered all his people to stand on their defence; but being told that Canute was come to conclude a peace, he went out to receive him. These brave princes embraced each other with tears, signed a peace, and entered into the strictest friendship, which continued inviolable for the remainder of their lives. Such was the esteem which Henry conceived for Canute, that on his death-bed he appointed him the guardian of his infant-children, and put the government of his kingdom wholly into his hands; nay, he had taken such precautions and measures with the emperor, that, after his death, Canute found himself raised by his means to be duke of Mecklenburgh. Thus the valour and generosity of Canute not only secured the duchy of Sleswick to the crown of Denmark, but strengthened the interest of that kingdom, by attaching to it a brave people, ever before in a state of hostility with the Danes, and procured to himself the dignity of a duke and prince of the empire, without art, intrigue, or ambition. Soon after the emperor invested him with the title of king of the Vandals, for which purpose he visited the imperial court <sup>c</sup>.

Canute's wise policy, by which he is made king of the Vandals.

This prince reigned some years with the utmost reputation, esteemed, beloved, and respected by all good men; but his reign was at length disturbed by contentions, which arose between his sons. Ambition had fired the breasts of these young men, and had like to have proved fatal to the duchy of Sleswick; but as these transactions have no immediate relation with the History of Denmark, it will be sufficient to add, that the prudence of Canute triumphed over the headstrong ambition of his children, whom he reconciled with a parental authority, as well as by the esteem and awe with which his character impressed their minds <sup>d</sup>.

In the mean time, the king of Sweden dying, the Ostrogots chose another king in his room; but the Swedes, believing that the right of election belonged only to themselves, put to death the Ostrogot king, and chose Magnus, the son of Nicholas king of Denmark. This prince marrying a daughter of the king of Poland, was by that means involved in a war with Vratislaus, prince of Sclavonia, into which he likewise drew <sup>e</sup>.

- a his father Nicholas, not as an auxiliary, but a principal in the quarrel. Denmark, Poland, Sweden, and Denmark, Sweden, and Poland unite against the Slavonians, being combined against Vratislaus, he found himself under the necessity of making proposals of peace extremely advantageous to the allies; but Nicholas would admit of no overtures until he had subdued the greater part of Slavonia: after which he insisted upon the conquered prince's making his submission in person; and was weak and perfidious enough to break the parole of honour he had given for the security of Vratislaus, and retain him prisoner, until the remonstrances of Canute, king of the Vandals, obtained his liberty. Nicholas afterwards thanked the generous Canute for this interposition, which, he said, had saved his and the national reputation, which must have received an indelible stain from so notorious a breach of public faith. He then vented his indignation against the
- b advisers of such unworthy and dishonourable measures; yet, after all, his generosity proved the ruin of the noble-minded Canute. His enemies increased in proportion to his virtue, and they were overwhelmed with shame and confusion at his superiority of character: far, however, from endeavouring to imitate his example, they laboured to remove this mirror of true honour, that only served to reflect with redoubled force their own disgrace. They found means of insinuating into the head of the credulous Nicholas; that ambition was the basis and spring of all Canute's actions; that, far from being satisfied with the crown he wore, and with the duchies of Sleswick and Holstein, he aspired at a still higher dignity; and that his popularity was paving an easy way for his ascending the throne of Denmark. As his own children were in the number of accusers, the weak Nicholas the
- c more readily credited these slanders, equally false and insidious, and only now watched a fair opportunity of robbing Denmark of its greatest ornament and support.
- In the mean time, Nicholas prepared to celebrate the nuptials of his son with a princess of Poland; for which purpose the nobility and vassals of Denmark appeared with all possible magnificence at Ripen, and among the rest Canute, who eclipsed them all in splendor and pomp, as much as he did in merit. This circumstance added fuel to the fire that was soon to consume him. The king of Denmark was now convinced of the truth of all those treacherous insinuations that were daily whispered in his ear; while Canute, guarded only by his innocence, and unacquainted with the machinations carried on against him, gained the esteem and affection of all worthy men. The plot was ready to break out against
- d him, when a sudden revolt in Pomerania called him to his own country, and for a time postponed his fate. Here he quickly subdued the rebels, and afterwards returned to Denmark to receive his sovereign's applause; but how was he thunderstruck at the cold reception, nay, the stern aspect of the silly Nicholas, on his approaching that throne, to which he added so much lustre. Instantly he beseeched his majesty, to acquaint him with the cause of a conduct so different from what he flattered himself with; he offered to submit his actions to the most minute scrutiny; he breathed nothing but loyalty and duty, and expressed himself with so noble but respectful firmness of mind, that queen Margaret, a woman of great prudence and virtue, espoused his cause, and, during her life, frustrated all the attempts of his enemies. This excellent princess, however, falling into a dangerous ma-
- e lady, he soon lost that stay of his hope and patroness of merit. On her death-bed she sent for Canute, and told him, "that his greatest enemies were those whom nature and duty ought the most firmly to bind to his interest. She recommended to him to establish harmony and tranquillity at home; to gain the love and confidence of his own children, which would be a certain barrier against all the insinuations of other enemies. They had, she said, the king's ear, who allowed great weight to the allegations of those who were supposed best acquainted with the private designs of their own father. She was now departing out of life, and would die contented in the thoughts, that this intelligence, the goodness of the Almighty, the justice of Canute's cause, and his own integrity, prudence, and virtue would surmount all difficulties, preserve Denmark from the calamity of
- f "a civil war, and enable him to triumph over all his adversaries." With which words this pious and noble-minded princess resigned her last breath. Canute was moved no less with the death of so generous a friend than with the particulars of her dying words. He was shocked at the unnatural conduct of his own children, and greatly perplexed in what manner to execute the wholesome advice of his queen. Before he had settled any plan of operation, his enemies, taking advantage of her majesty's death, prevailed upon the king to have him solemnly cited before a general diet of the states, where he was accused of heinous crimes, and particularly of a design upon the crown of Denmark; but such was the eloquence of Canute, inspired by conscious innocence, that even now he baffled all his foes, and fully convinced Nicholas of his honour and loyalty<sup>b</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING this victory, it was not long before malice found means to renew <sup>a</sup> the attack with redoubled vigour, after having drawn the young queen into their party, who soon wrought a change upon the mind of Nicholas, and persuaded him that he could not expect Magnus, his son, should ever succeed to his crown, while Canute enjoyed such a share of popularity as even affected himself, and made him totter in the throne. An accident added strength to her suggestions; for Nicholas going to Sleswick, the government of Canute, both kings had occasion to appear with their royal badges at some public assembly, when Nicholas entering first, seated himself on his throne at one end of the hall, and was soon followed by Canute, who did the same in the opposite end without remembering to pay the expected compliments at his first entrance. As soon as he recollected himself, he leaped down in the utmost confusion to apologize for the omission; but Nicholas construed it into pride, and the queen, with her party, wrested it into the most invidious sense. In consequence the king assembled, with the utmost privacy, the leading men of the faction, and, after having bound them to secrecy by an oath, declared his wish, that so dangerous a person as Canute might be taken off, in such a manner as would not excite the clamours of the people, whose idol he was (A). The manner of the oath was unusual, in order to render it more solemn; for it was taken neither in a kneeling, sitting, or standing posture, but with their faces prostrated on the ground. After this the manner of executing their design was committed to Magnus, who possessed the art of dissimulation in the greatest perfection. This person invited, according to the annual custom, all the nobility of the kingdom to an entertainment on the Christmas-Eve. Canute was not forgot, <sup>b</sup> and he, desirous of wiping off the late omission, did not fail to obey the summons, that he might shew his respect for his sovereign. He was treated by Magnus with the most extraordinary instances of esteem. The perfidious friend told him, that the generosity of his conduct, and steady adherence to virtue, had blotted out all suspicions in the king's mind, and united the whole kingdom in one chorus of applause, and admiration of his great qualities. He said, that intending a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he would request it of Canute, as a proof of his friendship, that he would charge himself with the guardianship of his children, and superintendency of his affairs during his absence, as there was not a person of whose capacity and integrity he entertained so high notions. In a word, he said every thing which could flatter, cajole, and confirm Canute in his opinion, that he was perfectly reconciled, because he spoke truth, though it was for the basest and <sup>c</sup> most perfidious purposes. After he had sufficiently lulled Canute's suspicions, he formed his plan, and hearing that he proposed visiting a sister in the country, whither he would carry but few attendants, fixed upon this as the proper occasion for his destruction. The day arrived, and Canute, who had no suspicion of treachery, though his wife had sent a messenger from Sleswick to acquaint him of the conspiracy, set out with no more than four attendants (B). He was attacked in a little wood by Magnus, supported by a large body of conspirators, and slain before he scarce had any suspicion of the treachery of this artful friend, and with such circumstances of deep dissimulation and savage cruelty as render this story one of the most pathetic in history, though our plan will not permit us to dwell upon particulars. Thus fell the generous, the great Canute, the ornament of Denmark, and <sup>d</sup> the greatest hero of his age. His virtues, which had raised him from a private station to a throne, were now the cause of his death, by the hands of wicked conspirators, who could not see, without envy, themselves eclipsed in the eyes of the people by such superlative merit <sup>e</sup>.

THE news of his death soon reached Roschild, the then residence of the court, and the king himself could not help shedding tears at the loss of this great man, though he was privy to the plot. The people were inconsolable, they poured out imprecations against the murderers, and nothing prevented an universal insurrection besides the consideration, that now all their endeavours would only augment the public calamity, without being able to recal him to life. His friends solicited the king for leave to bury him with the pomp <sup>f</sup> becoming his quality and merit, in Roschild; but this he prudently declined, from an ap-of the plot, sent a trusty messenger with the utmost expedition to inform him of his danger; but Canute, like a truly generous mind, slighted the intelligence as the effects of her love and fear, saying, that it was impossible Magnus could be such a villain, and so mean a hypocrite (3).

<sup>a</sup> prehension of the consequences that might flow from so affecting a sight as his mangled corpse being exposed to the people. He was therefore privately interred at Ringstad, without any other monument than what he had established in the hearts of the affectionate Danes, who to this day adore his memory <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> MAGNUS, after this infamous exploit, returned to Roschild; but could with difficulty escape the vengeance of an enraged populace. His party however was so strong, that he soon quelled all opposition, and began publicly to boast of what he had performed. He now looked upon himself as the immediate and sure successor to the throne, assuming, in all respects, the importance of the heir-apparent; but he could little foresee how just and inscrutable are the ways of Providence; which, sooner or later, never fails to punish the wicked and unjust. Ingeburga, the wife of Canute, was delivered of a son about eight days after his murder: the infant became dear to the public, from the love they bore to his father. Harold and Eric, his uncles, were appointed his guardians, and joined with the brave sons of Scialmond, his cousins, to vindicate the cause of oppressed innocence, determining, at least, that he should succeed to the crown of the Vandals, the dukedom of Holstein, and the government of Sleswick (A). They held an assembly of their friends at Ringstad, where they pathetically lamented the fate of the deceased, enumerated his qualities, and, in the manner of Marc Anthony, exposed his rent and bloody cloaths to the view of the populace, craving their aid and assistance to avenge his memory, and support his infant son. All were fired with the affecting sight; they cried out for arms, and desired to be instantly led against the barbarous and perfidious murderer, chusing Eric for their general <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> THE king soon had intelligence of this transaction, and immediately consulted After the primate, in whose fidelity and prudence he greatly confided, what steps should be taken in so dangerous a conjuncture. After many proposals it was determined, that Magnus should be concealed, and that the king should immediately proceed to Ringstad, and there convoke the people. His edict was published, and when the day arrived, Eric made a speech, adapted to inflame the minds of the populace; which had a violent effect, until the primate appeared, and by his winning manner and persuasive eloquence appeased the tumult, and determined the people to receive their sovereign with becoming respect. While the primate was gone to introduce the king, Eric, seizing the opportunity, made a short speech, which soon roused them to their former sentiments, and confirmed them in their resolutions of revenge. On the king's arrival he was received with a sullen murmuring, which ran through the whole assembly; upon which Eric again rose, and told him, that the friends of Canute, and the nation in general, demanded that justice should be executed on the murderers of that great man. He was supported by the whole assembly; and the king found it necessary to his own safety that he should promise that Magnus should immediately be sent into perpetual exile, which was all he could obtain in his behalf from the people, who thought they had shewn great lenity in sparing so unworthy a life <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> IN compliance with his oath, Nicholas sent Magnus to Ostrogoth, where, by his influence, he was created king; an instance of paternal affection against which the people shewed no resentment: but, unhappily, he was persuaded soon after, by those who had been engaged with Magnus in the conspiracy, to recal him to Denmark, as his heir apparent. This raised a ferment in the kingdom, and obliged Eric and Harold immediately to convene the people at Ringstad. Here they set forth the king's perfidy and breach of vows, which, they affirmed, rendered him unworthy of the crown he wore; and obtained a resolution of the assembly, that both he and Magnus should be persecuted as enemies to the nation: the assembly farther insisted upon Eric's accepting the crown, which out of policy he refused, until he should merit it by his services, and some signal acts of valour. An army, however, was instantly raised, with which Eric marched directly to Jutland, where Nicholas at that time was, and would immediately have made him prisoner, had not the policy of <sup>f</sup> Truro, bishop of Ripen, diverted his intention. This prelate made use of such specious arguments in defence of the king's conduct, which he urged arose from necessity, rather than affection for Magnus; he related so many plausible schemes, which he determined to execute as soon as opportunity offered, that Eric's impetuosity was checked; and he encamped in the place he then was, with a view to receive proposals from Nicholas. His troops were suffered to forage, and wander round the country, as he had no suspicion of treachery in the prelate, who bore the reputation of great piety. This was the opportunity which Eric wanted, and he improved it to such advantage, that attacking Eric unprepared, Eric defeated.

he totally dispersed his army, after having made great slaughter in his camp. Eric's rage, at this fresh instance of his perfidy, was inconceivable; and, indeed, the disaffection of the nation rose now to such a height, as not to be satisfied with less than the lives and crown of Nicholas and Magnus. Another assembly was held, and Eric now accepted the sceptre which he before refused: an army was raised with all expedition, and ambassadors were sent to crave the assistance of the emperor Lotharius, in revenging the cause of Canute, for whom he had always professed the strongest friendship. Lotharius promised every thing to the ambassadors: he had, in fact, no other view than the extension of the empire, which he thought might easily be effected by seizing upon the Danish provinces, bordering on his dominions, during the heats of a civil war. For this purpose he levied an army; and marching into Holstein, he found Nicholas encamped with a strong body of forces behind the wall of Danewark. Here, instead of giving him battle, he entered upon a treaty, created Magnus a prince of the empire, and then drew off his army. Eric, who had come to Sleswick with a fleet to support the emperor, was astonished at his treachery; and, upbraiding him with perfidy and cowardice, told him, that Magnus, he doubted not, would return his favours with the same ingratitude he had done those of Canute: a prognostic that was soon verified by the event; for Magnus, equally deaf to the dictates of honour and conscience, fell upon the rear of the Imperialists, cut them off, and obliged Adolphus, who led that part of the army, to save his life by swimming &c.

In the mean while, Eric, having no hopes of assistance from the emperor, returned to Zealand, and there received ambassadors from the king of Norway, who demanded the infant son of Canute in marriage for his daughter. Pleased with the hopes of so powerful an ally, as this connexion would produce, he assured the ambassadors, that he was ready to enter upon a treaty with their king, and would with pleasure embrace every opportunity of cultivating his friendship by the strongest ties; to testify which, he immediately offered the king his niece in marriage, and gave pledges for the faith of his nephew.

BOTH parties now prepared for war; and Nicholas drew to his side all the bishops of Jutland, and several of the principal nobility of the kingdom, besides the conspirators, who were all strongly attached to his interest. In Eric's army were his brother Harold, with his two sons, who could not help espousing his honest cause, though they were displeased at his elevation in preference to Harold the elder brother, the bishop of Roschild, and Christiern, a nobleman of great influence and personal valour, to whom he gave the command of the forces intended to oppose the king in Jutland, while himself with the fleet should attack Magnus. He soon came up with his antagonist, and, after a brisk action, totally destroyed and took his fleet, Magnus making his escape in a boat. But this good fortune was counterbalanced by a victory which the king gained over Christiern by land, who was made prisoner, and carried to Sleswick. Before Eric received advice of his general's defeat, he was so elated with his own good fortune, that he entered the gut of Alberg, with intention of landing his forces, joining Christiern, and gaining an easy victory over the king. This rendered him less rigid in point of discipline, so that he permitted the soldiers to relax themselves after their confinement on board by strolling round the country; an imprudence which the king did not fail of turning to advantage. He attacked Eric in this situation, and defeated a great part of his army. Nor was this all his loss; for Harold, his brother, envious of his dignity, and perceiving the king's cause bore a better aspect, deserted him, and carried over a strong reinforcement to the king's army. Happily however for Eric, the winter came on, and prevented the king pursuing his advantage, or even keeping the field <sup>h</sup>.

Eric flies into Norway.

BEFORE the next campaign Sweden revolted, and created Licerco, a nobleman of high rank, sovereign. He immediately assumed his independency by a very extraordinary act, which was no other than debauching Uvilda, wife to king Nicholas, whom, for the more security, he had sent into Sweden. Early in the spring Nicholas took the field, joined battle with Eric, greatly inferior to him in strength, and obtained so complete a victory, that Eric was forced to fly into Norway, accompanied only by his wife, his natural son Swen, and a few attendants. Here he was at first kindly received, until Nicholas bribed the Norwegian king to put him to death, or deliver him into his hands; but Eric escaped this danger by means of the queen his niece, who privately sent him notice of what was transacting. Upon this he instantly wrote to his friends in Langland, to send a ship to Norway to carry him off. The ship arriving, he artfully contrived to escape from the castle, where he was confined under pretence of being secure against the machinations of Nicholas, by inebriating the guard. As the ship's crew were determined to hazard all for their king, he soon found himself as safe as so slender a force could make him, and wafted into the midst of his friends in Langland. As they coasted along the shore, they

a found several of Magnus's ships intirely deserted by the crews, who were making merry on shore; and to prevent their being again serviceable, they bored them through the bottoms, and sunk or destroyed them, with all possible silence and expedition. The report soon spread that Eric was escaped; but Magnus was in no condition to pursue him, his fleet being wholly destroyed <sup>a</sup>.

ERIC, having now got among his friends, resolved to make one more attempt to revenge Canute's cause, punish the perfidious Magnus, and establish himself on the throne, to which he was elected by the people. His first step was to hang up Ubbo, whom Nicholas had made governor of Langland; an ignominious death he justly merited, as one of the principal conspirators against the life of Canute. After this he made a descent with a small fleet on Schonen, which he soon reduced, by means of the friends he had among the inhabitants, who only wanted an opportunity of declaring themselves dissatisfied with their present government. Early in the spring king Nicholas entered upon measures to stop the progress of his rival. He raised an army, equipped a fleet, assembled the bishops and his most warlike vassals, and sent a number of scouts abroad to examine into the situation, number, and condition of Eric's force. It was not long before advice was received, that Eric was boldly marching to attack the king, though supported but with a handful of men. The scouts, who had probably been corrupted by Eric, further declared, that he appeared like something supernatural, riding upon a white horse that raised him into the clouds, and cut the air with incredible velocity. Nicholas perceived, that either fear or treachery had occasioned this phænomenon; but his soldiers judged otherwise, and fled with great precipitation to the ships, from which they could hardly be prevailed upon to return. In this confusion Eric attacked the king, and after making great slaughter of his troops, intirely defeated him, having slain Magnus in the field, who in this last act played the hero, chusing rather to die honourably than escape by an ignominious flight <sup>b</sup>.

Eric defeats the king.

THIS news reaching Norway, the king Magnus was so incensed at his wife for the information she had given Eric, by which he escaped, that he sent her back to Denmark. As to king Nicholas, he escaped with Harold into Jutland, where he assembled a council of the nobles, and declared Harold the successor of his son Magnus, not from any personal regard he had for him, but to render it his interest to oppose his brother Eric with all possible virulence and animosity. His next step was to go in person to Sleswick, in order to reconcile the inhabitants to him, who were greatly incensed at the murder of Canute their governor. His friends had done all in their power to dissuade him from this measure; but he was obstinately bent on it. There had always been an annual festival held at Sleswick, all the members of which were obliged, previous to their admission, to vow revenge against whoever should injure any individual of the society. Canute, while he lived, had been constantly president of this social club, and by his affability, kindness, and generosity, had intirely won their affections. On the king's arrival they instantly flew to arms; and in the space of a few minutes the city-gates were shut, the walls surrounded with armed men, every thing in commotion, and all means of escape cut off from Nicholas who now, when it was too late, perceived his error, but determined to support the consequences with the intrepidity of an hero. His friends advised him to take sanctuary in St. Peter's church; but this he refused, that he might not pollute the holy altar with his blood, and by that means aggravate the crime of his infatuated people. However, he endeavoured to seize upon the citadel; but was slain in the tumult that arose between his guards and the citizens, after he had reigned for the space of thirty-five years, according to Saxo Grammaticus and Meursius; though Pontanus and Suaningius place his death in the year 1135 <sup>c</sup>; and all writers agree, that he ascended the throne in 1107. When his friends represented to him the danger of his going personally to a city so strongly attached to Canute, he told them, that majesty had nothing to fear from shoemakers and taylor; yet did he fall by the hands of those very citizens he affected to despise, leaving this useful lesson to his successors, that moderation, affability, and clemency, are the surest guardians of the crown; and popular hatred the most dangerous enemy in a free constitution (A).

An insurrection
in Norway.

As soon as the burghers had executed their design upon the king, they marched in a troop to the prison, in which Christiern had been confined since his defeat, and set him at liberty. Their next step was to proclaim Eric king, agreeable to a former election in a full assembly of the nobility and commons of Zealand and Schonen. Eric having as yet no intelligence of what had been transacted in Sleswick, was making preparations for finishing the war. Accordingly he passed over with his fleet to Jutland, and here was first made acquainted with the death of Nicholas. Though he greatly rejoiced at this event, yet believing that neither his own authority, or the public tranquillity, could be sufficiently established while his brother Harold lived, and claimed the ensigns of sovereignty, he resolved to march against him. Harold, on the other hand, hearing of the king's death, and Eric's approach, was greatly perplexed how to act. His force was very unequal to his brother's; and hazarding a battle would therefore be exposing him to the most imminent danger; yet he had no other alternative than flying into banishment. His two eldest sons continued faithful to Eric, and were now in his camp: Harold however persuading himself, that probably they were not destitute of filial affection, though honour obliged them to remain firm to their engagements, resolved to consult them secretly in what manner he should act in so dangerous a conjuncture. A trusty friend had access to them, and they, without hesitation, requested that he would escape with all expedition to the king of Norway, assuring him, that risking a battle would be attended with certain ruin. Thus they acquitted themselves like faithful adherents to Eric, and like dutiful children to Harold; but the former, having some intimation of this secret correspondence, had them seized; and, after a short imprisonment, ordered them at the instigation of Christiern, to be drowned in the river Sley, into which they were plunged headlong <sup>a</sup>.

As soon as Eric had settled the state of affairs in Jutland and Sleswick, he returned to Zealand, where he found Harold supported by a strong body of Norwegian auxiliaries and proclaimed king of Denmark at a diet held in that island. On this intelligence Eric speedily returned to Jutland, and ordered five of the six remaining sons of Harold to be put to death, without remorse or pity, for their innocence and affinity to himself. As for the youngest son Olaus, he made his escape in a peasant's dress to Sweden <sup>b</sup>.

In the mean while the Vandals, encouraged by the intestine divisions in Denmark, made a sudden irruption into Holstein, and laid waste with terrible desolation every place through which they passed. To repress their insolence, Eric got together a fleet of eleven hundred sail, embarking in each vessel four horsemen, with their proper accoutrements, besides foot; with which armament he passed over into their country, and soon reduced it. From thence he went to the isle of Rugen to punish the inhabitants, who had not only assisted the Vandals, but renounced Christianity, exercised the most abominable and prophane pagan superstition, and, what more immediately concerned the state of Denmark, the most desperate piracy on the high seas. Having subdued them, he compelled the whole island to banish idolatry, to establish funds for the residence of a bishop to instruct them in the duties of the Christian religion, and to swear allegiance to the crown of Denmark. However, they did not long continue their submission; for Eric was scarce returned to Denmark before they restored their idols, and banished the Christian prelate. He was preparing to punish them with more severity, when the return of Harold, as we have mentioned above, diverted his intention. History relates, that he soon removed this rival brother by assassination; but we no where find the particular circumstances mentioned <sup>c</sup>.

DURING Eric's residence in Denmark, some disturbances arose in Norway, that terminated in the ruin of king Magnus. Harold, who claimed the crown in consequence of his affinity to the late royal family, had so engaged the hearts of the Irish, among whom he lived for a great number of years, that they sent him to Norway, attended with a considerable body of troops. An insurrection of the people immediately appeared in his favour; and they insisted, that Magnus should receive him as his colleague. This he refused, gave battle to the rebels and auxiliary Irish, and defeated Harold, who took shelter in Denmark, where he was kindly received by Eric. The truth was, revenge and policy, not humanity to the distressed, were the motives of Eric's conduct. He considered this as a favourable

a occasion of punishing Magnus for his treacherous attempts upon his life, in contempt of all the laws of hospitality. Harold solicited his aid, and Eric made no scruple of promising it as soon as he had put an end to the affair in which the revolt of Rugen now involved him. Against these islanders he set out a second time, and so totally subjected them, that he apprehended no other rebellion for some years; after which he applied himself to the performance of his obligations to Harold; he augmented his land and sea-forces, and passed over to Norway with a very formidable army, attended by Harold. Here he took some sea-port towns: but Magnus declining battle, he returned to winter in Denmark, resolving to resume his operations early in the spring a.

b NEXT year he returned with a superior force, and coming to a decisive action with Magnus, defeated his army, and took him prisoner. His victory he disgraced by his cruelty; for, to prevent all attempts to reinstate the unfortunate king, he put out both his eyes, deprived him of his virility, and after this barbarous castration, enclosed him for life in a monastery, raising Harold to the throne. Eric's cruelty to Magnus, king of Norway.

HAVING finished the war in Norway, he returned to settle the domestic œconomy of Denmark, which had fallen in great confusion during the long series of civil and foreign wars, in which the nation was for several years engaged. While his mind was thus usefully employed, an unfortunate dispute arose among the bishops, about the archbishopric of Lunden, then vacant. Eschil, bishop of Roschild, supported by the people, and Rico, bishop of Sleswick, for whom the king entertained a personal friendship, on account of his attachment, during the civil war, were the candidates. Eschil raised an army, and obliged the king and Rico to retire to Jutland. Here they levied forces, returned to Zealand, gave battle to the haughty prelate, and took him prisoner, keeping him in close confinement, until he was released at an exorbitant ransom, and the strong intercession of the most powerful of the nobility. The bishop of Roschild raises an army against Eric, and is made prisoner.

THIS dispute being for a time laid aside, the king resumed his attention to redress the grievances of his subjects, in which he met with numberless difficulties; for, in easing the burthen of taxes laid on the commons, he offended the nobility, and, in granting new honours and privileges to the latter, he only rivetted the chains of the former. This soon raised a ferment in the nation, which could be composed only by his death; an event that was treacherously brought about, while he was publicly administering justice in full court, near Ripen, where he was stabbed by one Plogus, surnamed Black, a nobleman of great distinction in Jutland. Thus died Eric, after a reign of scarce four years, resigning with his last breath a crown which he obtained by many valorous exploits, and dignified by such acts of popularity and justice, as long endeared his memory to the commons of Denmark. He obtained, says Pontanus, the surname of Emund, from his courage and the dangers he had surmounted; and of Harefoot, from his agility and swiftness, according to Meursius and other writers b. Eric murdered by Plogus.

THE royal family being almost extinct in the male line, great disputes arose in the diet about the succession. Some proposed Swen, the natural son of the late king; others again supported the claim of Canute, son to Magnus, and grandson to Eric; while a third party, headed by Christiern, of whom we have made mention in the late civil war, espoused the cause of Valdemar, the son of Canute king of the Vandals, by his wife Ingeburga. There were many reasonable objections started against all the three candidates: the first was a bastard son to a prince, who was himself the fruit of an illegitimate embrace: the second was a minor, and the son of a prince detested by the people, on account of the murder of their favourite Canute, and banished the kingdom by a solemn decree of the diet: and lastly, the third was so young, that dreadful consequences were apprehended from so long a minority as must ensue from his election. However, the influence and address of Christiern surmounted this last difficulty, as the people were greatly disposed to favour the offspring of a person they had perfectly adored. He sent privately for Ingeburga, and introduced her and her infant son to the people, with a pathetic speech, reminding them of the noble virtues of his father. The effect was sudden, and the diet, with one voice, proclaimed him king; but Ingeburga, aware of the dangers to which the child must be exposed by this exaltation, would by no persuasions consent to his election, until a regent should be appointed. She farther insisted, that the regent should actually enjoy the badges and authority of majesty during his natural life; that his ambition might be gratified, and all cause for conspiring against the life of her son, removed. This was a wise precaution suggested by maternal tenderness, that probably secured the crown afterwards to Valdemar. So strenuously did she maintain this point, that Eric, surnamed the Lamb, from the mild-ness of his disposition, was chosen regent, or rather colleague to Valdemar, and sole king during the young prince's minority. He was the son of Hacquin, who had married the late king's daughter, and related to Eric the Good, by the marriage of his son Harold (A).

It was his temper which gave rise to his elevation; for his known moderation, and extreme love of peace and tranquility, caused no jealousy, lest ambition might tempt him to disturb the public quiet<sup>c</sup>.

Ecclesiastical disputes renewed.

ERIC V. had scarce ascended the throne, when the divisions among the clergy broke out afresh with redoubled vigour. Eschil, bishop of Roschild, as soon as death had removed Eric, who was the greatest obstacle to his aspiring views, went over to Schonen, and by the consent, and even at the persuasion of the inhabitants, assumed the title and authority of primate, without obtaining, or indeed asking the permission of the new king. The people were enamoured of the late archbishop; and as Eschil was his relation, they strenuously insisted that the dignity should be kept in the family. This induced Eric, surnamed the Lamb, to maintain the pretensions of Rico, bishop of Sleswick, patronized by the late king, and likewise to curb the ambition and insolence of Eschil. Observing, however, the obstinacy with which the whole province of Schonen espoused his cause, and that degrading him would necessarily be attended with a civil war, he dropped the design rather than disturb the tranquility of the kingdom. The dispute about this archbishopric of Lunden was the first occasion the kings of Denmark had to repent their having invested their turbulent prelates with temporal authority, and elevated them to such a pitch of grandeur, as rendered them haughty, insolent, and even dangerous to their sovereigns. In some measure to gratify Rico for his disappointment, Eric made him chancellor of Denmark, and gave him the bishopric of Roschild, vacant by the removal of Eschil<sup>d</sup>.

AMIDST these transactions, Olaus, the son of Harold, who escaped the massacre in which his brothers perished, by order of the late king, now returned to Sweden, and publicly demanded his father's estate that had been confiscated. This the king refused, pleading a law passed in the reign of Frotho the Great, by which the estates of all persons who had taken up arms against their king and country were forfeited to the crown. Olaus finding that he could not avail himself of intreaty, law, or force, had recourse to plots and conspiracies. He endeavoured one night to assassinate the king in his bed-chamber; but was prevented by the guards, from whom he escaped with difficulty, and fled a second time into Sweden. Returning thence into Schonen, he levied forces, assumed the regal dignity, and prepared to invade the whole kingdom. Eschil, notwithstanding his quarrel with the king, raised forces to oppose him, and performed the part of a loyal subject, but unsuccessfully; for being defeated in the field, he retreated to Lunden, and was there besieged by Olaus. After defending the city, which was secured by no walls, with great bravery, he was at length, from the scarcity of provisions, forced to surrender it upon honourable terms. Some writers say that he was taken prisoner, and dismissed, after swearing allegiance to Olaus, which oath he broke as soon as Eric's army came near enough to protect him. He offered his services to this prince, and took it upon him to crush the rebellion, provided his majesty would furnish him with a suitable army, which was readily granted. As soon as the prelate found himself at the head of a formidable body of men, he went in search of the enemy, who did not decline battle. Here he was a second time vanquished, and returned to the king with apologies that were easily admitted, as his misfortunes could not be attributed to want of loyalty, but to unskilfulness in a profession no way appertaining to the character of a dignified prelate<sup>e</sup>.

OLAUS, elated with his two victories, began now to assume the king in reality. He plundered all the effects belonging to Eric and Eschil; deposed the latter from his archbishopric, and placed another in his room; revoked all the decrees made in this and the last reign; and lastly, sending his army into winter-quarters, making Lunden the repository of their arms, he went over to Schonen with only a few attendants, as if the war had been wholly ended, and himself in quiet possession of the throne. This imprudent security would have wrought his destruction, had not fortune interposed for his safety; for Eric receiving a intelligence of his total neglect of military duty, collected a small body of forces, and passing over in the night, attacked the enemy just as their camp was ready to break up, and while every thing was in the utmost confusion and disorder. The consequence was a complete victory, having taken four of Olaus's generals, dispersed his whole army, pillaged his camp, reduced Lunden, seized his arms and magazines, and put to death the new bishop, appointed by Olaus in the room of Eschil, or, as others imagine, Eschil himself, for having traiterously suffered himself to be twice defeated in the field.<sup>f</sup> Eric defeats Olaus.

OLAUS escaped to Sweden, from whence he soon returned with another army, and gave battle to Eric, in which he was a second time defeated at Glimstorp. Nor did this destroy his hopes, or any way dispirit him; for we are told, that in the same campaign he fought b no less than twelve obstinate battles with Eric, in all of which he was unsuccessful. He had indeed an admirable talent at accommodating himself to circumstances, and retrieving the situation of affairs, after they had been given over as lost by all other men; but he never stuck at the means, whether honourable or not: his whole object was success in whatever manner it was obtained. Finding therefore that all attempts in Schonen would be vain, he passed over suddenly into Zealand, and was here defeated by Rico, bishop of Roschild. Determining however to have his revenge, he gave out that he had quitted the island, and concealed himself with a strong party of desperadoes in a wood adjacent to Rico's palace. This he attacked furiously in the night: but finding the doors too strong to be forced, he called out for fire to consume the building. Rico upon this demanded a parley, which being granted, he was going to remonstrate with Olaus, when he was treacherously slain by his order, before he had well passed through his own gate. Olaus a second time defeated.

AFTER this infamous action Olaus returned to Schonen before Rico's death could be known there; but Eric took his measures so well, that he had almost put an end to the war by a sudden attack on the enemy, in which Olaus narrowly escaped being made prisoner. This was only a short respite from the fate which impended; for he was soon after defeated and slain in a bloody battle fought just as he was upon the point of quitting Schonen.<sup>g</sup> Olaus slain.

THIS dangerous rival being removed, Eric applied his attention to composing the state of the kingdom, greatly disturbed by this tedious war. He married the sister of the e bishop of Bremen, remunerated the nobles with some beneficial grants of estates forfeited in the late war; for the zeal and fidelity with which they had served him, and distinguished himself by many acts of piety, justice, and popularity, until at length he fell into an inactivity and indolence, that greatly impaired his reputation. To redeem his character he fitted out a fleet against the Vandals, who resumed their piracies; but a lazy humour had now so strongly possessed him, that loitering on the coast of Zealand without keeping proper watch, he was surprised by the enemy, and very nearly taken prisoner. It is supposed that his fondness for his young queen had totally emasculated his mind, and rendered him indifferent to every consideration but domestic felicity, which he indulged to an excess of weakness. He now returned home after his shameful flight, without again attempting f to wipe off the disgrace, or repress the insolence of those barbarians. Next year he was seized with a fever, of which he died, leaving the reputation of a prince endued with excellent natural qualities, were they not corrupted, and at last obliterated by a shameful indolence, the consequence of too uxorious a disposition. On his death-bed he was weak enough to put on a monk's habit, looking upon that as a sure passport to the mansions of bliss; and in this apparel assembled his nobility round him, delivering to them his scepter. Yet though he resigned the badges of authority, he could not bear to have a successor mentioned; for when that was proposed by one of the nobility, in order to put a stop to the incursions of the Vandals, he turned round in wrath, and expired with sentiments of resentment.<sup>h</sup> (O).
